

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. AMERICAN LAW REPORTS

ANNOTATED

SAM C. LAMBERT, Plff. in Err.,

v.

G. I. SMITH.

Oklahoma Supreme Court — May 16, 1916.

(53 Okla. 606, 157 Pac. 909.)

Evidence — burden of proof — holder of note.

1. The rule placing the burden of proof on the holder obtains where there is fraud in the inception of the note.

Bills and notes—holder in due course.

2. The purchaser of a negotiable instrument, in order to be a holder in due course, must come within the requirements of § 4102, Rev. Laws 1910, defining such holder.

—knowledge of agent — effect.

3. Where, at the time a note was negotiated to the holder, his attorney, acting for and representing him in the particular transaction, had actual knowledge of an infirmity in the note, such knowledge will be imputed to the holder as though the facts were made known to him in person. In such case the principal is chargeable with notice of all such facts as come to his agent's knowledge while acting within the scope of his agency.

[See 3 R. C. L. 1069.]

—defect in chain of title.

4. When it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated a negotiable instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as a holder in due course, except as otherwise provided in § 4109, Rev. Laws 1910.

Appeal — instructions — error.

5. Instructions placing the burden of proving knowledge of infirmity in a negotiable instrument upon the defendant, except in the class of cases provided for in the latter part of § 4109, Rev. Laws 1910, constitute reversible error. Such instructions relieve the plaintiff holder of making proof of a fact necessary to a recovery, and impose upon the defendant maker the additional duty of establishing to the jury's satisfaction a fact not necessary to his defense.

ERROR to the District Court for Alfalfa County (Cullison, J.) to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Titus & Talbot, for plaintiff in error:

When the title is shown to be defective, the burden is on the holder to show his good faith in obtaining the note.

Abmeyer v. First Nat. Bank, 76 Kan. 877, 92 Pac. 1109; Kennedy v. Gibson, 68 Kan. 612, 75 Pac. 1044; Brook v. Teague, 52 Kan. 119, 34 Pac. 347; Iowa City State Bank v. Claypool, 91 Kan. 248, 137 Pac. 949; Ireland v. Shore, 91 Kan. 326, 137 Pac. 926; Alt-schul v. Rogers, 22 Idaho, 512, 126 Pac. 1048; Holdsworth v. Blyth & F. Co. 23 Wyo. 52, 146 Pac. 608; People's Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 17 Ariz. 215, 149 Pac. 764; Nicholson v. Neary, 77 Wash. 294, 137 Pac. 493; Miller v. Marks, 46 Utah, 257, 148 Pac. 413; Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Landia, 37 Okla. 530, 132 Pac. 1101; McConnel v. Street, 17 Ill. 253; Pringle v. Phillips, 5 Sandf. 157; Wilder v. Gilman, 55 Vt. 504; Cochran v. Fox Chase Bank, 209 Pa. 84, 103 Am. St. Rep. 976, 58 Atl. 117; Brooks v. Reynolds, 37 Okla. 767, 132 Pac. 1091; Pinkerton Bros. Co. v. Bromley, 119 Mich. 3, 77 N. W. 307; Friedrich v. Ferguson, 16 S. D. 541, 91 N. W. 323.

If the plaintiff took defendant's note with knowledge or notice of facts and circumstances which would constitute such taking as bad faith, then he is not protected as a holder in due course. It was the duty of the court to instruct the jury on this question, and it was error to refuse to do so upon request of defendant.

38 Cyc. 1687; Leach v. Helper, 32 Okla. 729, 124 Pac. 68; Jones v. Joplin & P. R. Co. 91 Kan. 282, 137 Pac. 796; Seay v. Plunkett, 44 Okla. 794, 145 Pac. 496; State Bank v. Kiser, 46 Okla. 180, 148 Pac. 685; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Pitchford, 44 Okla. 197, 143 Pac. 1146.

Messrs. W. L. Owen, Keith S. Simpson, and Noble & Tincher for defendant in error.

Sharp, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents error from the district court of Alfalfa county. Plaintiff, Smith, brought action against Lambert, to recover on a negotiable promissory note in the sum of $1,000 given by said Lambert, and before maturity indorsed by the payee, Vennum, to plaintiff. Defendant answered, charging, in effect, that said note was without consideration, and was fraudulently procured from him by Vennum and one Ceideburg, and that plaintiff knew at the time, or was in possession of facts and information such that his action in taking the note amounted to bad faith. The trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant brings error, assigning, among other errors, the giving of instructions numbered 2 and 5, and the failure to give requested instructions numbered 1, 2, and 3, requested by the defendant. Instructions numbered 2 and 5 are as follows:

"No. 2. You are further instructed, however, that the burden of proof is upon the defendant in this case to establish by a preponderance of the evidence: First, the truth of the defense which he has pleaded against the note in suit; second, the fact that the plaintiff, G. I. Smith, purchased the note with notice of such defense, or that he made such purchase after the note became due. And if you so find by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant has proved and established his defense to said note, your verdict should be for the defendant. . . .

"No. 5. The court further instructs you that in order to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff it is incumbent upon the defendant, Sam Lambert, to establish by a preponderance of the evidence: First, the truth of the defense which he has pleaded against the note in suit; and, second, the fact that the plaintiff, G. I. Smith, purchased the note with a notice of such defense, or that he made such purchase after the note became due. If both these propositions have been so established, then the plaintiff cannot recover; but, if either proposition has not been so established, then plaintiff will be entitled to your verdict for the full amount of the note in suit."

That these instructions do not correctly state the law, and were prejudicial to defendant, is obvious. Neither are they cured by instructions numbered 1 and 4, as claimed by counsel for defendant in error. In short, the objectionable instructions placed upon the defendant the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that, notwithstanding any fraud practised by Vennum in the procurement of said note, Smith purchased the note with actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the note constituted bad faith, and told the jury that unless defendant established these facts by a preponderance of the evidence, they should find for the plaintiff. Plaintiff claimed to be a holder of the note in due course of trade. By § 4102, Rev. Laws 1910, a holder in due course is defined as follows:

"A holder in due course is a holder who has taken the instrument under the following conditions:

"First. That it is complete and regular upon its face;

"Second. That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact;

"Third. That he took it in good faith and for value;

"Fourth. That at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it."

By § 4105 it is provided that "the title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective within the meaning of this chapter when he obtained the instrument, or any signature thereto, by fraud, duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to fraud."

While § 4106 provides: "To constitute notice of an infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating the same, the person to whom it is negotiated must have had actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith."

We have carefully read the entire record, and find abundant evidence to justify the conclusion that the note was fraudulently obtained from Lambert by the payee, Vennum, and his confederate, Ceideburg. "The evidence tending to show that the note was originally obtained by Vennum through fraud was by no means clear, decided, and satisfactory," say counsel for defendant in error in their very excellent brief, thereby admitting there was evidence of fraud in the inception of the note, and denying only its probative value. The facts in respect to the giving of the $1,000 note, however, are uncontradicted. That Lambert was induced to give the note by fraud practised upon him by the payee thereof, and those acting in conjunction with him, cannot be seriously questioned. Section 4109, Rev. Laws 1910, provides: "Every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as a holder in due course. But the last-mentioned rule does not apply in favor of a party who became bound on the instrument prior to the acquisition of such defective title."

The argument that the instructions complained of constitute error is met in the brief of defendant in error, by this statement: "So it seems that the court, with admirable impartiality, placed upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that he was the holder in due course as often as he did upon the defendant that of proving his defense," and the claim that, there being no evidence of bad faith, the giving of said instructions did not constitute reversible error. There being evidence of fraud in the procurement of the note, under the statute the burden was upon the plaintiff, and not upon the defendant, to prove that he acquired title to the note in due course, which, as we have seen, includes proof that it was taken in good faith, and that at the time the purchaser had no knowledge of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in Venum's title. While the authorities uphold with much unanimity the rule that neither negligence, nor knowledge of suspicious circumstances, nor failure to make inquiries will in or of itself amount to bad faith in a holder of negotiable paper, who purchases it for value before maturity, yet they are equally consistent in holding that the existence of such facts may be evidence of bad faith sufficient to take the question to the jury; and especially is this so where the burden of proof is upon the holder to establish the innocent character of his purchase. Arnd v. Aylesworth, 145 Iowa, 185, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 638, 123 N. W. 1000; Kellogg v. Curtis, 69 Me. 212, 31 Am. Rep. 273; Canajoharie Nat. Bank v. Diefendorf, 123 N. Y. 191, 10 L.R.A. 676, 25 N. E. 402; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110, 17 L. ed. 857; Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & El. 870, 111 Eng. Reprint, 1011, 6 L. J. K. B. N. S. 260, 6 Nev. & M. 372. Although suspicious circumstances are not notice as a matter of law, yet the jury may find them to be so as a matter of fact, and evidence going to show the existence of such grounds for suspicion is always admissible.

That the owner of a negotiable note who obtains it before maturity for a valuable consideration, without knowledge of any defect of title, and in good faith, holds it by title valid against the world, is firmly established in this jurisdiction.

McPherrin v. Tittle, 36 Okla. 510, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395, 129 Pac. 721; Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Landis, 37 Okla. 530, 132 Pac. 1101; First State Bank v. Tobin, 39 Okla. 96, 134 Pac. 395; Security Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gleichman, — Okla. —, 147 Pac. 1009, 50 Okla. 441, L.R.A. 1915F, 1203, 150 Pac. 908. Also that suspicion of defects of title, or knowledge of circumstances which would excite such suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or of circumstances sufficient to put him upon inquiry, will not defeat his title; that result can be produced only by bad faith on his part. Forbes v. First Nat. Bank, 21 Okla. 206, 95 Pac. 785; First Nat. Bank v. Wade, 27 Okla. 102, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 775, 111 Pac. 205; City State Bank v. Pickard, 35 Okla. 243, 129 Pac. 38. But it is unnecessary for us to say whether from the proven facts there was evidence of bad faith sufficient to take the case to the jury, as we shall presently see. Some time before Smith secured the Lambert note he had loaned Venum $300, and Ceideburg $600. Afterwards an additional loan of $175 was made Ceideburg, who gave plaintiff his note for $1,075, which included the amount due Smith and Venum. To secure this note, which matured February 4, 1912, Ceideburg gave Smith a mortgage on a race horse named Blanco Boy. This note and mortgage Smith started to leave with the People's State Bank of Medicine Lodge, but was told by someone there that he had better see a lawyer with reference to it. Smith then went to the office of Mr. Tinchier, and placed the Ceideburg note in his hands for collection. Mr. Tinchier placed the mortgage of record, looked after the security, and advised Venum that he had the note for collection. In the course of time Venum, who was anxious to get possession of Blanco Boy for racing purposes, called to see Mr. Tinchier; Mr. Smith being present on the occasion. In the transaction Mr. Tinchier represented Smith as his attorney. At the conference the following transpired: Smith assigned over to Vennum both the Ceideburg note and mortgage, and Vennum indorsed to Smith the Lambert note for $1,000, and agreed to pay Smith the amount due him over and above $1,000 in cash. At the trial Smith testified positively that at the time of taking the Lambert note he had no knowledge of the circumstances under which it was given, and hence of the fraud practised upon Lambert. Smith's testimony, standing alone, refutes a personal knowledge on his part of the infirmity in the note.

As he was represented in the transaction by his attorney, Mr. Tincher, we must look, then, to ascertain what knowledge, if any, of the transactions between Vennum and Lambert his attorney had.

On cross-examination the following questions were asked and answered by Mr. Tincher while on the witness stand:

Q. You took a purely legal attitude, and that was that you had a right to look at the note, and did not make any further inquiry at all?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. What was the inquiry you made?

A. I made the inquiry as to whether or not Mr. Lambert was financially responsible; I made that inquiry.

Q. You only made the inquiry as to whether or not Mr. Lambert was good for the amount of the note or not? You didn't investigate to ascertain as to whether or not there was any consideration for the note, or whether or not he would pay it?

You depended upon the face of the note?

A. Vennum told me what the note was given for.

Q. You knew that you could not believe a word that Vennum might tell you, didn't you?

A. No sir; I didn't.

Q. You didn't know that you could not believe what Vennum might say about it?

A. No sir. I thought that, if anybody could tell me what the Lambert note was given to him for, Vennum could.

Q. You knew he had lied to somebody else, because you had defended him in a criminal case and criminal prosecutions all over the country?

A. No.

Thus, it appears that Vennum told Tincher what the note was given for, and that Tincher believed Vennum's statement, knowing that Vennum knew the facts. Notice to Tincher was notice Bills and notes agent—effect. to Smith, his client. The notice he received was contemporaneous with the consummation of the transaction. Generally speaking, it may be said that, for the purpose of charging a holder with knowledge, notice to an agent is notice to his principal, and that the principal is bound and affected by such knowledge or notice as his agent obtains while acting within the scope of his agency. Brothers v. Bank of Kaukauna, 84 Wis. 381, 36 Am. St. Rep. 932, 54 N. W. 786; Kauffman v. Robey, 60 Tex. 308, 48 Am. Rep. 264; Dickson v. Kittson, 75 Minn. 168, 74 Am. St. Rep. 447, 77 N. W. 820; Iowa Nat. Bank v. Sherman, 19 S. D. 238, 117 Am. St. Rep. 941, 103 N. W. 19; 3 R. C. L. 1069. The supreme court of Wisconsin, in the case first cited, of the rule making notice to the agent notice to the principal, said: "Notice to an agent is notice to his principal, and it is conceded that the principal is bound and affected by such knowledge or notice as his agent obtains in negotiating or attending to the particular transaction. But, if the agent acquires his information so recently as to make it incredible that he should have forgotten it, his principal will be bound, although not acquired while transacting the business of the principal."

Evidence of fraud in the procurement of the note from Lambert having been introduced, the burden then shifted to the plaintiff to show that he acquired the note without knowledge —defect in chain of any infirmity of title. therein, and in good faith, as was held in Winfield Nat. Bank v. Mc-

Evidence — burden of proving due course.

1. Every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but, when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as a holder in due course; and when the holder thereafter establishes that he received the note for value in the usual course of business, and under circumstances that did not operate as constructive notice of the fraud by which the maker was induced to execute the note, then the burden of proof is upon the maker to prove actual notice of the fraud.

Bills and notes — holder in due course.

2. Under the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, a "holder in due course" is a holder who has taken the instrument under the following conditions: (1) That it is complete and regular upon its face; (2) that he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact; (3) that he took it in good faith and for value; (4) that at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it.

3. The title of a person who negotiates an instrument is "defective" within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Act when he obtains the instrument, or any signature thereto, by fraud, duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith or under such circumstances as amount to fraud.

4. In the hands of any holder other than the holder in due course, a negotiable instrument is subject to the same defenses as if it were non-negotiable. But a holder who derives his title through a holder in due course, and who is not himself a party to any fraud or illegality affecting the instrument, has all the rights of such former holder in respect of all parties prior to the latter.

5. A negotiable note being payable to the order of a specified person, the indorsement of such person is necessary to the further negotiation of the instrument, and when the same is indorsed in blank, not specifying any indorsee, it is thereafter payable to bearer and may be negotiated by delivery.

—what destroys bona fides.

6. Suspicion of defect of title, or knowledge of circumstances which would excite such suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or of circumstances to put him upon inquiry, will not defeat the rights of one claiming to be a bona fide holder. That result can be produced only by bad faith on his part.

ERROR to the District Court for Payne County (Hickam, J.) to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Yerker E. Taylor for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Springer & Wilson for defendant in error.

Pitchford, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error, plaintiff below, instituted this action against defendant in error, defendant below, to recover judgment against the defendant upon a promissory note, executed by the defendant to the Lyon-Taylor Company.

It appears from the evidence that on June 4, 1914, the defendant executed and delivered a certain note, payable to the order of the Lyon-Taylor Company, for the sum of $298; that, prior to the maturity of the note, the same was indorsed in blank by the Lyon-Taylor Company and delivered to the First National Bank of Iowa City, Iowa. The Lyon-Taylor Company borrowed from the said bank the sum of $2,000, executing its note to the bank for said sum, and securing payment of the note by hypothecating a number of notes, including the note in controversy. Thereafter, the plaintiff purchased from the bank the note executed by the Lyon-Taylor Company, which was transferred to him, including the collateral security.

The answer of the defendant was to the effect that she was induced to execute the note by fraud, misrepresentation, and deceit practised upon her by the agent of the Lyon-Taylor Company, and further, that the plaintiff was not a holder in due course; that the Lyon-Taylor Company, the First National Bank, and the plaintiff were engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the defendant.

Upon the trial of the case, a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff appeals and assigns as error: (1) That the court erred in admitting testimony on the part of the defendant as to the transactions between the defendant and the Lyon-Taylor Company; (2) error in refusing to give the jury peremptory instructions to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff; (3) error in giving the jury instruction No. 5.

The contention of the plaintiff is that, the note sued on being a negotiable instrument and the plaintiff being a holder in due course, the trial court permitted error in permitting the witnesses on the part of the defendant, over objection of the plaintiff, to testify concerning the transactions between the defendant and the Lyon-Taylor Company, leading up to the execution of the note, and that, under all the evidence in the case, the plaintiff was entitled to a peremptory instruction for a verdict in his favor.

If the witnesses on behalf of the defendant testified truthfully,—and their credibility was purely a matter for the jury to determine,—the defendant was the victim of a rank imposition, devised and executed by the Lyon-Taylor Company, through its agent, whereby she was induced to sign the note sued on. After the defendant had introduced evidence tending to prove the fraud and imposition practised upon her, the burden was then cast upon the plaintiff to prove that the First National Bank, under whom he claims, acquired the note in due course.

Plaintiff's possession of the note, indorsed by the Lyon-Taylor Company in blank, was prima facie evidence that the bank acquired the note in good faith and for value and in due course. Section 4109, R. L. 1910. But, when the defendant introduced evidence tending to show that the note had been procured by fraud, misrepresentation, and deceit practised upon her by the agent of the Lyon-Taylor Company, then the burden of proof was shifted to the plaintiff to show that the bank from which he purchased had acquired the note in good faith, for value, in the usual course of business, and when the plaintiff thereafter, by uncontroverted evidence, established that the bank had received the note for value in the usual course of business, and under circumstances that did not operate as constructive notice of the fraud by which defendant had been induced to sign the note, then the burden was upon the defendant to prove actual notice of fraud. Forbes v. First Nat. Bank, 21 Okla. 206, 95 Pac. 785. There was no proof offered tending to show that the bank had any notice of the fraud in acquiring the note.

Counsel for defendant in their brief say: "If the First National Bank could by any possibility be considered the owner and holder of the note so as to transfer the same, the First National Bank never indorsed the note, and therefore the defendant could not be considered a bona fide holder in due course, so as to cut off the equities existing in favor of the maker"—and cites § 4080, Rev. Laws 1910, which provides: "An instrument is negotiated when it is transferred from one person to another in such manner as to constitute the transferee the holder thereof. If payable to bearer, it is negotiated by delivery; if payable to order, it is negotiated by the indorsement of the holder completed by delivery."

Evidently counsel overlooked § 4059, Rev. Laws 1910, which provides:

"The instrument is payable to bearer:

"First, when it is expressed to be so payable; or

"Second, when it is payable to a person named therein or bearer; or

"Third, when it is payable to the order of a fictitious or nonexisting person, and such fact was known to the person making it so payable; or

"Fourth, when the name of the payee does not purport to be the name of any person; or

"Fifth, when the only or last indorsement is an indorsement in blank."

The note sued on, as we have seen, was payable to the Lyon-Taylor Company, or order, and was indorsed in blank when delivered to the bank. Afterward, the note could be negotiated by delivery, which the evidence establishes was done in the instant case.

Bills and notes—
indorsement.

In Conqueror Trust Co. v. Bayless Drug Co. 75 Okla. 288, 183 Pac. 419, it was said: "It may be that the plaintiff was not an innocent purchaser in good faith, but the evidence is conclusive to the contrary. All that the courts can judge by is the evidence. There might be circumstances connected with this transaction that would excite one's suspicion, but the great weight of authority, and particularly the decisions of this court, have followed the rule that suspicion, or the knowledge of circumstances which would excite such suspicion

in the mind of a prudent man, or of circumstances sufficient to put one upon inquiry, is not sufficient to defeat the rights of one claiming to be a bona fide holder. That result can be produced only by bad faith on his part. The authorities are uniform in holding that the owner of a negotiable promissory note, who obtains it before maturity and for a valuable consideration, without knowledge of any defect of title and in good faith, holds it by a title valid against all the world."

In McPherrin v. Tittle, 36 Okla. 510, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395, 129 Pac. 721, it was said: "We believe it to be a principle now well settled that neither a suspicion nor defect of title, knowledge of circumstances which would excite such suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or put him on inquiry, will affect his right, unless the circumstances or suspicions are so cogent and obvious that to remain passive would amount to bad faith."

We have examined instruction No. 5, given by the court, to which plaintiff excepted, and fail to find error in the same, especially when viewed in connection with the other instructions in the cause. Besides, plaintiff seems to have abandoned this ground as error, as the same is not discussed in his brief, and no authorities cited showing any vice in the instruction.

Under the foregoing authorities, we are constrained to reverse the judgment of the trial court, and remand the cause for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

Petition for rehearing denied November 16, 1920.

NOTE.

The effect of fraud in the inception of a bill or note to throw upon a subsequent holder the burden of proving that he is a bona fide holder, or a holder in due course, is the subject of the annotation following STEVENS v. BARNES, post, 18. The question whether the burden thrown upon the holder includes the necessity of negating notice of the fraud is treated in subd. IV. of that annotation. It will be observed that the reported case (STEVENS v. PIERCE, ante, 7) follows Mr. Daniel's rule on that point, which is out of harmony with the view almost uniformly taken under the Negotiable Instruments Law, and is inconsistent with the view taken by the same court in the earlier case of LAMBERT v. SMITH, ante, 1.

MRS. FRANK BARNES et al., Doing Business under the Firm Name and Style of Barnes & Wrede, Appts.

Evidence — burden of proof — rebutting fraud.

1. Fraud at the inception of the alleged contract and note having been established, the burden shifted to the indorsee to prove by fair preponderance of the evidence that he was a good-faith purchaser for value, before maturity, without notice. This he has failed to do.

Bills and notes — effect of fraud.

2. Where a promissory note is procured by fraud and misrepresentation, there is no legal execution or delivery of it, and it is of no legal force or effect.

[See 3 R. C. L. 1103.]

Alteration of instruments — detachment of note from order.

3. Where one, through himself or agent, falsely and fraudulently procures another to sign a paper, purporting to be an order for goods, to which is attached a promissory note, the two instruments being separated only by a perforation, and the note is, after the delivery of the order, detached from it, such detachment constitutes a material alteration of the note, and destroys its legality if any it had. This is true, even if in the order there are words authorizing said note to be detached, for they only show more clearly the fraudulent purpose of the combination of the two instruments.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Ransom County (Allen, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Bangert & Nollman, for appellants:

The purported note is void on account of fraud.

Guild v. More, 32 N. D. 482, 155 N. W. 44; Stevens v. Venema, 202 Mich. 232, L.R.A.1918F, 1145, 168 N. W. 531; Stevens v. Pearson, 138 Minn. 72, 163 N. W. 769; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 891; Sweet v. Anderson, 41 N. D. 375, 170 N. W. 869; Pratt v. Duncan, 204 Mich. 632, 171 N. W. 337.

The order and purported note together constitute but one instrument, and detaching the purported note is a material alteration of the instrument and renders it void.

Grace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is one which was brought in the county court of Ransom county on a purported promissory note. By stipulation between the parties, the action was tried in the district court of that county. It was tried to a jury, but at the close of the testimony counsel for each of the parties made a motion for a directed verdict. Thus, under the former decisions of this court, the case became a court case.

The complaint states a cause of action upon the promissory note. Before stating the contents of the answer, it may be well to state the substantial facts of the case.

On September 18, 1914, one Edwin Acker, a salesman for Donald-Richards Company, secured an order from the defendant for a certain bill of goods which was signed by Mrs. Frank Barnes. To the order for the goods was attached the promissory note. The order and the note were one piece of paper, the note being separated from the order by perforation.

At the time of the trial, Mrs. Frank Barnes was not present; it being claimed that she was out of the state. The following stipulation was agreed to, by and between the counsel for the respective parties: "It is stipulated and agreed, by and between counsel, that prior to the execution of the instrument in suit in controversy, the Donald-Richards Company, through one of its agents, had sold J. I. Rue, a merchant in Enderlin, North Dakota, goods, wares, and merchandise of the same nature and composition as the articles sold to the defendants for which the instrument in controversy was given in part payment. It is further stipulated and agreed that the witness, Mrs. E. W. Wrede, will testify that at the time of the taking of the order attached to the deposition taken on the part of the plaintiff, and marked 'exhibit C,' and herewith offered in evidence together with the instrument sued upon in this action, the said Acker, agent of said Donald-Richards Company, stated to this witness and her partner, Mrs. Frank Barnes, that the said instruments, taken together, constituted an order for goods, and did not constitute a note, but that the second portion of said instrument, now marked 'exhibit A,' which was attached to exhibit B, was to represent merely the manner in which the goods, or payment for the goods, should mature. It is further stipulated that said instrument, exhibit A, was signed by Mrs. Frank Barnes for the firm of Barnes & Wrede, after said representations had been made in the presence and hearing of both the witness and signer of exhibit A, to each of said parties, said agent addressing the witness and Mrs. Barnes jointly."

The contract and note were sent to Donald-Richards Company, and the testimony by deposition shows that the note was detached from the contract, and afterward delivered to the Iowa State Bank as part of the collateral security for a loan upon $1,000, which testimony shows to have been on or about the 7th day of September, 1914. Deposition testimony further shows that the note by the bank was indorsed to

Fred L. Stevens on March 5, 1915, who claims that the consideration he paid for the indorsement and delivery of the note was the taking up by him of the $1,000 loan made by the Iowa State Bank to Donald-Richards Company. Stevens now claims to be the owner of the note, and claims there is nothing paid upon the same.

The answer of the defendants is a general denial, and, in addition thereto, a further and separate defense which is in substance as follows: That on or about the 18th day of September, 1914, at Enderlin, North Dakota, one Edwin Acker, the salesman and agent of the Donald-Richards Company, through fraud and misrepresentations, induced the defendants to execute an order for certain goods sold by the Donald-Richards Company; that in order to induce these defendants to make, and execute said order for said goods, the agent, Acker, stated and represented to these defendants that said company sold goods to but one customer or firm in each city, and that the defendants would have the exclusive sale of said line of goods in the city of Enderlin; that said statements and representations were false, fraudulent, and untrue, and made for the sole and only purpose of inducing these defendants to sign said order; that the defendants believed in and relied upon said statements and representations, and by reason thereof, and not otherwise, and without knowledge of the falsity thereof, executed said order and parted with the possession to said Donald-Richards Company or its agent aforesaid; that such statements and representations were fraudulent and untrue, and were known to be false and untrue at the time they were made. As a further defense, the defendants denied execution of the note, and alleged that attached to, and forming a part of, the order so given, and made by these defendants by reason of the false and fraudulent representations as aforesaid, was a certain printed form, in substance as alleged in the complaint, and which plaintiff alleges to be a certain note in the sum of $94.50, due in instalments, but that said form was attached to and formed a part of said order so obtained, and was for the sole and only purpose of indicating the time within which said goods would be paid for, and was not delivered by the defendants, and was not received by Donald-Richards Company, and never became the note of the defendants; that, at the time of delivery of said order and said alleged note, they constituted but one instrument, and the defendants allege that said note was never delivered, and never became an obligation of the defendants, and that the defendants are not liable thereon.

The defendants further allege that since the execution of said order, as aforesaid, the defendants learned that the agent for Donald-Richards Company did sell the same line of goods to others in the city of Enderlin, and that, immediately upon learning this condition, they notified the said Donald-Richards Company that they would not accept the goods, and did then and there offer to restore the goods to the Donald-Richards Company in case it had parted with possession, and did then and there offer to rescind the contract, but alleges that Donald-Richards Company was not then in position to restore to the defendants their said order and alleged note, and did then and there positively refuse to do so.

The defendants further alleged that they never received the goods, and allege that they have never been tendered to them at Enderlin, North Dakota, or any other place, and that they have received nothing for said alleged note.

The principal defense is that the contract and alleged note were procured by a fraud, and never attained any legal existence or standing, and thus never became a contract or promissory note. If this be true, there could be no delivery of the same.

Section 5849, Comp. Laws 1913, defines "actual fraud." It reads thus:

"'Actual fraud' within the meaning of this chapter consists in any of the following acts committed by a party to the contract, or with his connivance, with intent to deceive another party thereto or to induce him to enter into the contract:

"1. The suggestion as a fact of that which is not true by one who does not believe it to be true.

"2. The positive assertion in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true.

"3. The suppression of that which is true by one having knowledge or belief of the fact.

"4. A promise made without any intention of performing it; or,

"5. Any other act fitted to deceive."

Mrs. Wrede, one of the defendants in the action, was sworn as a witness in the case. After she had been asked by her counsel several preliminary questions, the plaintiff objected to the introduction of the answers to any of them under the allegations of the answer, which tended to show fraud or misrepresentation, material alteration, lack of consideration, or any other defense alleged in the answer upon the ground that the answer did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense upon any of the grounds stated; and upon the further ground that it fails to allege that the plaintiff had any knowledge whatsoever of any defect in the title to the instrument in suit in the action, and fails to allege any notice of said defect was ever brought home to him as required by the Negotiable Instrument Act in force in North Dakota; and upon the further ground that the burden is upon the maker of the note to first prove that the plaintiff is not indorsee in good faith, and that, before he can prove any defense, he must first show that plaintiff was not the holder in due course, as due course is defined by the statute of North Dakota; and upon the further ground that there is no allegation and support of the defense of fraud in the inception of the instrument in dispute, and no allegation that any representation was made that the instrument in suit was not a note.

This motion the court denied. The stipulation above referred to was then made which includes the testimony of Mrs. Wrede. She was a witness in the case, and was apparently testifying when the stipulation was made which set forth what she would testify to.

While this method of procuring testimony may not be entirely improper, it is a practice not to be encouraged, where the witness is present in court and ready to testify. Assuming the testimony of Mrs. Wrede as contained in the stipulation as binding under the stipulation upon the parties, we will examine this evidence which it is stipulated she would give, and determine therefrom if it proves or tends to prove actual fraud. Her evidence in this regard is wholly undisputed and must be accepted as true. According to her testimony as stipulated, Acker, the agent of the plaintiff, stated to this witness and her partner that said instruments, taken together, constituted an order for goods, and did not constitute a note, but that the second part of said instrument, now marked "exhibit A," which was attached to "exhibit B," was to represent merely the manner in which the payment for the goods should mature.

If those statements and representations were made by Acker, as the testimony of Mrs. Wrede as stipulated shows, such statements were, under the statute, false and fraudulent representations. Acker must have known that exhibit A, which was attached to exhibit B, was not merely to represent the manner or maturity of payment. He knew that exhibit A constituted a note; he knew that the instruments, taken together, did not constitute an order for goods only, but did constitute an order for goods plus a note. His representations were such, then, as to induce the defendants to believe that the instrument or instruments did not constitute a note, and that there was no note involved in the transaction; his conduct was such as was well fitted to deceive the defendants; his representations were of such character as to amount to the suggestion of a fact of that which is not true. He could not himself have believed it to be true. In other words, he must have had full knowledge of the intent and purpose of the whole contract, both exhibits A and B, and, in view of the representations to which it is stipulated Mrs. Wrede would testify, he must have suppressed the true condition and intent and purpose of both exhibits A and B.

It appears from the stipulation above set forth that, prior to the execution of the instrument in suit, the Donald-Richards Company, through one of its agents, had sold to J. I. Rue, a merchant in Enderlin, North Dakota, goods, wares, and merchandise of the same nature and composition as the articles sold defendants.

This evidence as stipulated supports the allegation of the answer which, in substance, avers that Acker, the agent of the Donald-Richards Company, represented to the defendants that said company sold goods to but one customer or firm in each city, and that defendants would have the exclusive sale of said line of goods in the city of Enderlin; that said representations were false, fraudulent, and untrue, and relied upon by the defendants; and that they were induced thereby to execute the order for said goods, etc.

The copy of exhibits A and B is in evidence. The copy is in the original form,—in other words, in the same condition it was before exhibit A was detached from exhibit B.

When the instrument as a whole is considered in connection with all the circumstances of the case, the false and fraudulent representations pleaded, of which there is competent proof, it may well be considered an object of suspicion. Its arrangement is such as to facilitate the very fraud claimed by defendants. It is such an instrument as could easily be used to deceive the defendants and cause them to sign what was represented to them to be an order, when as a matter of fact the same was a note; part of the instrument when detached became a note. Certainly such an instrument is not one the use of which prevails to any great extent in commercial transactions, and as a whole, and considered in connection with all the other evidence, facts, and circumstances, as well as the pleadings in the case, it is some evidence in support of the fraud and the false and fraudulent representations claimed by the defendants.

Promises and representations such as made by Acker, the agent of the Donald-Richards Company, with the intent to deceive and without intention to fulfil, are fraud. Tamlyn v. Peterson, 15 N. D. 490, 107 N. W. 1081. A statement in the absence of positive knowledge, with intent to deceive, may be fraud. Knowlton v. Schultz, 6 N. D. 417, 71 N. W. 550. The stipulated evidence in the case at bar clearly shows that false and fraudulent representations were made prior to the time of the execution of the alleged contract and note. This being true, neither the alleged contract nor note ever attained a legal existence. They were therefore, as a matter of law, neither executed nor delivered. As stated in the case of Knowlton v. Schultz: "The note having been obtained by fraud, the fraud tainted the whole instrument and destroyed it entirely."

The plaintiff herein, however, seeks shelter under the protecting mantle of the Negotiable Instruments Act. He has neither pleaded, nor proved, nor offered any testimony that he is a purchaser for value, before maturity, without notice, and in good faith. If he were such, it would have been a simple matter to have pleaded it, and equally as simple to have proved it.

The principle was clearly stated in the Tamlyn v. Peterson Case, above cited, that "when fraud in the inception of a negotiable instrument is alleged and proved, the burden is upon the indorsee to prove that he is a purchaser for value, before maturity, without notice, and in good faith."

This principle was first laid down in the case of Vickery v. Burton, 6 N. D. 245, 69 N. W. 193, and again in the case of Knowlton v. Schultz, above cited. Fraud at the inception of the alleged contract and note having been established, the burden shifted to the indorsee, the plaintiff in this case, to prove by fair preponderance of the evidence that he was a good-faith purchaser for value, before maturity, without notice. If he could prove each of these elements, the proof was peculiarly within his power. He had an opportunity to plead and prove the same, and has done neither. It was incumbent upon him in this case to prove his good faith; he did not even testify that he had purchased it in good faith. As was said in the case of Knowlton v. Schultz: "It may be true in this case that the plaintiff bought before maturity, for value, and without notice of any defense, and yet he may not be a purchaser in good faith. He may, when he bought, have had knowledge of facts which excited in his mind such suspicions as to the paper that he feared to make an investigation, lest it would disclose a defense, and therefore he carefully shut his eyes, and bought in the dark. In such a case, he would not be a purchaser in good faith."

This principle was again followed by this court in a very recent case. Sweet v. Anderson, 41 N. D. 375, 170 N. W. 869. In that case, in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Bronson, the following language was used: "A holder in due course of a promissory note must establish his good faith as a matter of law, either by direct and uncontradicted testimony, or by circumstances which show consistently the good faith of his purchase, so that no fair-minded person can draw any other inference therefrom."

It is further contended by the defendants and assigned by them as error that the order and purported note together constituted but one instrument, and that detaching the purported note is a material alteration of the instrument and rendered it void.

It would seem clear that the two instruments should be construed together. Exhibit B was that part of the whole instrument which contained the order for the goods. Exhibit A was, at the time of the procuring of the order in the manner before stated, attached to, and formed a part of, the whole contract. It showed the maturity of the payments; in other words, it was an instalment note attached to the sales contract, was subject to certain conditions or contingencies which appeared in the contract, prominently among which is a special agreement to buy back at the purchase price all the goods in the order remaining on hand at the termination of the agreement if the purchaser so desires, and, if net profits are less than 50 per cent each year for two years, will pay the difference in cash, provided purchaser has kept the goods tastefully displayed for sale in his store, using the advertising system as provided on the reverse side hereof, made payments as agreed, and used reasonable diligence in promoting the sale of goods. There also appeared a warranty as to quality, and the condition under which goods might be exchanged, and the agreement to furnish a bond to protect the purchaser in all the conditions of the sale.

The detaching of the note, thereby making it a negotiable note, and giving to it a new and added value, is a material alteration of the contract, the legal result of which is to avoid the entire contract. It is contended, however, that the Donald-Richards Company was authorized to detach the note by reason of the following words appearing in the contract, which are as follows, to wit: "That the company is authorized to detach the same when this order is approved and shipped." In the case of Stevens v. Venema, 202 Mich. 240, L.R.A.1918F, 1145, 168 N. W. 534, a Michigan case construing the identical words in practically an identical contract, the court used the following language: "This sentence appears in the order just above the perforation for detaching the note, and below the signature in the order. Such expedient only emphasizes the sinister purpose of the combination."

In Toledo Scale Co. v. Gogo, 186 Mich. 442, 152 N. W. 1046, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 601, it appears from an original record that an unsuccessful attempt was made to validate the note for detachment by two provisions in separate places: One stating, "You are authorized to date above-mentioned note at such time as you may elect to insert such date, either prior to or after the execution of such note," and the other, near the close of the instrument, that the signing or delivering of instalment note shall not be deemed or considered a payment or waiver of any term, provision, or condition of this contract. That opinion then further states: "We regard the decision in that case as well in point and controlling here." We are satisfied that the detaching of the alleged note from the contract was a material alteration of the contract, and the following abundantly sustained that conclusion: Ibid.; Stevens v. Venema, above cited, as well as the following cases: Stevens v. Pearson, 138 Minn. 72, 163 N. W. 769; Bank of Evansville v. Kurth, 167 Wis. 43, 166 N. W. 658; Harrison v. Grier, 198 Mich. 672, 165 N. W. 854; Love-land v. Bump, 198 Mich. 564, 165 N. W. 855.

The plaintiff claims that fraud has not been shown, and that it is not shown that the note in question was executed and delivered at the time of the false and fraudulent representations. In this claim there is no merit. So far as the testimony is concerned, there is no showing that Edwin Acker, the agent of the Donald-Richards Company, ever had any negotiations with the defendant except the time when the contract and note were procured. The only inference from the testimony that can be drawn is that the contract and note in question were signed at about the time, and after, the false and fraudulent representations were made. If they were made at any other time, the burden was upon the plaintiff to so show, and he has not done so.

The question of the delivery of the goods or articles to the defendants is not, by any means, in this case, a controlling one; it is not really an issue in the case. It is only material, if at all, to show the good faith of the indorsee. He has wholly failed to show by a preponderance of evidence his good faith.

The principal questions in this case are:

(1) Were the contract and note procured by false and fraudulent representations? We think they were, and, being so procured, there was no legal execution or delivery of them.

(2) Was the indorsee a purchaser in good faith, for value, without notice? We think he was not. At least, the proof does not so show; he has failed to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence.

(3) Was the contract altered? The evidence is ample and sufficient to show that the alleged contract and note were procured by false and fraudulent representations, and thereafter were materially altered; and for that reason are of no legal effect.

The judgment appealed from is reversed. The plaintiff's action should be dismissed, and the District Court should enter an order to that effect. The case is remanded to the District Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

The defendants are entitled to statutory costs on appeal.

Birdzell, J., dissenting (December 6, 1919):

The deposition of G. S. Krouth of Iowa City shows that he is cashier of the Iowa City State Bank; that on behalf of the bank he took the note in question before maturity as collateral security for a loan made to the Donald-Richards Company; and that at the time he took it he had no knowledge whatever of the transaction between the Donald-Richards Company and the defendants, and no knowledge of any defenses. Stevens, the plaintiff, who also testified by deposition, stated that he took up the loan of the Donald-Richards Company at the bank, paying the full cash consideration; also, that he obtained the note in suit as collateral and became the owner of both notes. M. H. Taylor, the assistant manager of the Donald-Richards Company, in his deposition, testified that the goods for which the note was given were shipped to the defendants, and that the defendants have never returned them, or any portion thereof, nor offered to do so. No evidence was offered on the part of the defendants to dispute the testimony of Taylor with reference to the goods; nor was there any testimony given or offered with reference to any damages incident to any alleged fraudulent representations; nor did the defendants attempt to make any showing that a rescission had either been made or attempted. In this state of the record, it seems to us that no defense was made out which would defeat the right of the plaintiff, if he be considered merely the assignee of the purchase-price obligation signed by the defendants, and that it is immaterial whether the instrument in suit be regarded as negotiable or not.

The testimony for the plaintiff is nearly all in the shape of depositions, which accounts for the fact that it embraces questions and answers going to establish good faith out of the regular order of proof. The evidence for the defendant, with the exception of five preliminary questions and answers in connection with the examination of the witness,

Mrs. Wrede, consists of a stipulation as to what Mrs. Wrede would testify to. Accepting as facts all that it is stipulated she would testify to, there would, in our opinion, be lacking proof of facts sufficient to constitute a defense as hereinbefore indicated.

a. Under law merchant.

In some cases the position has been taken that when any valid defense, good as between immediate parties, is shown to exist, the holder must show that he is a bona fide holder. Chambers v. Falkner (1880) 65 Ala. 448. The court in Bunting v. Mick (1892) 5 Ind. App. 289, 31 N. E. 378, says: "The law is undoubtedly well settled in this state that if the holder of paper negotiable by the law merchant, and to which the maker has a valid defense, relies upon the fact that he is a bona fide holder thereof for value, the burden is upon him to aver and prove that he obtained such paper before maturity, without notice of the equities or defenses of the maker, and that he paid a valuable consideration therefor." While the rule is thus stated broadly by the court, the defense in this action was that the payee procured the note from the maker "by means of certain fraudulent representations going to the consideration." It seems probable that the court's statement of the rule was in view of this defense; at least, it seems clear from other cases in this jurisdiction that the broad rule that any defense, good as against the payee, casts upon the holder the burden of showing that he is a bona fide holder, does not prevail. It is believed that the theory that any defense destroys the presumption of bona fides rests upon a fundamental error. The character of bona fide holder, or holder in due course, need be invoked only when there is some defense good as between immediate parties; there is use for the presumption, therefore, only when there is some defense. If, therefore, the showing of any defense destroys the presumption, it is destroyed in every case in which there is any use for it. The manifest result of this theory is to destroy the usefulness of the presumption altogether. However this may be, it is apparent that in any case that adheres to the theory a showing of fraud would destroy the presumption of bona fides, not because of its character as fraud, but because it is a defense as between the immediate parties.

Fraud is of various kinds, and may be such as to vitiate entirely the instrument, even in the hands of a bona fide holder. Under some statutes the defense of fraud is good as against a bona fide holder. Hubbard v. Rankin (1873) 71 Ill. 129; Hewitt v. Jones (1874) 72 Ill. 218. This statute is again referred to in Mann v. Merchants' Loan & T. Co. (1902) 100 Ill. App. 224, and in Kennedy v. Jones (1901) — Miss. —, 29 So. 819. If the fraud is such as to render the note void even in the hands of a holder in due course, or bona fide holder, the question annotated herein does not arise, and cases dealing with such fraud have been excluded. The present annotation is concerned with the evidentiary question which arises when, in an action on a note by a subsequent holder, there is shown fraud in the inception such as is a defense as between the immediate parties and those with notice, but which does not avoid the note as against the holder in due course.

Both under the law merchant and under the Negotiable Instruments Act, it appears that, according to the practically uniform line of authorities, when there is shown to have been fraud in the inception of an instrument, the presumption that the plaintiff is a holder in due course is destroyed, and he must then establish his character as a holder in due course by proof.

Taking up, first, the cases decided prior to the Negotiable Instruments Act, it appears that the rule just stated is supported by a multitude of authorities.

In addition to the foregoing cases there are others that recognize the above rule. In Brown v. James (1896) 2 App. Div. 105, 37 N. Y. Supp. 529, an action by a creditor against the accommodation indorser of his debtor's note, the burden was held to be on the plaintiff, upon proof that the debtor represented to the indorser, in order to obtain the indorsement, that he desired the note for another purpose. The holder of a note issued by an agent under an apparent authority, but in fraud of his principal, can recover of the principal only on showing that he took the note for value, before maturity, and bona fide. Camden Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Abbott (1882) 44 N. J. L. 257. Proof by the accommodation indorser of a note that the maker fraudulently inserted the name of a payee other than the name intended by the accommodation indorser casts upon the payee the burden of proving that he is a holder in good faith, and for value. Kirchoff v. Goezlin (1889) 30 Ill. App. 190. It is recognized in Draper v. Cowles (1882) 27 Kan. 484, that the above "may be" the rule. Where the principal maker of a note perpetrated a fraud upon a surety thereon, the payee must show that he had no knowledge of the fraud. Bank of Monroe v. Anderson Bros. Min. & R. Co. (1885) 65 Iowa, 692, 22 N. W. 929. In an action upon a partnership note executed by one of the partners after the dissolution of the firm, the burden was held to be upon a holder thereof to show his bona fides, in Second Nat. Bank v. Weston (1900) 161 N. Y. 520, 76 Am. St. Rep. 283, 55 N. E. 1080. See infra, V. b, for fraud by partners. A bank which discounts a check drawn by the vice president of another bank, the certification of which was fraudulently made, has the burden of proving its bona fides. Detroit Nat. Bank v. Union Trust Co. (1906) 145 Mich. 656, 116 Am. St. Rep. 319, 108 N. W. 1092. The holder of drafts, the acceptance of which has been obtained by fraud, has the burden of showing that he is the bona fide holder. Stouffer v. Fletcher (1906) 146 Mich. 341, 109 N. W. 684; Stouffer v. Clark (1906) 140 Mich. 345, 109 N. W. 685. The payee of bank drafts which were fraudulently filled in by a bank clerk, after they had been signed in blank, and intrusted to him by the cashier, was held to have the burden of showing that he had no notice of the fraud, in Clifford Bkg. Co. v. Donovan Commission Co. (1905) 195 Mo. 262, 94 S. W. 527. It is stated in the headnote to Hillebrant v. Ainsworth (1857) 18 Tex. 307, that, upon proof of fraud in the inception of a note, it would seem that it is not necessary, in the first instance, for the defendant to prove further that the plaintiff, an indorsee, had notice, or received the note without paying value therefor, but that it devolves on the plaintiff to show that the note came into his hands in the regular course of trade, before due, for value. The apparent assumption in Battles v. Laudenslager (1877) 84 Pa. 446, that the defendant must produce evidence of knowledge of fraud on the part of the plaintiff, seems to have been a mere accidental statement in a case in which the main question was one of the sufficiency of evidence to justify the court in submitting the question as to the plaintiff's knowledge to the jury. The Pennsylvania cases are not altogether clear upon the question whether fraud in the inception or negotiation of a note casts upon the plaintiff the burden of showing his absence of knowledge of fraud, or whether this burden rests upon the defendant. It may be that the assumption in Battles v. Laudenslager is referable to the rule that the burden still rests upon the defendant. Although, in Camden Nat. Bank v. Fries-Breslin Co. (1906) 214 Pa. 395, 63 Atl. 1022, the court states that, if the note was procured by fraud, the holder "would be put to proof of consideration that it had acted fairly, paid value, and had no notice of the alleged fraud." The court in Smith v. Popular Loan &

Bldg. Asso. (1880) 93 Pa. 19, says that where a negotiable note was obtained from the maker under false pretenses, and fraudulently put into circulation by the payee, the holder of the note, in order to recover, must show a purchase for value, before maturity, "without notice of the fraud." And it is regarded as the well-settled law of Pennsylvania in Reeper v. Greevy (1897) 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 316, 40 W. N. C. 494, that, after the defendant has introduced proof that the note in suit was obtained fraudulently, the burden is shifted upon the plaintiff to show "that he had obtained the note without notice of the fraud, for a valuable consideration."

The burden of showing that the holder had notice of the defense was held to be upon the maker in Cochran v. Priddy (1908) 49 Tex. Civ. App. 39, 107 S. W. 616, by virtue of an agreement entered into at the time of trial, by which the maker admitted the holder's cause of action save only in event that he could establish his defense of fraud.

In Griffin v. Boyd (1898) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 46 S. W. 664, a charge to the jury was given by the trial court as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence in the case that the note sued on was originally procured from the defendants by fraud, or under circumstances that raise a suspicion of fraud—if the jury so believe—then the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that he acquired the note bona fide for value, in the usual course of business, while current, and under circumstances which create no presumption that he knew the facts which impeach its validity; and a failure so to do will entitle the defendants to a verdict." This charge was held erroneous, but the court does not point out the error.

Although the defendant in Swift v. Tyson (1842) 16 Pet. (U. S.) 1, 10 L. ed. 865, offered to prove that the bill in question was accepted upon fraudulent representations by the payee, the court, after saying that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder, says that there is no doubt that the holder of any negotiable paper before it is due is not bound to prove that he is the bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, without notice, for the law will presume that he is such, in the absence of all rebutting proof. Apparently, however, Story, J., who rendered the opinion in that case, was not considering the effect of the fraud as an evidentiary question.

This rule has been applied in an equitable action to cancel an obligation thus obtained by fraud. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Ohio Valley Improv. & Contract Co. (1893) 57 Fed. 42, affirmed in (1899) 174 U. S. 552, 43 L. ed. 1081, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817; Mills v. Keep (1912) 197 Fed. 360.

The action in Sullivan v. Langley (1876) 120 Mass. 437, was in tort by the maker of the note, against the payee and his indorsees, for fraudulently inducing the plaintiff to give his note and an assignment of a savings-bank book, it being alleged that the indorsees were liable for aiding and abetting the payee.

That the burden is on a subsequent transferee to show that he is a bona fide holder was held in Breckinridge v. Moore (1843) 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 629, an action by the maker of a note against whom a judgment had been rendered, to obtain an injunction against the judgment.

b. Under Negotiable Instruments Act.

The Negotiable Instruments Act provides in § 59: "Every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as a holder in due course. But the last-mentioned rule does not apply in favor of a party who became bound on the instrument prior to the acquisition of such defective title."

According to § 55, "the title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective within the meaning of this act when he obtains the instrument, or any signature thereto, by fraud, duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud."

The plain provisions of the act have been applied, and the duty is held to rest upon the holder to show that he is a holder in due course, when fraud in the inception is shown.

In Altschul v. Rogers (1912) 22 Idaho, 512, 126 Pac. 1048, where the burden of proof was held to have been shifted to a subsequent holder, it seems that the subsequent holder himself had actual notice of the fraud.

In Keegan v. Rock (1905) 128 Iowa, 39, 102 N. W. 805, an action by the assignee of a mortgage, title to which had been obtained by the assignor through fraud, the court says that the plaintiff had the burden of proving that he acquired title as a holder in due course—that is, in good faith, and for value, and without notice, under the Negotiable Instruments Act.

The holder of a note obtained by duress was held to have the burden of showing that he was a holder in due course, in Phillips v. Eldridge (1915) 221 Mass. 103, 108 N. E. 909.

The holder of a note which was given upon the purchase of a saloon and the stock therein has, upon proof that the vendor fraudulently removed a large part of the stock before delivery to the purchaser, the burden of showing that he had no knowledge of the fraud. Goldberg v. Berg (1916) 93 Misc. 498, 157 N. Y. Supp. 209.

Where an agent deposited money belonging to his principal in a bank in his own name, and subsequently obtained a cashier's check from the bank with intent to embezzle and misappropriate the plaintiff's money so deposited, the agent's title to the check thus obtained was held in Singer Mfg. Co. v. Summers (1906) 143 N. C. 102, 55 S. E. 522, to be defective, so as to cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides.

Evidence that a note was executed upon a condition that was never fulfilled throws upon the holder thereof the burden of showing his bona fides. Raleigh Bkg. & T. Co. v. Clark (1916) 172 N. C. 268, 90 S. E. 200.

The transferee of a note which had been paid was held to have the burden of showing his bona fides, in Baade v. Cramer (1919) 278 Mo. 516, 213 S. W. 121.

In Hoeley v. South Side Bank (1920) 280 Mo. 336, 217 S. W. 504, the holder of a note was held to have the burden of showing his bona fides, where the note was executed under the following circumstances: An agent employed to purchase property, being furnished with the money therefor, made the purchase and had the property conveyed to a "straw man," who executed a note secured by a mortgage on the property, subsequently the property was conveyed by the "straw man" to the principal, and, without her knowledge, the conveyance was made subject to the encumbrance.

The note involved in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Wadsworth (1911) 166 Mich. 528, 131 N. W. 1108, was given after the Negotiable Instruments Act was adopted in that state. In adhering to the general rule that the burden was thrown upon a subsequent holder by a showing of fraud by the maker, the court makes no reference to the Negotiable Instruments Act.

Although the note involved in Central Nat. Bank v. Ericson (1912) 92 Neb. 396, 138 N. W. 563, seems to have been given after the Negotiable Instruments Law went into effect in that state, the court, in holding the burden of showing his bona fides cast upon a subsequent holder by a showing of fraud in the inception of the note, makes no reference to the statute.

Nor is the Negotiable Instruments Law referred to in connection with the burden of proof in People's Trust & Sav. Bank v. Rork (1914) 96 Neb. 415, 148 N. W. 95, although the note involved in that case seemed to have been given after the Negotiable Instruments Law was enacted. It is there held, in accord with the general rule, that upon a showing of fraud the burden is upon the subsequent holder to show his good faith.

It has been stated that the Negotiable Instruments Act does not change the rule of the law merchant as to the burden of proof, where fraud is shown, or where the title of the person negotiating the instrument is defective. Desharzo v. Lamar (1920) — Ala. —, 85 So. 586; Parsons v. Utica Cement Mfg. Co. (1909) 82 Conn. 333, 135 Am. St. Rep. 278, 73 Atl. 785; Downs v. Horton (1919) — Mo. App. —, 209 S. W. 595; Mechanics Sav. Bank v. Feeney (1919) — N. H. —, 108 Atl. 295; Sutherland v. Mead (1903) 80 App. Div. 103, 80 N. Y. Supp. 504; Mitchell v. Baldwin (1903) 88 App. Div. 265, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1043.

Fraud in the inception of a note results in a defective title, within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law. Ensign v. Crandall (1921) 207 Mo. App. 211, 231 S. W. 675.

The title of the payee of a partnership note executed by one of the partners to raise money to pay his individual contribution to the partnership, the payee having knowledge thereof, is defective within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law so as to cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. Lucker v. Iba (1900) 54 App. Div. 566, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1019.

Likewise, under the English and Canadian Bills of Exchange Acts, where an instrument is shown to be fraudulent, the burden of proving his bona fides rests upon a holder. Oakley v. Boulton (1888) 57 Times L. R. (Eng.) 60; Farmer v. Ellis (1901) 2 Ont. L. Rep. 544; Ridgeway v. Dancesrean (1899) Rap. Jud. Quebec 17 C. S. 176; Nicholson v. McKale (1912) Rap. Jud. Quebec 41 C. S. 340, 5 D. L. R. 237; Kern v. Tambllyn (1914) 7 Sask. L. R. 64, 16 D. L. R. 529, 27 West. L. R. 608; Merchants Bank v. McLeod (1910) 14 West. L. R. (Can.) 461 (rule recognized); Merchants Bank v. Grimshaw (1904) 4 Ont. West. Rep. 179. Others of the Canadian cases cited above were decided after the Bill of Exchange Act was adopted, but there is no reference to the act in those cases.

That the assignee of a note has the burden of showing his bona fides was held in Lundean v. Hamilton (1916) — Iowa, —, 159 N. W. 163, in an action in equity to cancel the note and the mortgage securing it.

An early statute in Georgia, referred to in Robenson v. Vason (1867) 37 Ga. 66, provided that "the holder of a note is presumed to be such bona fide and for value; if either fact is negated by proof the defendants are let in to all their defenses; such presumption is negated by proof of any fraud in the procurement of the note."

c. Contra decisions.

In Georgia, the presumption of bona fides which arises in favor of the holder of an instrument negotiable by delivery is rebutted by a showing of procurement in fraud of the rights of a previous holder. Merchants' & P. Nat. Bank v. Masonic Hall (1879) 62 Ga. 271. The rule of Merchants' & P. Nat. Bank v. Masonic Hall (1879) 62 Ga. 272, was followed in Walden v. Downing Co. (1908) 4 Ga. App. 534, 61 S. E. 1127, in the case of a note which was transferred by indorsement. This case is, of course, overruled by the decision in Brantley v. Merchants & F. Bank (Ga.) infra.

But the presumption of bona fides which arises in favor of an indorsee of an instrument is not so rebutted. Brantley v. Merchants & F. Bank (1918) 22 Ga. App. 667, 97 S. E. 109, affirmed in (1919) 149 Ga. 88, 99 S. E. 41. That the presumption is not rebutted by a showing that the note was fraudulently taken possession of by the cashier of the payee bank is stated, also, in Harrell v. National Bank (1907) 128 Ga. 504, 57 S. E. 869, where the court, after referring to the fact that the subsequent holder in that case offered evidence to show that he had purchased the note in good faith in the usual course of business, for a valuable consideration, before due, without notice of any dishonor, says: "It [the subsequent holder] could have relied upon the presumption afforded by the Code section above quoted, and required of the defendant proof that it was not a bona fide holder in order to defeat its right to recover." In Brantley v. Merchants & F. Bank (1918) 22 Ga. App. 667, 97 S. E. 109, affirmed in (1919) 149 Ga. 88, 99 S. E. 41, the reasoning by which the court arrives at this conclusion is as follows: The Code of Georgia contains the following provision: "The holder of a note is presumed to be such bona fide and for value; if either fact is negated by proof, the defendants are let in to all their defenses; such presumption is negated by proof of any fraud in the procurement of the note." It has uniformly been held in this state that "fraud in the procurement," as used in this statute, means fraud in the procurement of the note by the holder thereof, and has no reference to fraud in the contract out of which the note arose, or fraud of an intervening indorser. The Georgia Code contains no such provision as is contained in the Negotiable Instruments Act set out in § IV. b, supra, and the court argues: "Since the only rule upon the subject which it does contain appears to so plainly contemplate that the legal presumptions in favor of the holder shall continue to hold in his favor until combated by proof,—not that the original payee or an intervening indorser fraudulently obtained the note, but that the holder himself did,—we are disinclined to recognize any extension of the exception to this rule further than that literally prescribed by the language of the decision in the Merchants' & P. Nat. Bank Case. There would seem, in fact, to be a rational ground for distinction between a case where the holder comes into possession of an instrument capable of being passed merely by delivery, and where the holder comes into possession thereof by virtue of the solemn indorsement of the payee therein named. In the former case there is nothing except naked possession to indicate that the holder took it in good faith; whereas, in a case where the payee has entered his solemn indorsement thereon and thereby guaranteed its validity to subsequent transferees, there exists this manifest additional reason, as shown by the face of the instrument, whereby the subsequent taker should be held as having acted in good faith."

It is expressly denied in Morgan v. Yarborough (1839) 13 La. 74, 83 Am. Dec. 553, that the form of the transfer makes any difference as to the burden of proof.

There is a suggestion in Kelly v. Ford (1856) 4 Iowa, 140, and Clapp v. Cedar County (1857) 5 Iowa, 15, 68 Am. Dec. 678, that the presumption of bona fides is not rebutted by showing fraud; but in Lane v. Krekle (1867) 22 Iowa, 399, the Iowa court aligned itself with the majority rule, and, although there may be a slight implication to the contrary from the form of a part of an instruction to which the court's attention was not directed, in Lake v. Reed (1870) 29 Iowa, 258, 4 Am. Rep. 209, and also in Loomis v. Metcalf (1870) 30 Iowa, 382, in Woodward v. Rodgers (1871) 31 Iowa, 342, the court again announced the majority rule, and, with the exception of a case briefly reported in an appendix (Billingsly v. Craddock (1891) 82 Iowa, 721, 47 N. W. 893), has consistently adhered thereto. In Callendar Sav. Bank v. Loos (1909) 142 Iowa, 1, 120 N. W. 317, where there was an attempt to show duress in the procurement of a note, the court says it was incumbent on the maker to show that the indorsee was not an innocent purchaser of the note. This statement was made casually and without any discussion.

In the early case of Howard v. Shaw (1846) 9 Ir. L. Rep. 335, the view is taken that the indorsee of a note need not show his bona fide character until he is shown to have had notice of the fraud.

Apart from these few cases, the authorities are unanimous, as above stated, that fraud in the inception of a negotiable instrument casts upon one who claims to be a bona fide holder, or holder thereof in due course, the burden of proving his character as such.

II. Instrument fraudulently put in circulation.

In dealing with cases in which a note or other negotiable instrument was diverted or put into circulation fraudulently, this annotation has been confined to cases in which the instrument had no prior inception. Cases involving the theft of negotiable instruments from the holder thereof, or diversion by an agent or person intrusted with the physical possession of the instrument after its inception, have in general been excluded. The decision in Knight v. Pugh (1842) 4 Watts & S. (Pa.) 445, 89 Am. Dec. 99, illustrates the diversion of a note after inception, a class of cases excluded from this annotation. In that case a note was given for the purchase price of land which the vendor covenanted to convey to the purchaser by deed of general warranty. After the agreement, a judgment was obtained against the vendor which became a lien on the land, and no conveyance of the land was made, and the encumbrances prevented the owner from making good title. The maker pleaded these facts and added that no consideration therefor passed to the maker from the vendor for the note, and that its "transfer to the plaintiff was a fraud on defendant." In holding that the plaintiff did not have the burden of showing consideration (which seemed to be the only point of dispute in this case), the court says: "In cases other than those of negotiable notes obtained or put in circulation by fraud or undue means, the maker, by its negotiable character, agrees that the payee shall put it in circulation. He has no right, therefore, to complain of his own act, and a holder placing confidence in such paper ought not to be compelled to prove consideration. In many cases it would be exceedingly difficult to do so, and to require it would throw a serious impediment in the way of the circulation of negotiable paper. It is otherwise where there is fraud, because there the maker gives no such authority. He is in the light of an unfortunate rather than an imprudent man, and protection will be given to him so far as to require of the holder proof of a valuable consideration." Commenting on the facts of the case at bar, the court says: "Here the note was negotiable. It was to the order of Jackson without defalcation. Knight gave it on a contract deliberately made, and Jackson was authorized to pass it by indorsement. There is no suspicion cast on the means by which Jackson got it. It was all fair and according to contract. The indorsement was according to the tenor of the note, and to require a holder in such a case to prove the consideration would, we think, be putting a cloud on the circulation of negotiable securities which would tend to impair their use and employment."

Within the limits above indicated, it is a rule adhered to in a large number of cases, both prior to the Negotiable Instruments Act and under that act, that, where a note is put in circulation or diverted in fraud of the maker's rights, the burden is upon the holder to show his bona fide character.

Likewise, under the English Bills of Exchange Act, the burden of proving that he is a holder in due course rests upon the holder, when fraud in the negotiation of the instrument is shown. Tatam v. Hasler (1889) 5 Times L. R. (Eng.) 593, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 432, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 345, 38 Week. Rep. 109.

In Union Trust Co. v. McClellan (1895) 40 W. Va. 405, 21 S. E. 1025, it is stated to be the settled rule of commercial law that where an accommodation note, given for a specific purpose, is indorsed and used by the payee for an entirely different purpose without the knowledge or consent of the maker, the burden of proof is on the holder of such note to show that he received it in the ordinary course of business, before maturity, for a valuable consideration and without notice of its misuse by the payee, before he can recover from the maker.

According to the court in Kinney v. Kruse (1871) 28 Wis. 183, the fraudulent putting in circulation of a negotiable instrument which operates to change the burden of proof and call upon the plaintiff to prove his title as a bona fide holder is where this is done fraudulently as to the defendant or maker, and not where it is done as to the payee or some intermediate holder or party to the paper.

In Perrin v. Noyes (1855) 39 Me. 384, 63 Am. Dec. 633, the holder of a note was held to have the burden of showing his bona fides in an action thereon against the maker, where evidence was introduced to show that the note was intended as collateral security for paper held by the plaintiff against a party for whose accommodation the note was given, and that it was fraudulently negotiated absolutely, and not for the specific purpose.

Seemingly the burden of proof was thrown upon a subsequent holder in Market & F. Nat. Bank v. Sargent (1893) 85 Me. 349, 35 Am. St. Rep. 376, 27 Atl. 192, where it appeared that the note was executed by the maker in blank and intrusted to one who exceeded his authority in filling up and transferring it. It is not altogether clear, however, that the facts in this case called for a decision on this point.

Fraud in procuring an accommodation note from the payee thereof was held to cast upon the subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides, in Hart v. Potter (1855) 4 Duer (N. Y.) 458 (an action against the maker).

An accommodation note procured from an indorser on the representation that the parties thereto would be the same as those to a note of which the note in question was to be a renewal, and that in violation of this agreement the note was fraudulently filled in without obtaining certain parties who were on the original note, shows a defective title so as to cast upon the subsequent holder the burden of proving that he is a holder in due course. Sproul v. Beskin (1917) 179 App. Div. 275, 166 N. Y. Supp. 606. See (1921) — App. Div. —, 189 N. Y. Supp. 956, for later proceedings in this case.

The holder of a note which is obtained by the payee without any consideration whatever, and by him transferred fraudulently, without authority, and contrary to the express protest of the maker, has the burden of establishing his bona fides. Williams v. Huntington (1888) 68 Md. 590, 6 Am. St. Rep. 477, 13 Atl. 336.

The diversion of a note by the payee from the purpose for which it was given seems to have been regarded in Gwyn v. Lee (1849) 1 Md. Ch. 445, as casting the burden upon a subsequent holder of showing his bona fides.

The holder of a note which was procured by a member of a partnership to be made to his firm as accommodation paper, and transferred by him, for his sole benefit, in the partnership name, must show that he received the note bona fide and for a valuable consideration. Bank of St. Albans v. Gilliland (1840) 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 311, 35 Am. Dec. 566.

That the holder of an accommodation note which has been diverted to some purpose other than that for which it was given must show himself to be a bona fide holder is stated in Schepp v. Carpenter (1873) 51 N. Y. 602. In Comstock v. Hier (1878) 73 N. Y. 270, 29 Am. Rep. 142, an action involving an accommodation note, it is stated that, if the note has been wrongfully diverted from its purpose and fraudulently negotiated, the party suing on it is bound to show himself a bona fide possessor.

Where an accommodation note was delivered to a person in order to have it discounted at a bank, and such person, instead of offering it at the bank, put it in the hands of a broker for sale, and neither the maker nor the payee received any consideration for the note, the holder is bound to show himself a bona fide holder. Woodhull v. Holmes (1813) 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 231. A showing that a bill was drawn for the defendant's accommodation and intrusted by him to another to get it discounted, and that such other, in violation of his trust, indorsed it to a third party without accounting for the proceeds, was also held, in Smith v. Braine (1851) 16 Q. B. 244, 117 Eng. Reprint, 872, 20 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 201, 15 Jur. 287, to cast upon the holder the burden of showing his bona fides. It is said that the evidence was such as might reasonably have led to the inference that when the party intrusted with the bill obtained possession thereof, although he promised to discount it and pay the proceeds for the benefit of the drawer, he meant from the beginning to misappropriate it to his own use.

Evidence that a note was delivered as an escrow, and that it was fraudulently put in circulation, casts upon a holder thereof the burden of proving that he came fairly by the note and paid value for it. Vallett v. Parker (1831) 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 615.

The burden was cast upon the holder to prove consideration in Hall v. Featherstone (1858) 3 Hurlst. & N. 234, 157 Eng. Reprint, 478, 27 L. J. Exch. N. S. 308, 4 Jur. N. S. 813, 6 Week. Rep. 496, where a bill was indorsed and delivered by the indorser to another to have discounted, and such other failed to account for the proceeds.

The holder of a corporate note, or bond, which was fraudulently put into circulation by an agent of the corporation intrusted therewith, was held to have the burden of proving his bona fide character, in Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Best (1887) 105 N. Y. 59, 11 N. E. 146, an action by the maker to recover the note.

The diversion of a note indorsed by a firm was held to cast upon the holder the burden of showing his bona fides in an action against the indorser. Smith v. Weston (1899) 159 N. Y. 194, 54 N. E. 38.

Where the maker of a note executed a renewal and sent it to the payee upon the assumption that the payee still held the original note, and, upon discovering that he did not, settled with the actual holder and took up the original note, and secured the promise of the payee to return the renewal, the negotiation of such renewal by the payee amounts to a fraudulent diversion of the note which casts upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. McCammon v. Schantz (1900) 49 App. Div. 460, 63 N. Y. Supp. 611.

The inclusion by the payee of notes, on making an additional loan to the maker, of the amount of the old notes, and the amount of the new loan in a new note, and his promise to cancel and return the old notes, when in fact one of them, at least, had been transferred by him, was treated as such fraud as cast the burden upon the subsequent indorsee in Ford v. Ott (1919) — Iowa, —, 173 N. W. 121. The court, however, seems to have regarded as an essential to the existence of fraud, the representation, either expressed, or implied from the promise to surrender the note, that the payee still had the note.

But see First Nat. Bank v. Getz (1895) 96 Iowa, 139, 64 N. W. 799, infra, V. d.

Proof by the payee of a note, who had indorsed it and had neglected to strike his name off the note when it was returned to the maker upon payment, and who, upon discovering this neglect, sent immediately to have it done and was told by the maker that the note had been destroyed, when in fact it was put in circulation by the drawer fraudulently, of these facts, casts upon the plaintiff the burden of proving the manner in which he came into the possession of the note, and what he paid for it. Holme v. Karsper (1813) 5 Binn. (Pa.) 469.

In Mendenhall v. Ulrich (1905) 94 Minn. 100, 101 N. W. 1057, a note was given to a life insurance agent under an agreement that it was to be left at a designated bank until a life insurance policy was procured by the agent, and submitted to the maker for his inspection, whereupon the maker was to have the right to accept or reject the policy, and in case he rejected it the note should be of no force or effect whatever. The life insurance agent fraudulently put the note in circulation, instead of placing it in the bank in accordance with the agreement.

In State Bank v. Missia (1920) 144 Minn. 410, 175 N. W. 614, notes were executed by the purchaser of land under an agreement that the vendor should hold them until title to the land should be vested in the purchaser, and in case title did not vest it was agreed that the cash paid and the notes were to be returned to the purchaser. The notes had been executed in blank, and were completed by the vendor and negotiated in fraud of this agreement. It was also found that the original transaction was entered into by the vendor with intent to defraud the purchaser.

The negotiation of a note in violation of an agreement that, if the maker at any time within one year from said date desired to cancel a water right for which the note was given, he should have the right to do so and have the note returned to him, was held to be fraud, casting upon a subsequent holder the duty of showing his character as a holder in due course under the Negotiable Instruments Law, in Shellenberger v. Nourse (1911) 20 Idaho, 323, 118 Pac. 508.

The transfer of a note in violation of an agreement that it would be returned if the property for which it was given did not give satisfaction was held to be a fraud which cast upon the transferee the burden of showing that he took the note in good faith, which includes proof that he paid full value for it, in Pierson v. Huntington (1909) 82 Vt. 482, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 695, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1029, 74 Atl. 88.

The failure of the payee of notes, executed under an agreement that the maker could elect to cancel the same under certain circumstances, and have the notes returned to him, to return the notes upon the maker's exercising such election, was held to make the payee's title defective within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Act, in Dunn v. Block (1915) 192 Ill. App. 486.

The fraudulent negotiation of a note which has been executed by the maker upon the express condition that the person who obtained its execution was to hold the same until the payee named in the note, a corporation, was duly incorporated and had issued stock to be placed on the market for sale, and upon the delivery to the maker of twenty shares of stock the said person was to deliver said note to the corporation, was held to cast the burden upon a subsequent holder, where the corporation was never organized, never became a corporation or had any legal existence whatever, and the maker never received any stock of the company for the note, which was payable to the corporation, was indorsed with the corporate name, followed by that of the person who had obtained it, signing himself as president. Union Trust Co. v. Adams (1913) 54 Ind. App. 166, 101 N. E. 741.

The negotiation of notes by the payee, after the contract in consideration of which the notes were given was canceled and an agreement entered into that the notes should be returned, makes the title of the payee defective within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law, so as to throw upon a subsequent holder the burden of proving that he is a holder in due course. Re Philpott (1915) 169 Iowa, 555, 151 N. W. 825, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 839.

The delivery as a binding instrument of a note which was executed only for the purpose of evidencing certain transactions between the payee and maker is such fraud as casts upon a subsequent holder the duty of showing his bona fides. Sperry v. Spaulding (1873) 45 Cal. 544. In this case the note in question was given under an agreement that the payee should not put it into circulation, and that it should never be used by him excepting only as evidence to sustain an assignment of certain notes, accounts, and bills receivable which the payee had assigned to the maker for collection, should a suit be brought by the creditors of the payee to set aside the assignment, and that the notes should be surrendered after the maker had accounted with the payee for the proceeds of the notes, accounts, and bills receivable.

Representations by an agent for jewelry, who had obtained an order from a merchant that drafts signed by the merchant were merely memoranda for the use of his firm and would not pass out of the hands of the firm, and were to be paid only as sales of jewelry were actually made, that if at any time the maker desired to ship the jewelry he should have the privilege of doing so, and the draft would thereupon be returned to him,—representations which were not true and the promises of which were not kept,—were held to show such a defective title in the payee as to amount to fraud, and cast upon the holder the burden of showing that he was a holder in due course under the Negotiable Instruments Law. McChesney v. Guernsey (1915) 61 Pa. Super. Ct. 490.

Where a draft drawn and accepted by the local agent of an insurance company in payment of premiums was indorsed, apparently for his accommodation, by the defendant, and sent to a general agent to enable him to have the paper discounted and deduct his commission, but while the draft was still in the general agent's hands, the maker, learning that the insurance company was insolvent, instructed the acceptor not to pay the draft, and demanded its return from the general agent, who promised to return it, and, upon the indorser's request to have his name erased from the draft, the general agent promised to do so, but instead of doing so circulated the draft, the court held that the draft was put into circulation in fraud of the indorser, and thus the burden of showing that he gave value was cast upon a subsequent holder, in Keystone Bank v. Rollins (1874) 1 W. N. C. (Pa.) 5.

The delivery of a note signed by several sureties, without compliance with a condition that other sureties should sign the note, is such fraud as destroys the presumption of the bona fide character of a subsequent holder. Tabor v. Merchants Nat. Bank (1886) 48 Ark. 454, 3 Am. St. Rep. 241, 3 S. W. 805.

Where it has been shown that an instrument has been delivered in violation of the terms of an escrow agreement, the burden is on the holder to show his character as a holder in due course. Deshazo v. Lamar (1920) — Ala. App. —, 85 So. 586. This is true under the Negotiable Instruments Act. Ibid.

As to an unlawful diversion, see

Hale v. Shannon (1890) 57 Hun, 466, 32 N. Y. S. R. 1079, 11 N. Y. Supp. 129.

A contrary decision in Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Ertell (1890) 31 N. Y. S. R. 256, that a showing of diversion of a note does not cast upon the holder the burden of showing his bona fides, is based upon a previous New York case which was dealing with the failure of consideration.

The action in J. Regester's Sons Co. v. Reed (1904) 185 Mass. 226, 70 N. E. 53, was one in equity by the maker, to obtain possession of the note from the holders.

In Walbutton v. Lenthall (1848) 12 L. T. (Eng.) 275, an action by the indorsee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor, in which the defendant pleaded that the bill had been accepted without consideration for the purpose of being discounted, and not of being put into circulation, and that it had been circulated in contravention of that agreement, and without full consideration, the court says that it does not lie in the mouth of those engaged in accommodation bill transactions to dispute the consideration on the part of the holder, "unless they show fraud and connect him with it." It is further said that the facts pleaded are not enough, in the absence of fraud, to call on the holder of a bill to prove consideration.

In Brown v. Philpot (1840) 2 Moody & R. (Eng.) 285, a plea that the defendant accepted a bill for the accommodation of the drawer, that the drawer indorsed it to A. B. without consideration, in order that he might get it discounted for him, but that A. B. fraudulently indorsed it to C. D. without any consideration, and that C. D. afterwards indorsed it to the plaintiff without any consideration, was held not to cast the burden upon the plaintiff of showing consideration; but, on the contrary, it was held necessary for the defendant, in support of his plea, to prove his averment, by showing that there was no consideration.

the defense set up by the maker was that he had handed the note to another to hold in escrow until the settlement of certain accounts between the maker and a third person, and that the note was delivered over to the payee without the consent of the maker, the court says that, without entering into the question whether the handing of a bill to the payee and the subsequent indorsement constituted a fraud under the Bills of Exchange Act, as the person to whom the bill was handed was an agent of the person with whom settlement was to be made, and this person was in turn the agent of the payee, and as the maker could not be expected to have possessed knowledge of the circumstances under which the note was handed over, he should not be precluded from defending.

III. Reasons for rule.

The reason most commonly given for the rule that, upon a showing of fraud in the inception of a negotiable instrument, the subsequent holder must show that he is a holder in due course, or bona fide holder, is that the guilty party would transfer the note thus affected with fraud in order that he might recover on it for his own use, but in the name of a third person. American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Oregon Pottery Co. (1892) 55 Fed. 265; Sperry v. Spaulding (1873) 45 Cal. 544; Zook v. Simonson (1880) 72 Ind. 83; Carrier v. Cameron (1875) 31 Mich. 373, 18 Am. Rep. 192; Cummings v. Thompson (1872) 18 Minn. 252, Gil. 228; Bank of Montreal v. Richter (1893) 55 Minn. 362, 57 N. W. 61; First Nat. Bank v. Holan (1896) 63 Minn. 525, 65 N. W. 952; First Nat. Bank v. Green (1871) 43 N. Y. 298; Vosburgh v. Diefendorf (1890) 119 N. Y. 357, 16 Am. St. Rep. 836, 23 N. E. 801; Hodge v. Smith (1907) 130 Wis. 326, 110 N. W. 192.

A few of the many variations in statement follow. It is stated in Jordan v. Grover (1893) 99 Cal. 194, 33 Pac. 889, that a presumption exists that a fraudulent payee would be likely to shield himself by placing the note in the hands of another person to sue upon it, and such presumption operates against the holder. According to the court in Kellogg v. Curtis (1879) 69 Me. 212, 31 Am. Rep. 273, the reason for this distinction is "that a presumption exists that a fraudulent payee would be likely to shield himself by placing the note in the hands of another person to sue upon it." This rule "proceeds upon the presumption that the person who has been guilty of fraud or illegality in obtaining the instrument would dispose of it and would place it in the hands of another person to sue upon it; and it is because of such presumption that the proof of fraud, illegality, or loss casts upon the holder the burden of showing that he is the bona fide holder for value, or under what circumstances, or for what value, he became the holder of the note." Totten v. Bucy (1882) 57 Md. 446. The fact that a negotiable instrument has been obtained by fraud affords the presumption that the person guilty of the illegality would place the note in the hands of another person to sue upon it. Smith v. Livingston (1873) 111 Mass. 342. It is stated in Hamilton v. Marks (1876) 63 Mo. 167, that the presumption is natural that an instrument obtained by fraud would be quickly transferred to another. This statement is approved in Link v. Jackson (1911) 158 Mo. App. 63, 139 S. W. 588, s. c. on second appeal (1912) 164 Mo. App. 194, 147 S. W. 1114. The court in Cummings v. Thompson (1872) 18 Minn. 246, Gil. 228, cites with approval the rule of Fitch v. Jones (1855) 5 El. & Bl. 238, 119 Eng. Reprint, 470, 24 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 293, 1 Jur. N. S. 854, 3 Week. Rep. 507, as follows: "Proof that a negotiable instrument was affected with fraud or illegality in the hands of a previous holder raises a presumption that he would indorse it away to an agent without value, and consequently calls on the plaintiff for proof that he gave value." The reason assigned for this rule in Tabor v. Merchants' Nat. Bank

(1886) 48 Ark. 454, 3 Am. St. Rep. 241, 3 S. W. 805, is that "where there is fraud the presumption is that he who is guilty will part with the note for the purpose of enabling some third party to recover upon it, and such presumption operates against the holder, and it devolves upon him to show that he gave value for it." This statement is approved in Harbison v. Hammons (1914) 113 Ark. 120, 167 S. W. 849.

After proof that an instrument was once in the hands of a fraudulent holder, it may justly be presumed to continue in the hands of a holder of that character until the contrary be proved. Parsons v. Utica Cement Mfg. Co. (1909) 82 Conn. 333, 135 Am. St. Rep. 278, 73 Atl. 785.

IV. What holder must prove.

a. Under law merchant.

There was a sharp divergence of opinion prior to the Negotiable Instruments Act as to just what the subsequent holder must prove, when fraud in the inception is shown, in order to entitle him to protection as a bona fide holder. There are, speaking generally, three elements to the character of bona fide holder. They are that the holder (1) took before maturity, (2) for value, and (3) in good faith, without notice of any defense. To these is sometimes added the requirement that he must have taken in the usual course of business. The contest above mentioned has raged about the third element. According to one line of authorities, the holder need not prove that he had no notice of defenses, where fraud in the inception is shown. He satisfies the burden thus cast upon him by showing that he took for value before maturity, and under circumstances which did not operate to charge him with notice of the defense. According to the other line of authorities, he must show affirmatively that he had no notice of the defense.

Although there has been a quite uniform tendency, under the Negotiable Instruments Act, to adopt the latter theory and thus render the prior state of the law of mere academical interest because of the quite general adoption of that act, that it is not wholly academical is shown by the few decisions represented by STEVENS v. PIERCE (reported herewith) ante, 7, and the question will, therefore, be discussed. It is not possible to align all cases with one theory or another. Although many of the courts have explicitly said that, upon a showing of fraud in the inception or diversion of an instrument, the burden is upon the person who claims to be a holder in due course to show, among other things, that he took without notice, strange as it may seem, no safe conclusion can be reached from this language that the court will not presume that he took without notice, if he shows that he took for value and before maturity. For example, the North Dakota decisions have repeatedly stated that upon a showing of fraud the person who claims to be a holder in due course must show, among other things, that he took without notice, and yet have held in other decisions that the absence of notice will be presumed upon his showing that he took for value before maturity. The latest case in that state (STEVENS v. BARNES (reported herewith) ante, 10), decided under the Negotiable Instruments Law, seems to take a view in accord with practically all of the cases decided under that law. The difficulty of interpreting the cases arises from the impossibility of determining the meaning with which the courts have used such terms as "good faith," "bona fide," "usual course of business." Unless, therefore, a case directly discusses the question under consideration in this subdivision, it will not be included.

There is a difference of opinion as to whether, in order to prevent the transferee of a note becoming a holder for value, actual notice of the defense is necessary, or whether knowledge of facts from which the defense might be inferred is sufficient. With this question this annotation does not deal. It has been necessary, however, in the course of this annotation, to refer in a general way to the things necessary for the plaintiff to prove, where the burden is cast upon him, and doubtless throughout there will be found expressions that the plaintiff must prove that he had no knowledge of facts, or that he had no knowledge of circumstances from which knowledge of facts might be inferred. By these statements, however, it is not intended to express any opinion upon the question just stated.

There is a class of cases which will be noticed before proceeding to a discussion of the above question. Some cases say that the presumption that the holder gave value for the note is rebutted by the showing of fraud, without referring to the other elements making up the character of a bona fide holder; in other words, it is stated merely that the holder must prove that he gave value for the instrument.

Canada. — Exchange Bank v. Carle (1887) Montreal L. R. 3 Q. B. 61. The court in Carrier v. Cameron (Mich.) supra, says that upon a showing of fraud the holder, in order to establish a right to recover, "would then have been compelled to rebut by showing that in fact he gave or parted with value, or received the notes upon such consideration as to give him the actual position of a bona fide holder."

A holder was required to prove value merely in Uther v. Rich (1839) 10 Ad. & E. 784, 113 Eng. Reprint, 297, 2 Perry & D. 579, where the payment of value was the only thing that was denied in the pleading.

In the English cases the necessity of proving the payment of a consideration seems only to have arisen from the form of pleading. How far that is true in the American cases is problematical. It seems possible, however, that, in some of the foregoing cases which speak only of proving value, that was the only point in dispute.

In Davies v. Willats (1836) 5 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 94, 1 Harr. & W. 679, an action by a principal who alleged that his agent had defrauded him by drawing bills in a way in which he was not authorized, to recover from the defendant who had discounted those bills the amount thereof as money had and received to the use of the plaintiff, the court says that, even supposing the rule to be the same in an action for money had and received as in an action upon the bill, there was no sufficient fraud proved so as at all to raise any suspicion that the defendant had any knowledge of the matter and to make it necessary for him to give evidence of the consideration given by him for the several bills; thus seemingly indicating an idea that, unless the defendant had knowledge, it was not necessary for him to give evidence of the consideration paid.

We come now to a discussion of the cases which take a position upon the necessity of proof by the holder that he had no notice of the fraud.

Daniel, in his work on Negotiable Instruments, vol. 1, 6th ed. § 819, says: "Fourth, that when the holder responds by showing that he did acquire the instrument bona fide for value in the usual course of business, while it was current, and under circumstances which do not operate as constructive notice of the facts which impeached the original validity, the defendant must then prove that he had actual notice of such facts; otherwise the holder's right to a recovery against him is perfected. This principle is obviously correct, for to require the plaintiff to show absolutely that he had [no] knowledge of facts would be to burden him with the necessity of proving an impossible negative. He makes out a prima facie case by proving that the instrument was indorsed to him for value before maturity. Nothing else appearing, a presumption arises that he purchased the note in good faith, without notice of the fraud, because it is not likely that he would give full value for a note which he believed to be fraudulent, taking the hazard upon himself, and because it would be difficult to prove good faith in any better way." This learned authority thus squarely adopts the first theory, and his position finds support in a number of cases which hold that the holder meets the burden cast upon him by the showing of fraud in the inception of the bill or note, by showing that he purchased the instrument for value before maturity; that the burden of proving that he took without notice does not rest upon him.

Harlan, J., delivering the opinion in King v. Doane (1890) 139 U. S. 166, 35 L. ed. 84, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465, says: "If in an action by an indorsee against the maker a negotiable note is shown to have been obtained by fraud, the presumption arising merely from the possession of the instrument, that the holder in good faith paid value, is so far overcome that he cannot have judgment unless it appears affirmatively from all the evidence, whether produced by the one side or the other, that he in fact purchased for value. . . . In the case supposed he must show that he paid value. That fact being established, he will be entitled to recover, unless it is proved that he purchased with actual notice of defect in the title, or in bad faith implying guilty knowledge or wilful ignorance."

The court in First Nat. Bank v. Moore (1906) 78 C. C. A. 581, 148 Fed. 953, regarded the rule of the Federal courts as settled "that a person who takes negotiable paper before maturity, for value, is entitled to recover as against the maker unless it is shown that, in the transaction by which title was acquired, the indorsee had knowledge of facts which would render the same invalid as against the maker, or was guilty of bad faith." And it is held that the burden of proving such knowledge or bad faith lies on the defendant.

In England, prior to the Bills of Exchange Act, there was some doubt as to whether the holder had to prove that he took the bill bona fide, in addition to proving that he gave value. Jones v. Gordon (1877) L. R. 2 App. Cas. 617, 47 L. J. Bankr. N. S. 1, 37 L. T. N. S. 477, 26 Week. Rep. 172, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 416.

Where there are circumstances in evidence tending to show bad faith in the acquisition of the note by the holder who is suing thereon, the burden of showing that he had no notice of the defense rests upon him. Taylor v. Trussell (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 139 S. W. 660.

Other courts have cited Daniel's general statement with approval, but it may be doubted whether some of the courts intended to approve the full import of the statement. For instance, the statement is cited with approval in Brook v. Teague (1893) 52 Kan. 119, 34 Pac. 347, to the effect that the holder, upon proof of fraud, must respond by showing "that he acquired it bona fide for value, in the usual course of business, while current, and under circumstances which create no presumption that he knew the facts which impeached its validity." This case is approved in Kennedy v. Gibson (1904) 68 Kan. 612, 75 Pac. 1044. But in the syllabus by the court the rule is stated thus: "An answer alleging illegality and fraud in the inception of a note sets up a defense, and the presumptions in favor of the right and title of the holder are overcome, and to meet such a defense it devolves upon the holder to show that he or some antecedent holder took the note before maturity, in good faith, for value, and in the usual course of business." The same is true in Abmeyer v. First Nat. Bank (1907) 76 Kan. 877, 92 Pac. 1109, where in the opinion the rule is stated as it is stated in Daniel, but in the headnote by the court it is said: "Where it is shown that a note has its inception in fraud, the burden of proof is shifted to the indorsee or holder to show that he acquired it for a valuable consideration, and without notice of defenses or of circumstances which should have put him upon inquiry." It is said in Hodson v. Eugene Glass Co. (1895) 156 Ill. 397, 40 N. E. 971, citing Daniel, that the holder must show that he acquired the instrument in good faith, for value, in the usual course of business, and in such a way as not to create a presumption of knowledge of its invalidity. This case is approved in Pinegan v. Green (1906) 130 Ill. App. 445. The rule as stated in this case (130 Ill. App. 445) is again stated in McClory v. Towne (1912) 173 Ill. App. 113, which cites the same from Daniel on Negotiable Instruments.

That the holder need not show that he had no notice seems to be the opinion of the court in Commercial Bank v. Burgwyn (1892) 110 N. C. 267, 17 L.R.A. 326, 14 S. E. 623. Although the court in that case says that, upon fraud being shown in the inception of an instrument, the prima facie case of the plaintiff is so far rebutted "as to shift the burden of proof, and to make it necessary for it to show that it was a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice," it continues: "When, however, the plaintiff responded by showing that it acquired the notes bona fide for value, in the usual course of business, and while they were still current, the prima facie case of the plaintiff was restored, and, unless the circumstances under which the purchase was made were of such a character as to amount to constructive notice, the jury should have been instructed that the burden of proof was upon the defendants to establish knowledge on the part of the plaintiff at the time of its purchase of the impeaching facts alleged in the answer." This statement is approved in Campbell v. Patton (1893) 113 N. C. 481, 18 S. E. 687.

In Wright v. Hardie (1895) 88 Tex. 653, 32 N. W. 885, the burden of showing notice on the part of the indorsee of a note was held to be upon the defendant by virtue of statute.

The theory upon which these courts proceed may be understood best by the language used in the opinions. The court in Kellogg v. Curtis (1879) 69 Me. 212, 31 Am. Rep. 273, discusses the question as follows: "The inquiry naturally occurs, What must the indorsee show in order to sustain the burden cast upon him, where the note originated in fraud? He makes out a prima facie case by proving that the note was indorsed to him for value before maturity. Nothing else appearing, a presumption arises that he purchased the note in good faith without notice of the fraud. This presumption exists because it is not likely that he would give full value for a note which he knew or believed to be fraudulent, taking the hazard attending it upon himself; and because it would be difficult to prove his good faith in any better way than that he gave value for it. To show, except by inference and presumption, that he did not have notice of the fraud, would be to establish a fact negative in its character. This presumption stands instead of direct proof, till overcome by rebutting evidence. Where there is evidence on both sides affecting the several points or propositions necessary to be shown, then the general burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to make them out." Practically the same rule is stated in Market & F. Nat. Bank v. Sargent (1893) 85 Me. 349, 35 Am. St. Rep. 376, 27 Atl. 192, as follows: "Proof of fraud in the inception of the note undoubtedly casts upon the indorsee the burden of showing that he took the note for value before maturity, without notice of the fraud. . . . But proof that he paid full value for the note before maturity raises a presumption that he purchased it in good faith without notice of the fraud, and, until overcome by rebutting evidence, this presumption stands in lieu of direct proof." In this case a prima facie case was held to be made out for the subsequent holder by his testimony that the note in question was discounted in the usual course of business, before maturity, for its face value less a discount, and it is added that this is made out for the plaintiff without the aid of the affirmative statement of the discount clerk that the plaintiff's bank did not know of any equities between the maker and the indorser. In Johnston v. Suburban Realty Co. (1895) 62 Mo. App. 156, where there seems to have been no question but that the note was purchased by the plaintiff before maturity, the court says that, upon a showing of fraud, the plaintiff was bound to show that he paid consideration for the note, and continued: "Good faith in paying the consideration is presumed, unless rebutted by the circumstances. Plaintiff's knowledge of a breach of trust on the part of his vendor necessarily rebuts the presumption of good faith."

According to the other line of cases, the burden is cast upon the holder to show all the elements which make a bona fide holder. Giberson v.

Jolley (1889) 120 Ind. 301, 22 N. E. 306; First Nat. Bank v. Ruhl (1890) 122 Ind. 279, 23 N. E. 766; Schmueckle v. Waters (1890) 125 Ind. 265, 25 N. E. 281; Kain v. Bare (1891) 4 Ind. Everitt* (1901) 67 App. Div. 86, 73 N. Y. Supp. 549. (But see discussion of New York cases, infra.) Landauer v. Sioux Falls Improv. Co. (1897) 10 S. D. 205, 72 N. W. 467. See Abmeyer v. First Nat. Bank (1907) 76 Kan. 877, 92 Pac. 1109, supra.

In Charles v. Remick (1895) 156 Ill. 327, 40 N. E. 970, it is stated that the burden is upon the subsequent holder of establishing that he is a bona fide assignee or purchaser of the note sued on.

Compare with Wright v. Brosseau (1814) 73 Ill. 381, and Hodson v. Eugene Glass Co. (1895) 156 Ill. 397, 40 N. E. 971, supra.

At least, the holder must prove that he had no knowledge of the fraud. Munroe v. Cooper (1828) 5 Pick. (Mass.) 412; MacLaren v. Cochran (1890) 44 Minn. 255, 46 N. W. 408; Bank of Montreal v. Richter (1893) 55 Minn. 362, 57 N. W. 61; Lahrman v. Bauman (1906) 76 Neb. 846, 107 N. W. 1008; Limerick Nat. Bank v. Adams (1897) 70 Vt. 132, 40 Atl. 166.

Upon a showing of fraud, the holder must, in order to entitle himself to the peculiar protection enjoyed by bona fide purchasers, show that he purchased the note for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the fraud. MacLaren v. Cochran (1890) 44 Minn. 255, 46 N. W. 408.

That the holder must prove that he took the note for value, and without notice of the fraud, is held, also, in Bank of Montreal v. Richter (1893) 55 Minn. 362, 57 N. W. 61.

Although it is expressly stated in Bank of Montreal v. Richter (Minn.) supra, that, upon fraud being shown, it devolves upon the holder to prove that he took without notice of the fraud, in the subsequent case of First Nat. Bank v. Holan (1896) 63

Minn. 525, 65 N. W. 952, the court, although relying upon the Richter Case, approves an instruction to the jury in the following language: "He must ordinarily show under what circumstances and for what value he became the holder. The reason of this rule is, where there is fraud, the presumption is he who is guilty of it will part with the note thereby acquired for the purpose of enabling some third party to recover on it. Such presumption operates against the holder, and suspicion follows the note into his hands and fastens to his title." In approving of this instruction, the court in the Holan Case says: "This instruction was given in connection with an instruction to the effect that, if the jury found that the note was obtained by fraud and artifice, the burden of proof would shift to the plaintiff to show that it took the note in good faith, before maturity, in the regular course of business"—and adds that this instruction was correct,—citing the Richter Case.

In Mendenhall v. Ulrich (1905) 94 Minn. 100, 101 N. W. 1057, where the burden of proving his bona fides was cast upon the subsequent holder of a note because it was fraudulently put into circulation, the court says that the holder must show "not only that he purchased the note for value, but that he did so in good faith, without notice or knowledge of the fraud."

The court in Cochran v. Stein (1912) 118 Minn. 323, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 391, 136 N. W. 1037, says that, upon the concession that the note had been obtained by fraud from the maker, "the burden was placed upon him [the plaintiff] to establish his claim that he purchased the note from the payees for value, before maturity, in due course of business and without notice. . . . And the phrase 'in due course of business' required proof on his part sufficient to fairly satisfy the jury that the note was indorsed to him by O'Connell & White before its maturity, to entitle him to recover in this action; for one who takes negotiable paper, payable to order, otherwise than by indorse-

The New York rule under the law merchant was in some doubt. The court in Vosburgh v. Diefendorf (1890) 119 N. Y. 357, 16 Am. St. Rep. 837, 23 N. E. 801, says: "The plaintiff did not satisfy this rule by showing that he paid full value for the note. It was necessary, in order to entitle him to recover, to go further, and show that he had no knowledge or notice of the fraud with which the instrument was tainted from its origin." In Canajoharie Nat. Bank v. Diefendorf (1890) 123 N. Y. 191, 10 L.R.A. 676, 25 N. E. 402, the holder contended that, upon proof that he paid value for the note before maturity, he conclusively established its character as a bona fide holder, and was entitled to recover, in the absence of proof showing that he had no notice or knowledge of facts constituting a defense to the action. In answer to this contention, the court says: "The plaintiff's contention eliminates the element of good faith from the transaction, and assumes that the language, 'a holder for value,' as used in the authorities, is satisfied by proof that the notes were purchased before maturity, and value paid therefor. We think this contention is contrary to the weight of authority in this state, even if it is not wholly unsupported by it. The payment of value for negotiable paper is a circumstance to be taken into account with other facts in determining the question of the bona fides of the transaction, and when full value is paid is entitled to great weight. But that fact is never conclusive except in the absence of evidence tending to show notice or bad faith. Those who seek to secure the advantages which the commercial law confers upon the holders of bank bills or negotiable paper must bring themselves within the condition which that law prescribes to establish the character of a bona fide holder. They are entitled to the benefits of that rule only when they have purchased such paper in good faith, in the usual course of business, before maturity, for full value, and without notice of any facts affecting the validity of the paper. . . . The fact that they took the paper before maturity and paid the full value thereof, in the absence of other facts, undoubtedly affords a presumption of the good faith of the transaction. But where it further appears that such property has been fraudulently or illegally obtained from its owner or maker, and under such circumstances that the person putting it in circulation could not maintain an action thereon, it is incumbent upon the holder, in order to succeed, to go farther and show the circumstances under which it came into his possession, and that he has acted in good faith in the transaction." But these cases are commented upon in American Exch. Nat. Bank v. New York Belting & Packing Co. (1896) 148 N. Y. 698, 43 N. E. 168, and it is there stated that there were sufficient circumstances in both of those cases, indicating that the plaintiff knew of the fraud; and the court in the Exchange Nat. Bank Case affirms the decision of the trial court, which is reported in (1893) 74 Hun, 446, 26 N. Y. Supp. 822, where the rule is stated as follows: "But when it is shown that full value was paid for a note taken in the usual course of business, and there is no circumstance which tends to show that the purchaser had notice that it had been diverted, it is to be presumed that it was acquired in good faith and without notice of the diversion." The evidence in this case showed that the plaintiff acquired the note for value, and in the usual course of business, and no fact or circumstance was called to the attention of the court or found in the record which rebuts the presumption, or which made the question of notice—good faith—one for the jury. This case involved a fraudulent diversion of the note, and not a fraudulent inception, but no stress is put upon this fact. In Hart v. Potter (1855) 4 Duer (N. Y.) 458, it was held not necessary for the holder to prove that he had no notice of the fraud, that proof that he purchased it for value, before maturity, was sufficient, and that the burden of proving facts sufficient to charge him with notice then rested on the defendant. A similar conclusion is reached in Catlin v. Hansen (1852) 1 Duer (N. Y.) 309, and Ross v. Bedell (1856) 5 Duer (N. Y.) 462.

The decisions in Iowa require the subsequent holder to show that he had no notice of the fraud. State Bank v. Gates (1901) 114 Iowa, 323, 86 N. W. 311 (and this court adds that he must show payment of consideration). That the indorsee must show that he took without knowledge of the fraud in the inception of the note, or of facts putting him upon inquiry which if pursued would have disclosed the fraud, is held in Galbraith v. McLaughlin (1894) 91 Iowa, 399, 59 N. W. 338.

The theory of the courts which require the holder to show lack of notice can best be understood by reference to their own language. The court in Giberson v. Jolley (1889) 120 Ind. 301, 22 N. E. 306, says: "It is not easy to conceive how one can be a bona fide holder of a note if he had notice of fraud, and all the courts agree that the plaintiff who sues upon a note must, when evidence that it was obtained from the maker by fraud is given, prove that he is a bona fide holder. It would seem clear, therefore, that, to be consistent, they should hold that he must prove not one, but all, of the essential elements of the character of a bona fide holder. This cannot be done without showing that the note was acquired by the plaintiff without notice, since if not so acquired it is not possible for him to be a bona fide holder within the meaning of the law. In support of his adoption of the rule which relieves the plaintiff of the burden of proving that he did not have notice, Mr. Daniel gives this reason: 'To require the plaintiff to show absolutely that he had no knowledge of facts would be to burden him with the necessity of proving an impossible negative.' 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 3d ed. § 819. The learned and usually very accurate author has fallen into more errors than one in this brief statement. The courts which hold that the burden is on the plaintiff to show that he is, in all the term implies, a bona fide holder, have never so much as hinted that absolute evidence is required. In no civil case is so high a degree of evidence demanded. It is, therefore, a mistake to assume that such evidence is meant by the cases which declare that the plaintiff must show that he is a good-faith holder of the bill or note. Nor do these cases require the proof of 'an impossible negative,' as the author assumes. The negative required is far from being an impossible one; on the contrary, it is not only possible, but easy, for the plaintiff to prove the facts within his own knowledge, since if he knows that he bought the note he cannot very well be ignorant of the facts attending its acquisition. Nor is it unusual to require a plaintiff to prove a negative; it is, indeed, always required of him where the facts are peculiarly within his own knowledge and essential to his right of recovery. 'Whenever,' says Mr. Wharton, 'whether in a plea, replication, rejoinder, or surrejoinder, an issue of fact is reached, then, whether the party claiming the judgment of the court asserts an affirmative or a negative proposition, he must make good his assertion.' 1 Whart. Ev. § 354. In Goodwin v. Smith (1880) 72 Ind. 113, 37 Am. Rep. 144, this question received full consideration, and a great number of authorities were cited in proof of the proposition that the general rule is that negative propositions must be proved, and these cases, as well as those collected by Mr. Wharton, conclusively show that the rule is a common, and not an extraordinary one, and is, indeed, one of almost universal application. In holding a party who assumes that he is the bona fide holder of a promissory note bound to prove all the facts essential to invest him with that character, no more is done than to apply to the particular instance a familiar general rule of wide sweep."

In holding that the plaintiff must prove absence of knowledge of fraud, the court in Tamling v. Duffey (1894)

14 Mont. 567, 43 Am. St. Rep. 658, 37 Pac. 363, says: "It might frequently occur that a defendant in such a case would be powerless to allege or prove knowledge in the plaintiff of the fraud which tainted the note sued on at its inception,—this knowledge being peculiarly within the breast and possession of the plaintiff,—whereas it would very rarely be a hardship upon an indorsee to require him to show his bona fides, by proving the circumstances and facts under which he became the owner and holder of the paper on which he sues."

In Parsons v. Utica Cement Mfg. Co. (1909) 82 Conn. 333, 135 Am. St. Rep. 278, 73 Atl. 785, where the fraud was not connected with the original inception of the paper, but occurred subsequently to the prejudice of an intermediate holder, the court says that, upon proof of the fraud, the presumption of the subsequent holder's bona fide character no longer availed her, "and her original burden of proof, only temporarily satisfied by its aid, rested upon her again and now required her to show a title by affirmative evidence that she obtained the instrument both in good faith and for a valuable consideration." And the court adds: "Her good faith she could only show by proof that when the bond came to her she had no knowledge of such fraud, and was not equitably chargeable with notice of it." And further the court said: "The defendant, it is true, had the burden, for certain purposes, of proving that she took the bond with such notice and without consideration; but these purposes were accomplished when the fact was established of its fraudulent abstraction from the assets of the insurance company by her grantor. One legal presumption established by the law merchant was thus met with another legal presumption established by the same law, which by that law was sufficient to destroy it."

According to the court in Aldrich v. Warren (1840) 16 Me. 465, when a note is shown to have been fraudulent in its inception, or to have been fraudulently put into circulation, the burden is thrown upon the holder to prove that he came by the possession fairly, without any knowledge of the fraud, and it is held, further, not enough merely to show that it was negotiated before its maturity. It must appear to have been done fairly in the due course of business, unattended with any circumstances justly calculated to awaken suspicion. A similar statement appears in Perrin v. Noyes (1855) 39 Me. 384, 63 Am. Dec. 633. But these cases are overruled, in so far as they lend any support to this view, by Kellogg v. Curtis (1879) 69 Me. 212, 31 Am. Rep. 273. See supra.

There arises in this connection an interesting question that is, except in so far as the case holds that lack of notice must be proved, beyond the scope of this annotation, as to proving absence of notice where a partnership or corporation is involved; that is, whether it must be shown that all members were free from notice. Notwithstanding that it is beyond the scope, it has seemed that it may be helpful to discuss the few cases on this point that have come to the attention of the writer, without attempting to exhaust the cases. It has been held, where the subsequent holder is a partnership, that not only must it be shown that the member of the partnership who bought the note was ignorant of any defenses thereto, but it must also be shown that all other members were ignorant thereof. Frank v. Blake (1882) 58 Iowa, 750, 13 N. W. 50, followed in Commercial Bank v. Paddick (1894) 90 Iowa, 63, 57 N. W. 687. It is held in McCosker v. Banks (1896) 84 Md. 292, 35 Atl. 935, that whenever it becomes necessary for the members of a co-partnership to show that they acquired a promissory note by indorsement in good faith, without knowledge or notice of its imputed original infirmities, such want of knowledge must be shown as to all the partners; and as one partner cannot give evidence that his copartner was ignorant of a particular fact, except by receiving or testifying to the copartner's declaration, which would be clearly inadmissible, it results that each partner must show his want of knowledge by his own testimony, or that other facts must be submitted to the jury from which they may legitimately infer the absence of such knowledge.

In Bennett State Bank v. Schloesser (1897) 101 Iowa, 571, 70 N. W. 705, it was recognized as necessary for a bank which had purchased a note and was suing thereon, to show that none of its officers had any notice of the matters pleaded by the defendant in defense of the note, and it was held that the testimony of the cashier that neither he nor the other officers of the bank had any notice of the matters was not conclusive. The mere testimony of the cashier of a bank that he had no knowledge or notice of equities against a note was held not conclusive proof that the bank was without such knowledge or notice in First Nat. Bank v. Wise (1915) 172 Iowa, 24, 151 N. W. 495.

In German American Nat. Bank v. Kelley (1918) 183 Iowa, 269, 166 N. W. 1053, where the cashier of a bank which had purchased a note asserted that the bank was without notice, the court says that no consideration is to be accorded this statement, for in the nature of things that was a mere opinion, since it is equally clear that the bank might be affected with knowledge of its president or assistant cashier, both of whom were dealing actively with the public in behalf of the bank, and no evidence was given negating the possession of such knowledge by those officers.

But in Perry Sav. Bank v. Fitzgerald (1914) 167 Iowa, 446, 149 N. W. 497, where the evidence was undisputed that the cashier of a bank was the only officer purchasing notes, and that he was the only one who had to do with the purchase of the note in suit, it was held that the burden of showing absence of notice of defenses was met by his testimony. The bank in this case was a corporation.

In Johnson County Sav. Bank v. Walker (1906) 79 Conn. 348, 65 Atl. 132, a case in which the cashier who purchased the note for his bank testified that he had no knowledge of any fraud, or illegal consideration, an instruction that this testimony was not sufficient to discharge the burden for the plaintiff, since the plaintiff, like all corporations, doubtless had other officers, like a president, secretary, treasurer, board of directors, or board of trustees, and if all of these officers had the required knowledge of the fraud or illegal consideration, the fact that its cashier had no such knowledge would make no difference, was held error, where no evidence had been introduced as to what officers, other than the cashier, the plaintiff had, nor as to the powers or duties of any other officer. The court further says that the only evidence as to the manner in which the bank acquired the acceptances was that they were discounted by the cashier on his own responsibility, and if this were true, notice of fraud in obtaining them, to a president who knew nothing of the offer of them for discount and had no duties to perform with reference to such an offer, would be unimportant.

In National Bank v. Palmer (1914) 56 Pa. Super. Ct. 82, a bank was held to have discharged the burden of showing that it had no notice of defenses, where the cashier and two of the directors testified to this effect, although it appeared in this case that the discount involved was submitted to the board of directors for approval, and that the board met with six directors present, including the cashier. It was held not necessary to call every officer in any way connected with the administration of the bank's affairs, through whom some knowledge of defect in the delivery of the note might have been brought home to the bank.

It is stated in National Secur. Bank v. Cushman (1877) 121 Mass. 490, that the mere fact that one of the directors of a bank discounting a note knew of the fraud or illegality will not prevent the bank from recovering thereon, but it is held in that case that, if the director who had such knowledge acted for the bank in discounting the note, his act is the act of the bank, and the bank is affected with his knowledge.

And in Ward v. Doane (1889) 77

Mich. 328, 43 N. W. 980, an action on a note belonging to a partnership, it was held that if it be shown that only two members of the firm took any part in the purchase of the note, and that they were the only ones shown to have known anything about this purchase until after it was bought, the presumption would obtain, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, that the remaining members were ignorant of its consideration.

b. Under Negotiable Instruments Act.

The Negotiable Instruments Law provides in effect, in § 52, as above shown (subd. I. b), that, where it is shown that the title of any person who negotiated the instrument was defective, "the burden is on the holder to prove that he, or some person under whom he claims, acquired the title as a holder in due course." According to the law, "a holder in due course is a holder who has taken the instrument under the following conditions: (1) That it is complete and regular upon its face; (2) that he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact; (3) that he took it in good faith and for value; (4) that at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it." It has been expressly held that fraud in the inception of an instrument casts upon the holder the duty of proving the four conditions set forth in the law. Shellenberger v. Nourse (1911) 20 Idaho, 323, 118 Pac. 508; Re Philpott (1915) 169 Iowa, 555, 151 N. W. 825, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 839; Commercial Secur. Co. v. Archer (1918) 179 Ky. 842, 201 S. W. 479; Merchants Nat. Bank v. Branson (1914) 165 N. C. 344, 81 S. E. 410; Leavitt v. Thurston (1911) 38 Utah, 351, 113 Pac. 77.

Many cases have omitted reference to the first of the enumerated conditions, but have held that it is necessary for the holder to prove the last three to establish the burden thrown upon him by proof of fraud in the inception.

Still other cases hold merely that the holder must prove he had no notice of the fraud. Link v. Jackson (1911) 158 Mo. App. 63, 139 S. W. 588, s. c. on second appeal in (1912) 164 Mo. App. 195, 147 S. W. 1114; First Nat. Bank v. Warsaw Drug Co. (1914) 166 N. C. 99, 81 S. E. 993; Thompson v. Citizens Nat. Bank (1909) 32 Ohio C. C. 131, 13 Ohio C. C. N. S. 515; *Regan v. In Southwest Nat. Bank v. Lindsley (1916) 29 Idaho, 343, 158 Pac. 1082, it is stated that the holder is required to show that at the time he purchased the note he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument, or defect in the title of the person negotiating it.

174 Ky. 450, 192 S. W. 521, where the holder failed to testify that when he purchased the note he had no knowledge of the fraud, the court concluded that plaintiff did not sustain the burden of showing that he was a holder in due course.

The fact that a holder claiming to be a holder in due course paid a consideration for the note is insufficient of itself to show that he did not have actual knowledge of the fraud entering into the consideration of the note, when it is nowhere stated that the holder did not have knowledge of the fraud. Commercial Secur. Co. v. Archer (1918) 179 Ky. 842, 201 S. W. 479.

In England and Canada, under the Bills of Exchange Act, the holder must prove that he had no notice of the fraud. Tatam v. Hasler (1889) 5 Times L. R. (Eng.) 593, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 432, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 345, 38 Week. Rep. 109; Noble v. Boothby (1912) 22 West. L. R. (Can.) 232, 2 West. Week. Rep. 1103, 7 D. L. R. 1.

Various statements of what the holder must prove appear in the cases. The court in Beachy v. Jones (1921) 108 Kan. 236, 195 Pac. 184, says that, when fraud is shown, the holder of the note must prove that "he acquired it before maturity, for value, and in good faith, and that he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person negotiating it." It is stated in Appalachian Corp. v. Ayo (1919) 145 La. 201, 82 So. 89, that, upon fraud being shown, the burden rested upon the subsequent holder to prove that he "was a bona fide holder before maturity, and without notice of such fraud." The holder must, according to the court in Stouffer v. Alford (1910) 114 Md. 110, 78 Atl. 387, show that he acquired the instruments "bona fide, for value, before maturity, and without notice of any facts impeaching their validity." In Wilson v. Kelso (1911) 115 Md. 162, 80 Atl. 895, it is held that, upon proof of fraud, it is incumbent on the holder to show that he took the note "in good faith, for value, and before maturity, and without any actual knowledge of any infirmity or defect in the instrument." In Lewiston Trust & S. D. Co. v.

Shackford (1913) 213 Mass. 432, 100 N. E. 828, the court expressly says that, upon the showing of fraud, the burden is on the holder to prove that he acquired title to the note in due course; that is, to prove, among other things, not only that he had taken the note in good faith and for value, but also that he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person negotiating it. In Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Marden, O. & H. Co. (1919) 234 Mass. 161, 125 N. E. 384, it is held that a showing that a note was fraudulently put in circulation casts the burden on the holder to show that, on all the evidence, he had no actual notice or knowledge of the fraud. In People's State Bank v. Miller (1915) 185 Mich. 565, 152 N. W. 257, upon a showing of fraud, the burden is stated to rest upon the holder to prove that he acquired the title as a holder in due course, and it is further added that it is incumbent upon him to show affirmatively that as a holder in due course, under the conditions enumerated in the above section, he took the check in good faith and for value. Upon showing that the instrument was obtained by fraud, the burden is upon the holder to prove that he took it in good faith, for value, and without actual knowledge either of any infirmity in it, or defect in the title to it. Johnson County Sav. Bank v. Walker (1906) 79 Conn. 348, 65 Atl. 132. That upon a showing of fraud, the holder must show by affirmative evidence that he obtained the instrument both in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and that good faith can only be shown by proof that when the instrument came to him he had no knowledge of such fraud, and was not equitably chargeable with notice of it, is held, also, in Parsons v. Utica Cement Mfg. Co. (1909) 82 Conn. 333, 135 Am. St. Rep. 278, 73 Atl. 785. In Bank of Ozark v. Hanks (1910) 142 Mo. App. 110, 125 S. W. 221, an instruction to the jury was approved which stated the law to be that, upon a showing of fraud, the plaintiff must show by greater weight of testimony "that it bought said notes in good faith, in due course of business, without notice of the fraud by which Lowthorp obtained said notes." According to the court in First Nat. Bank v. Warsaw Drug Co. (1914) 166 N. C. 99, 81 S. E. 993, it is not sufficient for the holder to show simply that he purchased before maturity and paid value, but he must show that he had no knowledge or notice of the fraud.

The court in Leavitt v. Thurston (1910) 38 Utah, 351, 113 Pac. 77, thus discusses the question: "The appellant, however, urges that the burden cast upon him when fraud was shown in the inception of the note was discharged by the giving of his testimony that he purchased the note in good faith, for value, before maturity, in the usual course of business, and without notice of the fraud; and that the burden then shifted to the defendant to show that the plaintiff took the note with knowledge or notice of the fraud. Here counsel confuse the term, 'burden of proof,'—the onus probandi,—which does not shift, with that of the 'burden or duty of proceeding,' or going forward, which in the course of the trial upon various facts may, and frequently does, shift from one party to the other. Whenever the existence of any fact or facts is necessary in order that a party may make out his case or establish a defense, the burden of proof—the onus probandi—is on such party to show the existence of such fact or facts. That burden does not shift, and is unaffected by the evidence as the trial proceeds. After all the evidence is in, the one having the burden will lose unless the evidence bears more heavily in his favor. Upon proof of fraud in the inception of the note, the statute undoubtedly casts on the holder not only the mere duty or burden of proceeding, or of going forward, but the burden of establishing the existence of facts showing that he, or some person under whom he claims, acquired title as a holder in due course, and as defined in § 1604, which includes the fact that, at the time the note was negotiated, he, or the person through whom he acquired title, had no notice of the fraud or infirmity. If evidence is given by him tending to show that he was such a holder in due course, that does not then shift the burden of proof to the defendant to establish the fact that he, or the person from whom he acquired title, had notice or knowledge of the fraud, or that no value was paid for the note, or that it was purchased overdue, but merely the duty of proceeding in the production of evidence, if he desires to meet or overcome the effect or weight to be given the evidence so adduced by the holder. But, upon all the evidence on such issue, the holder will lose, unless the evidence bears more heavily in his favor. We think the charge in this particular was right."

The view has been taken, however, even under the Negotiable Instruments Law, that the holder makes out a prima facie case after proof of fraud in the diversion of a note, by showing a purchase for full value and before maturity. American Nat. Bank v. Lundy (1910) 21 N. D. 167, 129 N. W. 99. Although the decision in Walters v. Rock (1908) 18 N. D. 45, 115 N. W. 511, was rendered after the adoption of the Negotiable Instruments Law in that state, nothing is said in the opinion as to that law; the holding in that case, that payment of value on a purchase before maturity is prima facie evidence that the purchase is in due course, is expressly based upon First Nat. Bank v. Flath (1901) 10 N. D. 281, 86 N. W. 867, a case involving a note given before the Negotiable Instruments Law was adopted. But this view is seemingly repudiated in STEVENS v. BARNES (reported herewith) ante, 10.

In STEVENS v. PIERCE (reported herewith) ante, 7, the court says: "But when the defendant introduced evidence tending to show that the note had been procured by fraud, misrepresentation, and deceit practised upon her by the agent of the Lyon-Taylor Company, then the burden of proof was shifted to the plaintiff to show that the bank from which he purchased had acquired the note in good faith, for value, in the usual course of business, and when the plaintiff thereafter, by uncontroverted evidence, established that the bank had received the note for value, in the usual course of business, and under circumstances that did not operate as constructive notice of the fraud by which defendant had been induced to sign the note, then the burden was upon the defendant to prove actual notice of fraud." In the previous case of Mangold & G. Bank v. Utterback (1918) — Okla. —, 174 Pac. 542, an instruction in almost the identical language of that used in the opinion in STEVENS v. PIERCE was given, and by the supreme court held not to state the law of the jurisdiction. The instruction was as follows: "The jury is instructed that when the holder of a negotiable instrument proves by competent testimony that he acquired the instrument bona fide, for value, in the usual course of business, before due, and under circumstances which do not operate as constructive notice of facts which impeach the original validity, the defendant must then prove that the plaintiff had actual notice of such facts; otherwise your verdict should be for the plaintiff." The supreme court says of this: "This instruction is not the law in this jurisdiction. This court in a number of cases has said that where the defense to a note is that the same was obtained by the fraud of the payee, and when this fraud is established, the burden rests upon the plaintiff to show that it purchased the note in question without notice of the fraud, or, in other words, the title of the payee in the notes being defective, the burden to show want of notice, if fraud is established, is upon the plaintiff. . . . But the trial court here placed the burden of proof upon the defendant to show that the bank took the notes with knowledge of the fraud practised upon it."

In Citizens' State Bank v. Snelling (1919) 55 Mont. 476, 178 Pac. 744, where the plaintiff produced and identified the note, and showed its purchase for value the day following its execution, the court says that the maker, in order to defeat a recovery, must show fraud in the procurement of the note, and that the "plaintiff had knowledge thereof." There is no discussion. It cannot be said that the cases adhering to this view are convincing of its correctness. It does not appear that the question was given much consideration. Moreover, the great number of cases adhering to the opposite theory, together with the wording of the Negotiable Instruments Act, makes the opposite conclusion seem the correct one.

V. What constitutes fraud within the rule.

a. In general.

Fraud, as it is known in the law, is well summed up by the supreme court of Washington as follows: "The essential elements of representations to constitute fraud, whether as a defense or as a cause of action, are undoubtedly the same. They are these: The representations must have been made as to a material matter; they must be false; it must appear that the maker knew them to be false, or made them recklessly as facts, without knowledge of their truth; they must have been made with the intention that they should be acted upon by the other party; the other party must have acted in reliance upon them, and he must have thereby suffered injury." Hamilton v. Milhills (1916) 92 Wash. 675, 159 Pac. 887.

When the foregoing elements are present in a transaction, fraud exists, and if the action taken by the defrauded party is the execution and delivery of a negotiable instrument, there is such fraud in the inception of the instrument as casts upon a subsequent holder thereof the burden of showing that he is a holder in due course, if he relies upon his character as such to cut off defenses. The following pages show that fraud has arisen in a great variety of transactions. While for convenience the cases have been grouped according to the transaction in which the fraudulent representations were made, it must be understood that it is the fraudulent representations that constitute the fraud, and not the character of the transaction, that is, whether a sale of land, or a sale of horses, etc. In many of the cases in which fraud was held to exist, the facts constituting the fraud have been so involved that setting them out would serve no useful purpose. In other cases the courts have not clearly stated the representations constituting the fraud, and no exhaustive discussion of these cases has been attempted. However, for the purpose of furnishing representative cases dealing with various states of facts, a number of cases have been listed under a brief statement of the facts out of which the fraud arose. See V. c, infra.

There are, of course, certain questions of law as to whether certain representations or the creation of certain appearances constitute fraud, and these questions will be noticed. It must be remembered, however, in this connection, that this note deals primarily with an evidentiary question, and the evidentiary question is confined to bills and notes, so that no exhaustive presentation of any representations or states of facts will appear. Obtaining a check in payment of a bet on a fake horse race has been held such fraud as casts upon a subsequent holder the burden of proving his bona fides. Arkansas Nat. Bank v. Martin (1914) 110 Ark. 578, 163 S. W. 795. The execution of a note by a client to his attorney within the time of the employment and the existence of the confidential relation, for a fee which was agreed upon at the time, was presumed to have been fraudulent in Shirk v. Neible (1901) 156 Ind. 66, 83 Am. St. Rep. 150, 59 N. E. 281. In Asbury v. Taube (1912) 151 Ky. 142, 151 S. W. 372, the failure of a vendor of horses to whom the purchaser had given a check for the amount of the purchase price, to deliver the horses as agreed, the explanation being offered that one of the horses had become sick and could not be delivered, whereupon the purchaser demanded a return of the check, which was refused, was treated as fraud casting upon one to whom the check had been transferred the burden of proving his bona fides. Nothing is said as to an intention on the part of the vendor at the time of obtaining the check, of failing to deliver the horses, and there is little discussion of the question. In Ganz v. Weisenberger (1896) 66 Mo. App. 110, the holder of a note was held to have the burden of proof where it appeared that the maker signed a contract with an agent to put up lightning rods which he supposed called for the payment of $5; but where in a few days another person drove to his home and told him that the contract called for $150 for his house alone, and that, unless he would sign a note for this amount, the person would obtain a United States marshal and turn him out of house and home, whereupon he, being frightened, signed the note; the court says that this was evidence showing that the note originated in fraud. The receipt by an insolvent bank for deposit, of a check drawn by the depositor on another bank in his own favor without knowledge of the insolvent condition of the bank of deposit, seems to be treated as a fraud which will cast upon a subsequent holder of the check the burden of showing his bona fides, in Grant v. Walsh (1895) 145 N. Y. 502, 45 Am. St. Rep. 626, 40 N. E. 209. The obtaining of a check surreptitiously and without authority from the drawer, and filling in the name of the person thus obtaining the check as payee, was treated as such fraud as cast the burden upon the subsequent holder, in Ern v. Rubinstein (1897) 72 Mo. App. 337.

It has been argued that the fraud which casts upon a subsequent holder the burden of proving that he is a holder in due course under the Negotiable Instruments Law consists of some trick or device that induces the giving of the negotiable instrument under the belief that some instrument of a different kind is being given. There is some indication in Kellogg v. Hale (1914) 190 Ill. App. 15, that this is the view of the court in that case, but it seems that the attention of the court was directed more to the substantive question as to what fraud would defeat recovery by a bona fide holder, than to the evidential question as to the burden of proof. It seems clear that such fraud does cast upon the subsequent holder the burden of providing his bona fides. And so it has been held such fraud as casts upon the holder the burden of proving his bona fide character that the person who took a bill of exchange, knowing it to be such, procured it by the false statement that it was an ordinary note, and the parties who gave the bill did it in ignorance of its true character and in reliance upon the false statement made to them. Ross v. Drunkard (1860) 35 Ala. 434. In Baldwin v. Fagan (1882) 83 Ind. 447, the fraud consisted in falsely reading to the payee of a note, who was illiterate and almost blind, and misrepresentation of its contents. A note procured by the representation of the payee that it was merely a recommendation required by an insurance company to enable the payee to become their agent, on which the maker relies in signing the note, is tainted with fraud in its inception, so as to throw upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. Cahen v. Everitt (1901) 67 App. Div. 86, 73 N. Y. Supp. 549.

But generally the view that the fraud which casts upon the holder the burden of proving that he is a holder in due course is confined to fraud as to the character of the instrument has not been followed. Fraud relating to the consideration of a note is held to cast the burden upon the holder. First Nat. Bank v. Denfeld (1919) 143 Minn. 281, 173 N. W. 661. It has been held that the burden of showing his bona fides rests upon the holder of a note when there is fraud in the inception, even though the fraud affected the consideration. City Deposit Bank v. Green (1908) 138 Iowa, 156, 115 N. W. 893. This rule that fraud relating to the consideration casts the burden of proving his bona fides upon the holder is supported by the great majority of the cases, although not directly discussing it, for in most cases the fraud consisted in misrepresentations concerning the goods or articles for which the note was given. It must be remembered in this connection that, while fraud may arise from misrepresentations as to the consideration for the instrument, not every failure of consideration amounts to fraud. It is perhaps true that no consistent rule of distinction can be formulated. Facts which are regarded by one court as showing a failure of consideration are regarded by another as showing fraud.

The broader distinction between the two things is illustrated by the decision in Violet v. Rose (1894) 39 Neb. 660, 58 N. W. 216, that the representation by the payee of a note to the maker concerning a deed of assignment given to secure the maker for executing the note, that the name of the payee's wife appearing on the assignment was her genuine signature, when in fact it was not, is fraud, casting the burden of proof upon a subsequent holder, if the maker relied upon such representation in executing the note. If, on the contrary, the deed of assignment failed merely because the wife refused or failed thereafter to acknowledge the instrument, as the payee of the note agreed she would do, there would be merely a failure of consideration, and not fraud which would cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. Another illustration is furnished by the decision in McKinley v. Beggs (1902) 17 Colo. App. 23, 67 Pac. 1019, an action by a subsequent holder upon a note given for services rendered or supposed to have been rendered, by the payee, a subsequent holder, the mere fact that the services were not rendered was held not to show that the note was secured by fraud, where there was no offer to show that the payee had falsely stated any facts to the maker for the purpose of inducing the execution of the note.

A failure of title to the object which constituted the consideration has been held to cast the burden on the holder. For instance, the sale of mules which had been stolen by the vendor was, in Famous Shoe & Clothing Co. v. Crosswhite (1894) 124 Mo. 34, 26 L.R.A. 568, 46 Am. St. Rep. 424, 27 S. W. 397, treated as such fraud as to cast upon the subsequent holder of a check given for the purchase price the burden of proving his bona fides. Evidence supporting a charge that the payee of the note assumed to be the owner of a right to sell a certain wire-fence machine, and agreed in writing with the maker of the note to appoint him general agent, which agreement, together with the sale of certain machines, furnished the sole consideration for the execution of the note, when in fact the payee did not own the right, but had sold it previously to another person, was held to raise the issue of fraud which cast the burden upon the purchaser to show his good faith, in Stewart v. Andes (1905) 110 Mo. App. 243, 84 S. W. 1134. Notes given in payment for certain shares of stock which the person to whom the notes were given represented belonged to him, when in fact they did not and he knew they did not, were held to have been obtained by fraud, so as to cast the burden upon a subsequent holder of showing his bona fides, in Hale v. Shannon (1890) 57 Hun, 466, 32 N. Y. S. R. 1079, 11 N. Y. Supp. 129. It further appeared in this case that the person obtaining the notes agreed to hold them and to part with them only to the maker, and on their gradual payment by the profits to be derived from the stock. In Pelly v. Onderdonk (1891) 61 Hun, 314, 15 N. Y. Supp. 915, the maker of a note pleaded that the person to whom the note was given claimed to be the owner and inventor of processes for the manufacture of different articles of paint, and also for the manufacture of a liquid called pyrodene. These articles of paint and this liquid were alleged to have been falsely represented to the defendants as to their quality and utility, and the profits that could be derived from their manufacture and sale, and it was further alleged that the representations were fraudulently made for the purpose of inducing the defendants and others to associate together and form a corporation, in the organization of which the note in question was given. It was urged that the mere failure of consideration did not cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. In answer to this contention the court says that the defense in this case did not depend upon a failure of consideration, but was placed upon the ground that the note had been fraudulently obtained.

Fraudulent representations as to value have also been held to cast the burden on the subsequent holder. Thus, notes induced by false representations as to the value and character of lands have been held to be fraudulent in inception, so as to cast the burden of showing bona fides on a subsequent holder. Eames v. Crozier (1894) 101 Cal. 260, 35 Pac. 873. Representations by the vendor of a secondhand X-ray machine who knew its value, as to the value thereof, in negotiations leading up to a sale to one who had no such knowledge, were held to amount to fraud in Scheidel Western X-Ray Co. v. Bacon (1918) — Mo. App. —, 201 S. W. 917. The court here recognizes the difficulty of determining when a representation as to value is a mere expression of opinion, or is one of fact, but concludes in this case that the representation was not a mere opinion. In Vickery v. Burton (1896) 6 N. D. 245, 69 N. W. 193, where, in an action by a subsequent holder of a note given for certain machinery, the maker pleaded certain false and fraudulent representations concerning the quality of the machinery, and alleged that it was not worth a greater sum than was paid down in cash, and that the notes were wholly without consideration, the court says: "There is much conflict of judicial opinion as to whether, where fraud in a sale of property as between the vendor and vendee is shown, such showing operates to shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff in a case where negotiable paper given for the property by the purchaser is sued on by an indorsee of the paper. We think the better reason and the weight of authority support the view that proof of such fraud does shift the burden of proof, and that in such cases, after proof of fraud, the plaintiff has the burden of showing a good-faith purchase of such paper in due course and without notice." An affidavit of defense that the note was procured by false and fraudulent representations, in the first instance, in reference to the value of the property in part payment of which the note was given, and that the defendants had a full, just, and legal defense to the payment of the note, in this, that the consideration therefor had failed, coupled with the denial of the plaintiff's title, was held sufficient to put the latter upon proof that he was a bona fide holder, in Reamer v. Bell (1875) 79 Pa. 292. The fraudulent representations which were held to cast the burden upon the holder of the note of showing his bona fides, in Zook v. Simonson (1880) 72 Ind. 83, were fraudulent representations as to the skill and ability of the payee in grafting fruit trees, in consideration of certain work of which kind the note was given. Fraudulent representations by the payee of a note given for the purchase price of a buggy that the buggy was new and of the value named in the note, when in truth the property was old and secondhand, but had been newly painted and varnished so that its real condition could not be observed, were held to be fraud casting the burden upon a subsequent holder, where the maker of the note relied upon the false and fraudulent representations so made, and believed them to be true. Bradley, H. & Co. v. Whicker (1899) 23 Ind. App. 380, 55 N. E. 490. Representations by a vendor of cigars as to the number and quality of the cigars, which were false, and upon which the purchaser relied in executing a note, were held to cast upon the holder of the note the burden of showing his bona fides, in Owens v. Snell (1896) 29 Or. 483, 44 Pac. 827.

Fraudulent representations as to quantity have also been held to cast the burden on the subsequent holder. The representation of a vendor of corn to the purchaser as to the quantity was held to be fraudulent, casting upon the subsequent holder of a note given for the purchase price of the corn the burden of showing his bona fides, where the vendor was a farmer accustomed to growing and measuring corn, and assumed to know and stated the quantity, and the purchaser, on the other hand, was a merchant tailor wholly without knowledge or experience in measuring corn in the field, whose ignorance and inexperience in the matter were well known to the vendor, if the misrepresentations were made with intent to deceive, and the purchaser relied thereon to his injury. Abmeyer v. First Nat. Bank (1907) 76 Kan. 877, 92 Pac. 1109.

Even failure to keep an agreement has been held to be evidence of a fraudulent intent. Where the agent for a fence machine procured the note in question upon his agreement that it should not be used by his principal, but deposited in a bank selected by the defendant, who thereafter assisted him in securing a subagent, who in turn gave a note for $100, a part of which was to be paid to the defendant for his commission, and subsequently the agent sold both notes and appropriated the entire proceeds, such evidence tends to prove a fraudulent intent on the part of the agent in obtaining the note. Rochford v. Barrett (1908) 22 S. D. 83, 115 N. W. 522.

Fraudulent representations as to a material fact have been frequently held the source of fraud. Evidence that the payee of a note given for corporate stock represented that the corporation held certain patents, and that the shares of stock were worth what the purchaser paid therefor and would rapidly increase in value,—representations that were untrue, the company having no patent and the stock being of no substantial value,—was held sufficient to authorize a submission of the case to the jury upon the question of fraud in procuring the notes, in Lentz v. Landers (1919) 21 Ariz. 117, 185 Pac. 821. A further promise was made by the seller of the stock that, if the purchaser at the end of a year so desired, he would repur-chase the stock at a considerable advance over the purchase price, a promise which he did not intend to keep. The holder of a check given to a stockbroker upon a purchase of stock which the broker represented had been ordered transferred to the purchaser's name on the books of the corporation, whereas in fact it was not so transferred,—the broker at the time the check was delivered to the subsequent holder being insolvent, and having taken proceedings looking to the appointment of a receiver,—was held to have the burden of showing his bona fides on the theory that the transaction between the broker and the drawer of the check was a fraudulent one, and that the title to the check by reason thereof was defective within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law. People's State Bank v. Miller (1915) 185 Mich. 565, 152 N. W. 257. In a purchase and sale of a series of notes, a representation that a former note in the series, which had fallen due before the transaction in question, had been paid, when as a matter of fact it had not, was held to be fraudulent where it was known by the vendor to be untrue, in MacLaren v. Cochran (1890) 44 Minn. 255, 46 N. W. 408. The representations of an attorney employed to defend an ejectment suit, for which his fee was fixed at a certain sum and a certain larger sum if he succeeded in getting his client a clear title, that he had obtained for him a clear title, on which representation the client executed to him a note for the larger amount, is such fraud as casts upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. Knowlton v. Schultz (1897) 6 N. D. 417, 71 N. W. 550. An affidavit of defense by the maker of a note given for the purchase price of pepper that, before the note became due, the payee was employed by the maker to make sale of the pepper upon such terms that the proceeds of the pepper would meet the note at maturity, and that afterwards the payee represented that he had sold the pepper on the maker's account, but on such terms that the note must be renewed in order that the time of the maturity of the note might agree with the time the proceeds of the pepper would be received, and upon these representations the note was renewed, when in fact the payee, instead of having sold the pepper on account of the maker, had converted it to his own use, was held to be such fraud in the inception as to cast upon the holder the burden of showing his bona fides, in Hutchinson v. Boggs & Kirk (1857) 28 Pa. 294. Where a party executed an accommodation note for another, sending it to him in a letter through the mail, and was advised by the accommodated party that the letter had been received, but had been opened by some person and the note taken out, and requesting the maker to inclose another note, stating that if he got the first note in his possession he would return it, whereupon the maker inclosed another note for the same amount, payable in the same length of time, the second note having been negotiated by the payee, protested, suit brought, and judgment obtained thereon against the defendant, it was held to be clear that the first note had thrown around it a cloud of suspicion and fraud which called upon a holder thereof to show that he obtained it upon a valuable consideration, in the usual course of business, before maturity. Hoffman v. Foster (1862) 43 Pa. 137. The representation by a book agent that the books for which note was given were a special, limited, extra-illustrated edition, in reliance upon which the defendant executed the note, and which representation was entirely false and untrue, was held to constitute such fraud in the obtaining of the note as to cast upon the plaintiff the burden of showing his bona fides. Schultheis v. Sellers (1909) 223 Pa. 513, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1210, 72 Atl. 887 (a case decided under the Negotiable Instruments Law). The representation by the payee of a note to the maker, who was illiterate, that it was a note for not over $300, when in fact it had been left blank in part, and was subsequently filled up for a note of $4,200, is such fraud as casts upon the plaintiff the burden of showing his bona fides. Howie v. Lewis (1900) 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 232. An affidavit of defense saying that the payee of the note came to the maker and told him that he had purchased some merchandise, and that he was without sufficient funds with which to pay for the same, and requested the maker to purchase the merchandise, and offered to accept the note in question in payment therefor, saying that he would use the note for the payment to his vendor for the merchandise, and deliver it at once to the maker of the note,—representations which were false, and upon which the maker relied in giving the note,—were held to constitute fraud in the inception, in Eliel v. Chamberlain (1912) 48 Pa. Super. Ct. 610. In City Deposit Bank v. Green (1908) 138 Iowa, 156, 115 N. W. 893, the fraud consisted in the representation by the payee of a joint and several note that all the subscribers thereto would be responsible, and the failure of the payee to obtain all responsible subscribers, but the acceptance of one who was insolvent.

See supra, as to representations as to title.

b. Fraud in the execution of partnership and corporate notes.

The execution by one partner of a note in the partnership name for the accommodation of a third person, the partnership receiving no benefit therefrom, is held to throw the burden of proving his bona fides upon a subsequent holder. First Nat. Bank v. Weston (1897) 24 App. Div. 230, 48 N. Y. Supp. 403; Porter v. Gunnison (1854) 2 Grant. Cas. (Pa.) 297. Such a note is fraudulent. Porter v. Gunnison (Pa.) supra. That such a note, executed after the dissolution of the firm, is fraudulent, is held in Albietz v. Mellon (1860) 37 Pa. 367. That such a note is fraudulent is held in Second Nat. Bank v. Weston (1898) 31 App. Div. 403, 52 N. Y. Supp. 315, reversed on other grounds in (1900) 161 N. Y. 520, 76 Am. St. Rep. 283, 55 N. E. 1080, s. c. on subsequent appeal in (1901) 62 App. Div. 621, 70 N. Y. Supp. 995, where it was executed after the dissolution of the firm, and antedated.

A partnership bill or note executed by a partner for his own private debt is a fraud upon the other partner which casts the burden of proving his bona fides upon the holder. Porter v. Gunnison (1854) 2 Grant, Cas. (Pa.) 297; Stevens v. McLachlan (1899) 120 Mich. 285, 79 N. W. 627; Real Estate Invest. Co. v. Russel (1892) 148 Pa. 496, 24 Atl. 59; Loeb v. Mellinger (1900) 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 592, 17 Lanc. L. Rev. 129; Bank v. Cunningham (1877) 4 W. N. C. (Pa.) 414; Heath v. Sansom (1831) 2 Barn. & Ad. 291, 109 Eng. Reprint, 1151, 9 L. J. K. B. 246; Hogg v. Skeen (1865) 18 C. B. N. S. 426, 144 Eng. Reprint, 510, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 153, 11 Jur. N. S. 244, 11 L. T. N. S. 709, 13 Week. Rep. 383; Oakley v. Boulton (1888) 5 Times L. R. 60; Fuller v. Alexander (1882) 47 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 443, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 103.

Musgrave v. Drake (1843) 5 Q. B. 185, 114 Eng. Reprint, 1218, Dar. & M. 347, 13 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 16, 7 Jur. 1015, in which it is held, apparently, that though the partners show that the signature was a fraudulent act on the part of the partner in signing the partnership name, yet, if the proof does not affect the plaintiff with knowledge of the fraud, the plaintiff is not put to give any explanation on account of the transaction, is distinguished in Hogg v. Skeen (Eng.) supra, and the decision in the Musgrave Case attributed, in part, at least, to the pleading.

It was held in Wright v. Brosseau (1874) 73 Ill. 381, that the jury were warranted in finding it to have been a fraudulent transaction for the members of a partnership to have executed the partnership note for a debt of the predecessor of the partnership in which a third member was not a partner, the note being executed without his knowledge or consent.

The execution of a partnership note by one who had formerly been a partner, but who at the time of the execution had retired from the firm, was held to be such fraud as to cast upon the holder the duty of showing his bona fides, in Charles v. Remick (1895) 156 Ill. 327, 40 N. E. 970.

In Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Weston (1900) 162 N. Y. 113, 56 N. E. 494, where the evidence showed that a note purporting to be executed by a partnership was in fact executed by one of the partners after the dissolution of the firm, and antedated so as to appear to have been executed before the dissolution, the payee having knowledge of the facts, it was held that the jury, which found in favor of one of the members of the partnership who had no knowledge of the note, and did not consent to its execution, will be presumed to have found, among other things, that the note was fraudulent as between the payee and the partnership. A similar decision appears in Second Nat. Bank v. Weston (1902) 172 N. Y. 250, 64 N. E. 949, and Second Nat. Bank v. Weston (1900) 161 N. Y. 520, 76 Am. St. Rep. 283, 55 N. E. 1080.

Proof in an action against a corporation on a corporate note that the note was given by an officer of the corporation in payment of his personal debt is held to render title of the payee defective, so as to cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing that he is the holder in due course. De Jonge & Co. v. Woodport Hotel & Land Co. (1909) 77 N. J. L. 233, 72 Atl. 439.

c. Illustrative cases of fraud.

Fraudulent representations in the sale of horses—ordinarily stallions to companies organized for breeding purposes—have been a common source of fraud casting upon the subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides.

The fraudulent representations involved are illustrated by the following cases: A defense by the maker of a note, given upon the purchase of a stallion, that the horse was purchased for breeding purposes, and was represented by the vendors as being sound, good, and suitable therefor, and that defendant relied upon such representations, which were in fact untrue and known to be so by the vendors when made, and that he, upon discovering the defects, rescinded the contract and returned the horse to the vendors, who accepted him and verbally promised to surrender to the defendant his notes given for the purchase price, was held to cast the burden of showing his bona fides upon a subsequent holder in Bennett State Bank v. Schloesser (1897) 101 Iowa, 571, 70 N. W. 705. The jury found specially that the notes were obtained by false representations and the defense seems to be treated as one of fraud in the inception. The breach of a warranty, made upon the sale of a stallion, that the stallion with reasonable care would get with foal 60 per cent of the mares mated with him for a period of two years, and that, if he did not do so, he would be replaced with another of the same breed and price, and that the vendor would keep him insured for a period of two years, and that, in the event the stallion should die within the two years, the vendor would replace him with another, and that the makers need not pay notes given for the purchase price, last maturing, until they were satisfied that the stallion was as guaranteed, seems to have been treated as making the payee's title defective within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law, in Peterson v. Nichols (1913) 71 Wash. 656, 129 Pac. 373. An allegation by the defendant in an action upon notes given for the purchase price of a stallion that the vendors warranted the horse to be sound in every particular, and a sure foal getter, when they well knew that the horse was not sound, and was not a reasonably sure foal getter, was held to be fraud casting the burden upon the subsequent holder to show that he was a holder in due course under the Negotiable Instruments Law, where the defendant further alleged that the notes were given upon the faith and credit of the warranty, and that without it, they would not have signed them, in Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Stein (1912) 21 Pa. Dist. R. 1070. False representations by the vendor of a horse to a number of persons that a certain person who joined in making the note had agreed to become a party to the purchase of the horse, and pay his equal share with the other purchasers, when, as it afterwards transpired, this person was in fact acting as a stool pigeon in the interest of the payee, and when the defendants' signatures were secured to the note was released from all liability thereon, without any consideration except his assistance in perpetrating the fraud, was held to be such fraud as cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides in Cox v. Cline (1908) 139 Iowa, 128, 117 N. W. 48, a case decided under the Negotiable Instruments Law. Such fraud as casts upon the holder the burden of proving that he was a holder in due course was held to exist in Jobes v. Wilson (1910) 140 Mo. App. 281, 124 S. W. 548, in the fact that, after an agent for the sale of a horse had received a large proportion of the purchase price in cash, he fraudulently represented to the purchasers of the horse that it was necessary for them to sign notes for the full amount of the purchase price, that the note sued on would be canceled and returned, and the second note for a like amount would also be canceled and returned, and that a credit of a certain amount would be placed upon a third note, where the makers, relying upon the false and fraudulent representations, were induced to sign the notes.

Fraudulent representations in the sale of corporate stock have also been common sources of fraud.

Nebraska.—Fawcett v. Powell (1895) 43 Neb. 437, 61 N. W. 586.

The agent making the sale in First Nat. Bank v. Wise (1915) 172 Iowa, 24, 151 N. W. 495, where there was held to be fraud in the inception of the note, among other things, represented that the company owned a valuable patent for which it had refused an offer of $125,000, and had purchased ground for a factory site to which it was about to remove its plant. He also exhibited alleged pictures of the plant of the company at another place, where he stated it had property to the value of the issue of stock. On these representations the maker of the note swore that he relied in purchasing the stock, and further testified that upon subsequent investigation he found that the company had no property at the former place, and that the representations made to him concerning the property at the latter place were grossly exaggerated.

Evidence of a representation by one in charge of mines that ore which was scattered over a part of the mines represented their general condition, and would run 4 per cent mineral, which was false and known by the representative to be false, and which induced the purchase of stock in the mining company, was held to be sufficient to entitle the maker of a note given in payment thereof to go to the jury on the question of fraud, in Hill v. Dillon (1910) 151 Mo. App. 86, 131 S. W. 728, s. c. on second appeal in (1913) 176 Mo. App. 192, 161 S. W. 881. But see later appeal in (1916) — Mo. App. —, 183 S. W. 1088.

Fraud in obtaining the original note in a stock transaction seems to have been held to cast the burden upon the subsequent holder of a renewal note which was given, and which was the one in suit, in Barnard v. Tidrick (1915) 35 S. D. 403, 152 N. W. 690.

It is stated in State Bank v. Gates (1901) 114 Iowa, 323, 86 N. W. 311, that misrepresentations by a corporation in the sale of its stock, as to what it would do in the future, do not establish fraud which will vitiate notes given for the stock. It is held in State Bank v. Cook (1904) 125 Iowa, 111, 100 N. W. 72, that the act of the promoters of a corporation in securing a prominent man of influence and reputation to subscribe, upon an inducement of stock at a much lower rate than that at which it was sold to others, concealing the fact from the other subscribers, and leading them to believe that the person thus elected to head the subscription list was a bona fide investor of the amount set opposite his name, may constitute fraud justifying the rescission of the contract on the part of other subscribers. It had previously been held, in State Bank v. Gates (Iowa) supra, a case growing out of the same transaction, that the mere allegation that, by a secret agreement with the other stockholders, stock was transferred to him at a lower rate than that at which defendant's stock was sold to him, did not charge such fraud as would relieve defendant from liability on his note given for such stock, but it is added that such fact might, with others, tend to establish a fraudulent scheme.

The "Bohemian oats" and similar schemes have also furnished their quota of cases involving the question under annotation. Bowser v. Spiesshofer (1891) 4 Ind. App. 349, 30 N. E. 942; Kain v. Bare (1891) 4 Ind. App. 440, 31 N. E. 205; Cover v. Myers (1892) 75 Md. 406, 32 Am. St. Rep. 394, 23 Atl. 850; Mace v. Kennedy (1888) 68 Mich. 389, 36 N. W. 187; Ward v. Doane (1889) 77 Mich. 328, 43 N. W. 980; Gere v. Unger (1889) 125 Pa. 644, 17 Atl. 511. In Sanford v. Moss (1892) 63 Hun, 635, 45 N. Y. S. R. 710, 18 N. Y. Supp. 673, where rye was sold at a high price on the agreement that the vendor was to sell for the purchaser, from the crop raised, double the amount of the original sale at the same price per bushel, in pursuance of which a note was given for the purchase price, the court, in holding that a subsequent holder of the note had the burden of showing his bona fides, seems to rely upon false representations as to the responsibility and standing of the vendor company, although the court adds that it is quite doubtful if the false representation had any influence in inducing the defendant to enter into the contract and give the note. The agreement of the company to sell the rye the following year was not kept.

Other cases involving fraudulent representations disclose the variety of situations in which fraud may exist. Johnson County Sav. Bank v. Mendell (1911) 36 App. D. C. 413 (sale of jewelry); State Nat. Bank v. Bennett (1893) 8 Ind. App. 679, 36 N. E. 551 (sale of patents); Kirby v. Berguin (1902) 15 S. D. 444, 90 N. W. 856 (sale of lightning rods); Underwood v. Leichtman (1920) 188 Iowa, 794, 176 N. W. 683 (sale of lands). False statements and representations as to the number of acres of land, exclusive of a lake which is situated on the premises, was held to constitute such fraud as to cast upon the holder of a note the burden of showing his bona fides, in Rinella v. Faylor (1921) — Iowa, —, 180 N. W. 983. Notes given upon the sale of plans for a popularity contest, which contained many elements of fraud, were held to be given under such circumstances as to cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides, in Commercial Secur. Co. v. Archer (1918) 179 Ky. 842, 201 S. W. 479, and Harrison v. Perry (1919) 184 Ky. 722, 212 S. W. 911.

d. Illustrative cases showing no fraud.

In many cases in which the payee of the note failed to keep a promise made at the time of securing the note, there has been held to be no fraud. The fact that the drawer of a bill, which had been accepted for his accommodation, failed to keep his promise to place in the acceptor's hands funds or goods to meet the bill upon its maturity, seems to have been regarded in Ellcott v. Martin (1854) 6 Md. 509, 61 Am. Dec. 327, as not to be such fraud as to cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. The only defense attempted in First Nat. Bank v. McNairy (1913) 122 Minn. 215, 142 N. W. 139, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 977, in an action by the holder of a note against the maker, was an offset to the note arising from the breach of an alleged warranty in the sale of an automobile, and the court holds that the evidence fails to show such fraud in the transaction leading to the execution of the note as to cast the burden upon the plaintiff to show his bona fides. In Kelman v. Calhoun (1895) 43 Neb. 157, 61 N. W. 615, an action by a subsequent holder of a cussion. It cannot be said that the cases adhering to this view are convincing of its correctness. It does not appear that the question was given much consideration. Moreover, the great number of cases adhering to the opposite theory, together with the wording of the Negotiable Instruments Act, makes the opposite conclusion seem the correct one.

V. What constitutes fraud within the rule.

a. In general.

Fraud, as it is known in the law, is well summed up by the supreme court of Washington as follows: "The essential elements of representations to constitute fraud, whether as a defense or as a cause of action, are undoubtedly the same. They are these: The representations must have been made as to a material matter; they must be false; it must appear that the maker knew them to be false, or made them recklessly as facts, without knowledge of their truth; they must have been made with the intention that they should be acted upon by the other party; the other party must have acted in reliance upon them, and he must have thereby suffered injury." Hamilton v. Milhills (1916) 92 Wash. 675, 159 Pac. 887.

When the foregoing elements are present in a transaction, fraud exists, and if the action taken by the defrauded party is the execution and delivery of a negotiable instrument, there is such fraud in the inception of the instrument as casts upon a subsequent holder thereof the burden of showing that he is a holder in due course, if he relies upon his character as such to cut off defenses. The following pages show that fraud has arisen in a great variety of transactions. While for convenience the cases have been grouped according to the transaction in which the fraudulent representations were made, it must be understood that it is the fraudulent representations that constitute the fraud, and not the character of the transaction, that is, whether a sale of land, or a sale of horses, etc. In many of the cases in which fraud was held to exist, the facts constituting the fraud have been so involved that setting them out would serve no useful purpose. In other cases the courts have not clearly stated the representations constituting the fraud, and no exhaustive discussion of these cases has been attempted. However, for the purpose of furnishing representative cases dealing with various states of facts, a number of cases have been listed under a brief statement of the facts out of which the fraud arose. See V. c, infra.

There are, of course, certain questions of law as to whether certain representations or the creation of certain appearances constitute fraud, and these questions will be noticed. It must be remembered, however, in this connection, that this note deals primarily with an evidentiary question, and the evidentiary question is confined to bills and notes, so that no exhaustive presentation of any representations or states of facts will appear. Obtaining a check in payment of a bet on a fake horse race has been held such fraud as casts upon a subsequent holder the burden of proving his bona fides. Arkansas Nat. Bank v. Martin (1914) 110 Ark. 578, 163 S. W. 795. The execution of a note by a client to his attorney within the time of the employment and the existence of the confidential relation, for a fee which was agreed upon at the time, was presumed to have been fraudulent in Shirk v. Neible (1901) 156 Ind. 66, 83 Am. St. Rep. 150, 59 N. E. 281. In Asbury v. Taube (1912) 151 Ky. 142, 151 S. W. 372, the failure of a vendor of horses to whom the purchaser had given a check for the amount of the purchase price, to deliver the horses as agreed, the explanation being offered that one of the horses had become sick and could not be delivered, whereupon the purchaser demanded a return of the check, which was refused, was treated as fraud casting upon one to whom the check had been transferred the burden of proving his bona fides. Nothing is said as to an intention on the part of the vendor at the time of obtaining the check, of failing to deliver the horses, and there is little discussion of the question. In Ganz v. Weisenberger (1896) 66 Mo. App. 110, the holder of a note was held to have the burden of proof where it appeared that the maker signed a contract with an agent to put up lightning rods which he supposed called for the payment of $5; but where in a few days another person drove to his home and told him that the contract called for $150 for his house alone, and that, unless he would sign a note for this amount, the person would obtain a United States marshal and turn him out of house and home, whereupon he, being frightened, signed the note; the court says that this was evidence showing that the note originated in fraud. The receipt by an insolvent bank for deposit, of a check drawn by the depositor on another bank in his own favor without knowledge of the insolvent condition of the bank of deposit, seems to be treated as a fraud which will cast upon a subsequent holder of the check the burden of showing his bona fides, in Grant v. Walsh (1895) 145 N. Y. 502, 45 Am. St. Rep. 626, 40 N. E. 209. The obtaining of a check surreptitiously and without authority from the drawer, and filling in the name of the person thus obtaining the check as payee, was treated as such fraud as cast the burden upon the subsequent holder, in Ern v. Rubinstein (1897) 72 Mo. App. 337.

It has been argued that the fraud which casts upon a subsequent holder the burden of proving that he is a holder in due course under the Negotiable Instruments Law consists of some trick or device that induces the giving of the negotiable instrument under the belief that some instrument of a different kind is being given. There is some indication in Kellogg v. Hale (1914) 190 Ill. App. 15, that this is the view of the court in that case, but it seems that the attention of the court was directed more to the substantive question as to what fraud would defeat recovery by a bona fide holder, than to the evidential question as to the burden of proof. It seems clear that such fraud does cast upon the subsequent holder the burden of providing his bona fides. And so it has been held such fraud as casts upon the holder the burden of proving his bona fide character that the person who took a bill of exchange, knowing it to be such, procured it by the false statement that it was an ordinary note, and the parties who gave the bill did it in ignorance of its true character and in reliance upon the false statement made to them. Ross v. Drunkard (1860) 35 Ala. 434. In Baldwin v. Fagan (1882) 83 Ind. 447, the fraud consisted in falsely reading to the payee of a note, who was illiterate and almost blind, and misrepresentation of its contents. A note procured by the representation of the payee that it was merely a recommendation required by an insurance company to enable the payee to become their agent, on which the maker relies in signing the note, is tainted with fraud in its inception, so as to throw upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. Cahen v. Everitt (1901) 67 App. Div. 86, 73 N. Y. Supp. 549.

But generally the view that the fraud which casts upon the holder the burden of proving that he is a holder in due course is confined to fraud as to the character of the instrument has not been followed. Fraud relating to the consideration of a note is held to cast the burden upon the holder. First Nat. Bank v. Denfeld (1919) 143 Minn. 281, 173 N. W. 661. It has been held that the burden of showing his bona fides rests upon the holder of a note when there is fraud in the inception, even though the fraud affected the consideration. City Deposit Bank v. Green (1908) 138 Iowa, 156, 115 N. W. 893. This rule that fraud relating to the consideration casts the burden of proving his bona fides upon the holder is supported by the great majority of the cases, although not directly discussing it, for in most cases the fraud consisted in misrepresentations concerning the goods or articles for which the note was given. It must be remembered in this connection that, while fraud may arise from misrepresentations as to the consideration for the instrument, not every failure of consideration amounts to fraud. It is perhaps true that no consistent rule of distinction can be formulated. Facts which are regarded by one court as showing a failure of consideration are regarded by another as showing fraud.

The broader distinction between the two things is illustrated by the decision in Violet v. Rose (1894) 39 Neb. 660, 58 N. W. 216, that the representation by the payee of a note to the maker concerning a deed of assignment given to secure the maker for executing the note, that the name of the payee's wife appearing on the assignment was her genuine signature, when in fact it was not, is fraud, casting the burden of proof upon a subsequent holder, if the maker relied upon such representation in executing the note. If, on the contrary, the deed of assignment failed merely because the wife refused or failed thereafter to acknowledge the instrument, as the payee of the note agreed she would do, there would be merely a failure of consideration, and not fraud which would cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. Another illustration is furnished by the decision in McKinley v. Beggs (1902) 17 Colo. App. 23, 67 Pac. 1019, an action by a subsequent holder upon a note given for services rendered or supposed to have been rendered, by the payee, a subsequent holder, the mere fact that the services were not rendered was held not to show that the note was secured by fraud, where there was no offer to show that the payee had falsely stated any facts to the maker for the purpose of inducing the execution of the note.

A failure of title to the object which constituted the consideration has been held to cast the burden on the holder. For instance, the sale of mules which had been stolen by the vendor was, in Famous Shoe & Clothing Co. v. Crosswhite (1894) 124 Mo. 34, 26 L.R.A. 568, 46 Am. St. Rep. 424, 27 S. W. 397, treated as such fraud

as to cast upon the subsequent holder of a check given for the purchase price the burden of proving his bona fides. Evidence supporting a charge that the payee of the note assumed to be the owner of a right to sell a certain wire-fence machine, and agreed in writing with the maker of the note to appoint him general agent, which agreement, together with the sale of certain machines, furnished the sole consideration for the execution of the note, when in fact the payee did not own the right, but had sold it previously to another person, was held to raise the issue of fraud which cast the burden upon the purchaser to show his good faith, in Stewart v. Andes (1905) 110 Mo. App. 243, 84 S. W. 1134. Notes given in payment for certain shares of stock which the person to whom the notes were given represented belonged to him, when in fact they did not and he knew they did not, were held to have been obtained by fraud, so as to cast the burden upon a subsequent holder of showing his bona fides, in Hale v. Shannon (1890) 57 Hun, 466, 32 N. Y. S. R. 1079, 11 N. Y. Supp. 129. It further appeared in this case that the person obtaining the notes agreed to hold them and to part with them only to the maker, and on their gradual payment by the profits to be derived from the stock. In Pelly v. Onderdonk (1891) 61 Hun, 314, 15 N. Y. Supp. 915, the maker of a note pleaded that the person to whom the note was given claimed to be the owner and inventor of processes for the manufacture of different articles of paint, and also for the manufacture of a liquid called pyrodene. These articles of paint and this liquid were alleged to have been falsely represented to the defendants as to their quality and utility, and the profits that could be derived from their manufacture and sale, and it was further alleged that the representations were fraudulently made for the purpose of inducing the defendants and others to associate together and form a corporation, in the organization of which the note in question was given. It was urged that the mere failure of consideration did not cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. In answer to this contention the court says that the defense in this case did not depend upon a failure of consideration, but was placed upon the ground that the note had been fraudulently obtained.

Fraudulent representations as to value have also been held to cast the burden on the subsequent holder. Thus, notes induced by false representations as to the value and character of lands have been held to be fraudulent in inception, so as to cast the burden of showing bona fides on a subsequent holder. Eames v. Crozier (1894) 101 Cal. 260, 35 Pac. 873. Representations by the vendor of a secondhand X-ray machine who knew its value, as to the value thereof, in negotiations leading up to a sale to one who had no such knowledge, were held to amount to fraud in Scheidel Western X-Ray Co. v. Bacon (1918) — Mo. App. —, 201 S. W. 917. The court here recognizes the difficulty of determining when a representation as to value is a mere expression of opinion, or is one of fact, but concludes in this case that the representation was not a mere opinion. In Vickery v. Burton (1896) 6 N. D. 245, 69 N. W. 193, where, in an action by a subsequent holder of a note given for certain machinery, the maker pleaded certain false and fraudulent representations concerning the quality of the machinery, and alleged that it was not worth a greater sum than was paid down in cash, and that the notes were wholly without consideration, the court says: "There is much conflict of judicial opinion as to whether, where fraud in a sale of property as between the vendor and vendee is shown, such showing operates to shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff in a case where negotiable paper given for the property by the purchaser is sued on by an indorsee of the paper. We think the better reason and the weight of authority support the view that proof of such fraud does shift the burden of proof, and that in such cases, after proof of fraud, the plaintiff has the burden of showing a good-faith purchase of such paper in due course and without notice." An affidavit of defense that the note was procured by false and fraudulent representations, in the first instance, in reference to the value of the property in part payment of which the note was given, and that the defendants had a full, just, and legal defense to the payment of the note, in this, that the consideration therefor had failed, coupled with the denial of the plaintiff's title, was held sufficient to put the latter upon proof that he was a bona fide holder, in Reamer v. Bell (1875) 79 Pa. 292. The fraudulent representations which were held to cast the burden upon the holder of the note of showing his bona fides, in Zook v. Simonson (1880) 72 Ind. 83, were fraudulent representations as to the skill and ability of the payee in grafting fruit trees, in consideration of certain work of which kind the note was given. Fraudulent representations by the payee of a note given for the purchase price of a buggy that the buggy was new and of the value named in the note, when in truth the property was old and secondhand, but had been newly painted and varnished so that its real condition could not be observed, were held to be fraud casting the burden upon a subsequent holder, where the maker of the note relied upon the false and fraudulent representations so made, and believed them to be true. Bradley, H. & Co. v. Whicker (1899) 23 Ind. App. 380, 55 N. E. 490. Representations by a vendor of cigars as to the number and quality of the cigars, which were false, and upon which the purchaser relied in executing a note, were held to cast upon the holder of the note the burden of showing his bona fides, in Owens v. Snell (1896) 29 Or. 483, 44 Pac. 827.

Fraudulent representations as to quantity have also been held to cast the burden on the subsequent holder. The representation of a vendor of corn to the purchaser as to the quantity was held to be fraudulent, casting upon the subsequent holder of a note given for the purchase price of the corn the burden of showing his bona fides, where the vendor was a farmer accustomed to growing and measuring corn, and assumed to know and stated the quantity, and the purchaser, on the other hand, was a merchant tailor wholly without knowledge or experience in measuring corn in the field, whose ignorance and inexperience in the matter were well known to the vendor, if the misrepresentations were made with intent to deceive, and the purchaser relied thereon to his injury. Abmeyer v. First Nat. Bank (1907) 76 Kan. 877, 92 Pac. 1109.

See Owens v. Snell (1896) 29 Or. 483, 44 Pac. 827, supra.

Even failure to keep an agreement has been held to be evidence of a fraudulent intent. Where the agent for a fence machine procured the note in question upon his agreement that it should not be used by his principal, but deposited in a bank selected by the defendant, who thereafter assisted him in securing a subagent, who in turn gave a note for $100, a part of which was to be paid to the defendant for his commission, and subsequently the agent sold both notes and appropriated the entire proceeds, such evidence tends to prove a fraudulent intent on the part of the agent in obtaining the note. Rochford v. Barrett (1908) 22 S. D. 83, 115 N. W. 522.

Fraudulent representations as to a material fact have been frequently held the source of fraud. Evidence that the payee of a note given for corporate stock represented that the corporation held certain patents, and that the shares of stock were worth what the purchaser paid therefor and would rapidly increase in value,—representations that were untrue, the company having no patent and the stock being of no substantial value,—was held sufficient to authorize a submission of the case to the jury upon the question of fraud in procuring the notes, in Lentz v. Landers (1919) 21 Ariz. 117, 185 Pac. 821. A further promise was made by the seller of the stock that, if the purchaser at the end of a year so desired, he would repur-

chase the stock at a considerable advance over the purchase price, a promise which he did not intend to keep. The holder of a check given to a stockbroker upon a purchase of stock which the broker represented had been ordered transferred to the purchaser's name on the books of the corporation, whereas in fact it was not so transferred,—the broker at the time the check was delivered to the subsequent holder being insolvent, and having taken proceedings looking to the appointment of a receiver,—was held to have the burden of showing his bona fides on the theory that the transaction between the broker and the drawer of the check was a fraudulent one, and that the title to the check by reason thereof was defective within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law. People's State Bank v. Miller (1915) 185 Mich. 565, 152 N. W. 257. In a purchase and sale of a series of notes, a representation that a former note in the series, which had fallen due before the transaction in question, had been paid, when as a matter of fact it had not, was held to be fraudulent where it was known by the vendor to be untrue, in MacLaren v. Cochran (1890) 44 Minn. 255, 46 N. W. 408. The representations of an attorney employed to defend an ejectment suit, for which his fee was fixed at a certain sum and a certain larger sum if he succeeded in getting his client a clear title, that he had obtained for him a clear title, on which representation the client executed to him a note for the larger amount, is such fraud as casts upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides. Knowlton v. Schultz (1897) 6 N. D. 417, 71 N. W. 550. An affidavit of defense by the maker of a note given for the purchase price of pepper that, before the note became due, the payee was employed by the maker to make sale of the pepper upon such terms that the proceeds of the pepper would meet the note at maturity, and that afterwards the payee represented that he had sold the pepper on the maker's account, but on such terms that the note must be renewed in order that the time of the maturity of the note might agree with the time the proceeds of the pepper would be received, and upon these representations the note was renewed, when in fact the payee, instead of having sold the pepper on account of the maker, had converted it to his own use, was held to be such fraud in the inception as to cast upon the holder the burden of showing his bona fides, in Hutchinson v. Boggs & Kirk (1857) 28 Pa. 294. Where a party executed an accommodation note for another, sending it to him in a letter through the mail, and was advised by the accommodated party that the letter had been received, but had been opened by some person and the note taken out, and requesting the maker to inclose another note, stating that if he got the first note in his possession he would return it, whereupon the maker inclosed another note for the same amount, payable in the same length of time, the second note having been negotiated by the payee, protested, suit brought, and judgment obtained thereon against the defendant, it was held to be clear that the first note had thrown around it a cloud of suspicion and fraud which called upon a holder thereof to show that he obtained it upon a valuable consideration, in the usual course of business, before maturity. Hoffman v. Foster (1862) 43 Pa. 137. The representation by a book agent that the books for which note was given were a special, limited, extra-illustrated edition, in reliance upon which the defendant executed the note, and which representation was entirely false and untrue, was held to constitute such fraud in the obtaining of the note as to cast upon the plaintiff the burden of showing his bona fides. Schultheis v. Sellers (1909) 223 Pa. 513, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1210, 72 Atl. 887 (a case decided under the Negotiable Instruments Law). The representation by the payee of a note to the maker, who was illiterate, that it was a note for not over $300, when in fact it had been left blank in part, and was subsequently filled up for a note of $4,200, is such fraud as casts upon the plaintiff the burden of showing his bona fides. Howie v. Lewis (1900) 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 232. An affidavit of defense saying that the payee of the note came to the maker and told him that he had purchased some merchandise, and that he was without sufficient funds with which to pay for the same, and requested the maker to purchase the merchandise, and offered to accept the note in question in payment therefor, saying that he would use the note for the payment to his vendor for the merchandise, and deliver it at once to the maker of the note,—representations which were false, and upon which the maker relied in giving the note,—were held to constitute fraud in the inception, in Eliel v. Chamberlain (1912) 48 Pa. Super. Ct. 610. In City Deposit Bank v. Green (1908) 138 Iowa, 156, 115 N. W. 893, the fraud consisted in the representation by the payee of a joint and several note that all the subscribers thereto would be responsible, and the failure of the payee to obtain all responsible subscribers, but the acceptance of one who was insolvent.

See supra, as to representations as to title.

b. Fraud in the execution of partnership and corporate notes.

The execution by one partner of a note in the partnership name for the accommodation of a third person, the partnership receiving no benefit therefrom, is held to throw the burden of proving his bona fides upon a subsequent holder. First Nat. Bank v. Weston (1897) 24 App. Div. 230, 48 N. Y. Supp. 403; Porter v. Gunnison (1854) 2 Grant. Cas. (Pa.) 297. Such a note is fraudulent. Porter v. Gunnison (Pa.) supra. That such a note, executed after the dissolution of the firm, is fraudulent, is held in Albietz v. Mellon (1860) 37 Pa. 367. That such a note is fraudulent is held in Second Nat. Bank v. Weston (1898) 31 App. Div. 403, 52 N. Y. Supp. 315, reversed on other grounds in (1900) 161 N. Y. 520, 76 Am. St. Rep. 283, 55 N. E. 1080, s. c. on subsequent appeal in (1901) 62 App. Div. 621, 70 N. Y. Supp. 995, where it was executed after the dissolution of the firm, and antedated.

A partnership bill or note executed by a partner for his own private debt is a fraud upon the other partner which casts the burden of proving his bona fides upon the holder. Porter v. Gunnison (1854) 2 Grant, Cas. (Pa.) 297; Stevens v. McLachlan (1899) 120 Mich. 285, 79 N. W. 627; Real Estate Invest. Co. v. Russel (1892) 148 Pa. 496, 24 Atl. 59; Loeb v. Mellinger (1900) 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 592, 17 Lanc. L. Rev. 129; Bank v. Cunningham (1877) 4 W. N. C. (Pa.) 414; Heath v. Sansom (1831) 2 Barn. & Ad. 291, 109 Eng. Reprint, 1151, 9 L. J. K. B. 246; Hogg v. Skeen (1865) 18 C. B. N. S. 426, 144 Eng. Reprint, 510, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 153, 11 Jur. N. S. 244, 11 L. T. N. S. 709, 13 Week. Rep. 383; Oakley v. Boulton (1888) 5 Times L. R. 60; Fuller v. Alexander (1882) 47 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 443, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 103.

Musgrave v. Drake (1843) 5 Q. B. 185, 114 Eng. Reprint, 1218, Dar. & M. 347, 13 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 16, 7 Jur. 1015, in which it is held, apparently, that though the partners show that the signature was a fraudulent act on the part of the partner in signing the partnership name, yet, if the proof does not affect the plaintiff with knowledge of the fraud, the plaintiff is not put to give any explanation on account of the transaction, is distinguished in Hogg v. Skeen (Eng.) supra, and the decision in the Musgrave Case attributed, in part, at least, to the pleading.

It was held in Wright v. Brosseau (1874) 73 Ill. 381, that the jury were warranted in finding it to have been a fraudulent transaction for the members of a partnership to have executed the partnership note for a debt of the predecessor of the partnership in which a third member was not a partner, the note being executed without his knowledge or consent.

The execution of a partnership note by one who had formerly been a partner, but who at the time of the execution had retired from the firm, was held to be such fraud as to cast upon the holder the duty of showing his bona fides, in Charles v. Remick (1895) 156 Ill. 327, 40 N. E. 970.

In Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Weston (1900) 162 N. Y. 113, 56 N. E. 494, where the evidence showed that a note purporting to be executed by a partnership was in fact executed by one of the partners after the dissolution of the firm, and antedated so as to appear to have been executed before the dissolution, the payee having knowledge of the facts, it was held that the jury, which found in favor of one of the members of the partnership who had no knowledge of the note, and did not consent to its execution, will be presumed to have found, among other things, that the note was fraudulent as between the payee and the partnership. A similar decision appears in Second Nat. Bank v. Weston (1902) 172 N. Y. 250, 64 N. E. 949, and Second Nat. Bank v. Weston (1900) 161 N. Y. 520, 76 Am. St. Rep. 283, 55 N. E. 1080.

Proof in an action against a corporation on a corporate note that the note was given by an officer of the corporation in payment of his personal debt is held to render title of the payee defective, so as to cast upon a subsequent holder the burden of showing that he is the holder in due course. De Jonge & Co. v. Woodport Hotel & Land Co. (1909) 77 N. J. L. 233, 72 Atl. 439.

c. Illustrative cases of fraud.

Fraudulent representations in the sale of horses—ordinarily stallions to companies organized for breeding purposes—have been a common source of fraud casting upon the subsequent holder the burden of showing his bona fides.

Washington. — City Nat. Bank v. Mason (1910) 58 Wash. 492, 108 Pac. 1071.

The fraudulent representations involved are illustrated by the following cases: A defense by the maker of a note, given upon the purchase of a stallion, that the horse was purchased for breeding purposes, and was represented by the vendors as being sound, good, and suitable therefor, and that defendant relied upon such representations, which were in fact untrue and known to be so by the vendors when made, and that he, upon discovering the defects, rescinded the contract and returned the horse to the vendors, who accepted him and verbally promised to surrender to the defendant his notes given for the purchase price, was held to cast the burden of showing his bona fides upon a subsequent holder in Bennett State Bank v. Schloesser (1897) 101 Iowa, 571, 70 N. W. 705. The jury found specially that the notes were obtained by false representations and the defense seems to be treated as one of fraud in the inception. The breach of a warranty, made upon the sale of a stallion, that the stallion with reasonable care would get with foal 60 per cent of the mares mated with him for a period of two years, and that, if he did not do so, he would be replaced with another of the same breed and price, and that the vendor would keep him insured for a period of two years, and that, in the event the stallion should die within the two years, the vendor would replace him with another, and that the makers need not pay notes given for the purchase price, last maturing, until they were satisfied that the stallion was as guaranteed, seems to have been treated as making the payee's title defective within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law, in Peterson v. Nichols (1913) 71 Wash. 656, 129 Pac. 373. An allegation by the defendant in an action upon notes given for the purchase price of a stallion that the vendors warranted the horse to be sound in every particular, and a sure foal getter, when they well knew that the horse was not sound, and was not a reasonably sure foal getter, was held to be fraud casting the burden upon the subsequent holder to show that he was a holder in due course under the Negotiable Instruments Law, where the defendant further alleged that the notes were given upon the faith and credit of the warranty, and that without it, they would not have signed them, in Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Stein (1912) 21 Pa. Dist. R. 1070. False representations by the vendor of a horse to a number of persons that a certain person who joined in making the note had agreed to become a party to the purchase of the horse, and pay his equal share with the other purchasers, when, as it afterwards transpired, this person was in fact acting as a stool pigeon in the interest of the payee, and when the defendants' signatures were secured to the note was released from all liability thereon, without any consideration except his assistance in perpetrating the fraud, was held to be

Bryan, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant in error (herein called plaintiff) recovered judgment against plaintiff in error as Director General of Railroads (herein called defendant), operating the Pullman Company, for $5,000, in an action for damages arising out of the alleged conduct of a porter of the Pullman Company.

Plaintiff, a lady passenger on a train of the Pennsylvania Railroad, was traveling in an ordinary passenger coach from St. Louis, Missouri, to Columbus, Ohio. The train included a dining car and a sleeping car of the Pullman Company. Plaintiff and two lady companions applied to the sleeping car conductor, who was at the time in the dining car, for permission to enter the sleeping car and make use of the dressing room and lavatory facilities therein, and offered to pay for the privilege.

Testimony on behalf of the plaintiff was to the effect that the sleeping car conductor granted the permission desired, but declined to accept anything in payment for the use of the dressing room; that thereupon plaintiff and her companions proceeded into the said dressing room; that while there the sleeping car porter, in a rude and insulting manner, ordered them to leave; that a member of plaintiff's party told the porter to get out of the dressing room, and stated to him that they were there by permission of the conductor, and that, if he did not leave them alone, they would send for their husbands; and that the porter replied, in substance: "Send your damn husbands back. I would like to see them, and will settle with them." Plaintiff testified that her health was greatly impaired as a result of the porter's conduct. The testimony for defendant was in direct contradiction of that for plaintiff.

At the close of all the evidence the defendant moved for a directed verdict in his favor, on the ground that it affirmatively appeared that plaintiff was not a passenger of the Pullman Company. The trial court denied this motion, and instructed the jury that, if they believed plaintiff's evidence, that would constitute her a passenger, and entitle her to the care due to a passenger. Defendant assigns error upon the denial of his motion for a directed verdict, and also upon the overruling of his exception to the court's charge, submitting to the jury the question of whether plaintiff became a passenger.

The duty which the defendant owed to a licensee or a trespasser was not, and is neither alleged nor claimed to have been, violated. Unless plaintiff was a passenger, she has no case.

While the question whether, as a matter of law, the relation of carrier and passenger exists, is often a difficult one, and in many cases is one of mixed law and fact, nevertheless such relation does not exist, if neither party intended to create it. Sleeping car companies are engaged in the business of transportation of passengers. The dressing rooms, lavatories, and other conveniences and facilities contained in the cars which they furnish are incidental to their business of transportation, and are provided exclusively for the use of those who become their passengers. One who enters a sleeping car for the sole purpose of making use of these conveniences and facilities does not thereby become a passenger. Plaintiff and her companions were not seeking passage or transportation; they did not enter the sleeping car with the intention of riding from one station to another, or for any particular length of time, or for the purpose of riding at all. The use of the dressing room was the principal thing with them, and riding in the sleeping car was a mere incident. It would have suited their purpose just as well if the train had been standing still at a station.

The plaintiff was not in a situation similar to one who, without a ticket, enters a sleeping car, intending to pay if required to do so. She had obtained the consent of the conductor before she entered the car, and, according to her own testimony, she did not enter with the intention of paying for the privilege of riding in the sleeping car, or for that purpose. We are of opinion, therefore, that the trial court erred in refusing to direct a verdict in favor of defendant. The cases of Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 40 La. Ann. 87, 8 Am. St. Rep. 512, 3 So. 631, and Cassedy v. Pullman Palace Car Co. — Miss. —, 17 So. 373, cited by counsel for defendant, sustain this view.

The other assignments of error need not be considered.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ANNOTATION.

Status of passenger in ordinary coach who enters Pullman coach for temporary purpose.

It will be seen that in the reported case (PAYNE v. SHEARER, ante, 69) the plaintiff, a female passenger in an ordinary coach, applied to the Pullman sleeping car conductor for leave to use the dressing room in the sleeping car, offering to pay for the privilege, and he granted the leave asked for and declined to receive pay therefor; and that, while she was using the dressing room accordingly, she was insulted by the sleeping car porter; and that it was held that she could not recover of the Director General of Railroads operating the Pullman Company, as she was not a passenger of the Pullman Company.

That a Pullman Company is not liable for an assault committed by its porter on a passenger in a day coach, who had gone into the sleeping car for the purpose of requesting permission to wash, was held in Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co. (1888) 40 La. Ann. 87, 8 Am. St. Rep. 512, 3 So. 631. The court based its decision on the absence of any contractual relations between such passenger and the sleeping car company, and also on the fact that the general principles of the law of master and servant were inapplicable to the case. As to the latter point the court said: "The great difficulty in applying these principles lies in defining what acts properly fall within the scope of the servant's employment. The evidence in this case establishes that the porters employed in defendant's service are mere menials, employed to clean up the car and keep it in order, and to wait upon the passengers, having no police authority whatever, and no connection with the enforcement of the rules of the service except to report violations of them to the conductor. Anything more completely outside of 'the functions in which he was employed' than the assault committed on the plaintiff could hardly be conceived. If it had been his duty forcibly to prevent the plaintiff from entering the car, or to put him out at all, and, in performing this duty, he had used wanton and needless violence, inflicting injury, defendant might have been responsible. But he had no such duty or authority. We do not lose sight of the fact that plaintiff was not a trespasser, but had a right to enter the car for the purpose of asking permission to wash his hands, or of trying to hire the privilege, and that, in addressing the porter, he was dealing with him as a servant of the company. This emphasizes the outrage to which he was subjected, but would be a dangerous ground for holding the employer responsible."

In Cassedy v. Pullman Palace-Car Co. (1895) — Miss. —, 17 So. 373, it was held that a passenger in a day coach, who goes into a sleeping car for the sole purpose of inducing the steward to sell him liquor, in violation of law, and also in violation of the company's instructions to the steward, being technically a trespasser, cannot hold the sleeping car company liable for an assault committed upon him by the steward.

In Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Raine (1908) 130 Ky. 454, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 753, 132 Am. St. Rep. 400, 113

S. W. 495, it is held that a passenger who boards a train after telegraphing for a reservation on a certain Pullman car which is not attached to that train, but will be picked up a few miles down the road, and is allowed to remain in a Pullman car, pending the arrival of the one on which she has a reservation, is not a passenger of the Pullman Company, and it is not liable for negligence of its conductor which results in her missing her car.

Upon the facts in the above case of Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co. it was held in a further opinion, 40 La. Ann. 417, 8 Am. St. Rep. 538, 4 So. 85, 8 Am. Neg. Cas. 302, that the railroad company was liable to the passenger for the assault of the Pullman Company's porter, on the ground that the porter must be considered an employee of the railroad company, "and, as such, intrusted with the duty of contributing, in the performance of his legitimate duties, to the safety and security of the passenger whom the railway company had undertaken to carry safely over its line."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ashley (1916) 169 Ky. 330, L.R.A.1916E, 763, 183 S. W. 921, where a woman, somewhat infirm, entered a Pullman car by mistake, and was ordered out of it by the porter several times while the train was in motion, and, in attempting to leave it, was thrown down by a lurch of the car and injured, it seems to have been taken for granted that the railroad company was liable for the conduct of the porter. In that case the plaintiff was directed to go into the coach by a brakeman and by the porter. It was held that it was a question for the jury to determine whether the railroad company, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have known that, because of age, bodily infirmity, the speed and motion of the train, or other circumstances, the safety of the passenger would be endangered by the attempt.

In Thorpe v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1879) 76 N. Y. 402, 32 Am. Rep. 325, a passenger on a train, finding no vacant seats in the ordinary coaches, entered the drawing-room car, declined to pay the sum demanded for a seat there, expressing a willingness to leave the car whenever he could get a seat in an ordinary car, and the porter attempted to eject him. It was held that the railroad company was liable for the assault, notwithstanding that the car was owned by a third party, who employed the porter. It was also held that, although there were several seats filled with passengers' baggage, it was not the duty of the passenger to ask the conductor for a seat before going into the drawing-room car, where, if the baggage had been removed, there would not have been enough seats to supply all the passengers who were standing. The court said: "The persons in charge of the drawing-room car are to be regarded and treated, in respect of their dealings with passengers, as the servants of the defendant, and that the defendant is responsible for their acts to the same extent as if they were directly employed by the company. . . . The plaintiff cannot be deemed a wrongdoer, in passing into the drawing-room car and taking a seat, until seats in the other cars should be vacated. It was the duty of the defendant to furnish him a seat. His omission to speak to the conductor and for a seat, when he first met him, may reasonably be accounted for on the ground that he supposed that such a request, at that time, would be unavailing. So far as appears, there was no regulation—at least, none known to the plaintiff—prohibiting a passenger not intending to ride in a drawing-room car from entering it for a temporary purpose, under circumstances such as existed in this case."

In Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Raine (Ky.) supra, it was also held that a railroad company (the connecting carrier) receiving a sleeping car from another company upon which is a passenger for a car on its train whom the conductor of the former car has undertaken to put on the right car is not liable for sending the right car forward in the first section of the train, so that the passenger does not get it, where it had no notice of her desire until after the train had been separated, and its conductor did all he could to rectify the mistake after learning of it. But it was also held in the same case that where a sleeping car conductor undertakes, in the presence of the train conductor, to put a lady holding a railroad ticket on the right Pullman car, and tells her to remain in his car until the desired car arrives, the railroad company (the initial carrier) is liable for his neglect to do so, but that such railroad company, which negligently causes a passenger to miss a train on a connecting road, so that she is compelled to stop over at a way station and return home, is not liable for injury to her through going into a cold room of a hotel and sitting up all night, or for vexation or personal inconvenience because of the delay, but may be chargeable for hotel bills and lost time.

The reported case (PAYNE v. SHEARER ante, 69) does not appear to pass upon the liability of the railroad company for the insults of the sleeping car porter.

In Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Raine (Ky.) supra, the initial carrier railroad company was held liable for damages to the passenger, due to missing her car at the junction, where she relied upon the assurance of a Pullman conductor of the car on which she was permitted to ride, assented to by the train conductor, that he would transfer her to the proper sleeper, and he made no effort to do so until the car on which she was riding had left the junction, when it was discovered that the car in which she had her reservation had been put in another section; but the connecting carrier (railroad company) was held not liable; it appears that its employees did all they could to rectify the error for which they were not responsible.

EARL G. PAGE.

(— R. I. —, 114 Atl. 136.)

Automobile — duty of one letting for hire — defective condition.

1. One who, for hire, lets an automobile to be operated upon the public highway, is bound to use ordinary care to see that the steering gear is in reasonably safe condition to prevent injury to other persons lawfully using the highway.

— defective steering gear — liability for injury.

2. One letting an automobile for hire, to be used on a public highway, with the steering gear in defective condition, is liable for injury to a traveler on the highway by the machine becoming ungovernable because of such defect.

EXCEPTION by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Providence and Bristol Counties (Barrows, J.), made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's automobile, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in the sustaining of a demurrer to the amended declaration. Exception sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William A. Gunning for plaintiff.

Messrs. Cushing, Carroll, & McCartin for defendant.

Sweeney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case for negligence on account of a collision between the automobiles of the plaintiff and the defendant. Demurrer to the amended declaration was sustained by a justice of the superior court, and the plaintiff has brought the case to this court by his exception.

The declaration contains three counts, and the third one avers that the defendant was the keeper of a public garage, letting automobiles for public hire in said city; that he, or his servant, negligently rented or let an automobile to a person, full well knowing, or, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, should have well known, that the same was in a bad, unsafe, and dangerous state of repair on account of some bolts being loose, which ordinarily made the radius rod of said automobile secure, so that, while it was being driven by said person on a public highway in said city, it became ungovernable and a menace to the safety of the public, and ran into the automobile of the plaintiff, then being driven upon said highway, and damaged it.

The facts are not fully set forth in the first and second counts, because it does not appear in either of them whether the defendant, his agent or a bailee, was operating the automobile at said time.

The defendant filed three grounds of demurrer to the declaration, claiming: (1) That the facts stated gave rise to no duty from the defendant to the plaintiff; (2) that an automobile is not an imminently dangerous article, and no privity of contract existed between the defendant and the plaintiff; and (3) that it is not alleged that the defendant actually knew of the defective condition of the automobile.

The demurrer was sustained under authority of the case of McCaffrey v. Mossberg Mfg. Co. 23 R. I. 381, 55 L.R.A. 822, 91 Am. St. Rep. 637, 50 Atl. 651, in which this court held that the maker of a machine, which he sold to another, is not liable to a third person for injuries received by him, arising from negligence in the construction of the machine, because the machine was not imminently dangerous, nor was its maker guilty of deceit or fraud in selling it, having knowledge of its defect. In so holding, the court said, on page 386 of 23 R. I.: "The third class of cases relating to the sale of a thing not in its nature dangerous rests on the principle that, as to such things, there is no general or public duty, but only a duty which arises from contract, out of which no duty arises to strangers to the contract."

In the case at bar the function of the radius rod is not alleged in either of the counts, but it was stated in argument that it is an important part of the steering gear of the automobile. The case has been argued upon the assumption that the defendant's automobile was in charge of an independent bailee.

This court has held that an automobile is not an instrumentality dangerous per se, so as to make the owner liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of his servant while driving the automobile for his own pleasure, and not upon the owner's business (Colwell v. Ætna Bottle & Stopper Co. 33 R. I. 531, 82 Atl. 388, 2 N. C. C. A. 430); but it is obvious that it may become a dangerous instrumentality when driven upon a public highway in a reckless or negligent manner, or when it has inadequate brakes, or its direction cannot be controlled by the steering gear; and it has been held that an automobile may be so out of repair as to be a dangerous instrumentality (Texas Co. v. Veloz, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 377).

Trouble with the steering gear is a difficulty feared by every motorist, as it leaves him helpless, and, even though the automobile is traveling at a moderate speed, is likely to cause serious injury to the occupant of the automobile, to say nothing of those on the road. Babbitt Motor Vehicles, § 226.

In order to give some protection to persons using the public highways, safety appliances or motor vehicles are required by statute in nearly all of the states. Apart from any statute, the law requires care in all things pertaining to the efficiency of the engine and equipment and the means by which both may be controlled. Babbitt, supra, § 229.

The statute of this state (Gen. Laws 1909, chap. 86) requires, among other things, that every motor vehicle, while in use on the public highways, shall be provided with adequate brakes.

In the case of MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co. 217 N. Y. 382, L.R.A. 1916F, 696, 111 N. E. 1050, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 440, 13 N. C. C. A. 1029, in a carefully written opinion by Cardozo, J., the court held that "the manufacturer of an automobile is liable to a purchaser thereof from a dealer for injuries caused by a defective wheel, the defects in which could have been discovered by reasonable inspection, though the wheel was purchased by the automobile manufacturer from the maker thereof."

In discussing the rule relating to the liability of the manufacturer of an article which, by reason of a defect therein, discoverable by reasonable inspection, is a source of peril to the user thereof, and renders the manufacturer liable to the ultimate purchaser for an injury resulting from the defect, the court says:

"If the nature of a thing is such that it is reasonably certain to place life and limb in peril when negligently made, it is then a thing of danger. Its nature gives warning of the consequences to be expected. If to the element of danger there is added knowledge that the thing will be used by persons other than the purchaser, and used without new tests, then, irrespective of contract, the manufacturer of this thing of danger is under a duty to make it carefully.

"Beyond all question, the nature of an automobile gives warning of probable danger if its construction is defective. This automobile was designed to go 50 miles an hour. Unless its wheels were sound and strong, injury was almost certain.

"Precedents drawn from the days of travel by stagecoach do not fit the conditions of travel to-day. The principle that the danger must be imminent does not change, but the things subject to the principle do change. They are whatever the needs of life in a developing civilization require them to be."

The bailor, by the bailment, impliedly warrants that the thing hired is of the character and in a condition to be used as contemplated by the contract, and he is liable for damages occasioned by the faults or defects of the article hired. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 306 bb.

Whenever a garage keeper lets a vehicle for hire to a customer, it becomes his duty to exercise that degree of care and skill in the selection of the vehicle he sends out which a prudent man, having regard to the circumstances or the occasion, would bestow upon such a matter. Babbitt, supra, § 522.

It has been held that he is liable to the hirer of an automobile for injuries which happen by reason of defects in the automobile which might have been discovered by a most careful and thorough examination. Denver Omnibus & Cab Co. v. Madigan, 21 Colo. App. 131, 120 Pac. 1044.

The right to use the highways must be exercised so as not to endanger the lives or property of others who have equal rights upon them. Bennett v. Lovell, 12 R. I. 166, 34 Am. Rep. 628.

Automobiles are in constant use upon the public highways, and a garage keeper who lets automobiles for hire owes a duty to the public to the extent that he is bound to use ordinary care to see that the automobile he lets to be operated upon the public highways has its steering gear in a reasonably safe condition, as injury to other persons lawfully using the highways is reasonably to be foreseen as the probable result of a defective steering gear.

If the defendant operated his own automobile with a defective steering gear upon the public highway when he knew, or, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have known of such defect, and a third person was injured as the direct and proximate result of said defect, he would be liable to such third person; and it would be anomalous to hold that, because he let said defective automobile to a bailee for hire, for use upon the public highway, and, while it was being so used, such third person was injured as the direct and proximate result of said defect, he would not be liable.

The defect alleged in the declaration is not in the construction of the radius rod, but negligence in permitting some bolts to be loose which ordinarily made it secure, thereby rendering the automobile ungovernable while being driven upon the public highway.

On demurrer these allegations are taken to be true, and for damage resulting therefrom the bailor should be held responsible, subject to the rules relating to proximate cause and contributory negligence.

The plaintiff's exception is sustained, the demurrer is overruled, and the case is remitted to the Superior Court for further proceedings.

NOTE.

Although not a personal-injury case, the decision in the reported case (COLLETTE v. PAGE, ante, 74) comes within the principles discussed in the cases cited in the annotation, appended to Johnson v. H. M. Bullard Co. in 12 A.L.R. 774, on the liability of bailor for personal injuries due to defects in the subject of the bailment.

RE WILL OF JOHN NEAL, Deceased.

CHARLES E. HAMILTON, Public Administrator, Appt.

Will — right of public administrator to file caveat.

Under a statute designating those entitled to file a caveat to a will as those entitled under the will, or interested in the estate, a public administrator has not such interest as to be entitled to file such caveat until he has been appointed and is qualified to administer upon the particular estate in question.

APPEAL by the public administrator from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth County (Long, J.) dismissing a caveat filed to contest the validity of the will of John Neal, deceased, and to contest the claims of relationship of the wife and mother of deceased. Affirmed.

Statement by Clark, Ch. J.:

John Neal, born in Winston, North Carolina, a nullius filius, died in Omaha, Nebraska, leaving an estate estimated to be of the value of $800,000 or over. On October 19, 1920, what was claimed to be a copy of a lost or destroyed will, disposing of his property and appointing the Wachovia Bank & Trust Company executor and trustee, was admitted to probate in the superior court of Forsyth.

The caveat was duly filed to said will by Jenny Beckerdite, of Washington, District of Columbia, claiming to be the mother of said John Neal, and by one Mary Harbin McCoy and her son, Tharry McCoy, of Okmulgee, Oklahoma, claiming to be the wife and son of said John Neal, and in addition, on April 19, 1921, the appellant, Charles E. Hamilton, public administrator of Forsyth, filed his petition for caveat, upon the ground that he was entitled to qualify and that his interest in the commissions which would accrue was such "interest in the estate" as would entitle him to maintain a caveat to contest the validity of the copy of the alleged will, and also to contest the claim of Jenny Beckerdite to be the mother of the deceased and of Mary Harbin McCoy and her son to be the wife and son of the deceased. The court dismissed the petition of said Charles E. Hamilton, public administrator, and he appealed.

Messrs. Lindsay Patterson and H. G. Hudson, for appellant:

The right to administer an estate is a sufficient interest to entitle the person in whom it is vested to contest the probate of a will.

The public administrator also represents other interests, and as such representative he is entitled to a hearing as to the validity of the alleged will of John Neal.

Re Davis, 182 N. Y. 468, 75 N. E. 530; Schouler, Exrs. & Admrs. 5th ed. § 1116.

Messrs. Manly, Hendren, & Womble, L. M. Swink, B. S. Royster, M. L. Learned, and Craig & Vogler, for appellees:

As a general rule, the public administrator, as such, has no right to file a caveat, as a caveat can only be filed by one "entitled under the will, or interested in the estate."

Neither has a public administrator such interest as will entitle him to maintain an action to contest.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition was properly dismissed. A party entitled to file a caveat under Consol. Stat. § 4158, must be someone "entitled under such will, or interested in the estate." It being admitted that the deceased was nullius filius, there could be no one coming within that designation except (1) his mother, if living; (2) his wife and child, if proven to be such; and (3) the University of North Carolina, should it be found that the deceased left neither mother nor wife nor children.

A public administrator is a position created by chapter 113, Laws 1868-69, now Consol. Stat. § 17. He has no interest in or control over any estate until appointed thereto by the clerk and qualified. Consol. Stat. § 20. It is not necessary to discuss whether his prospective commissions are such an interest as would entitle him to caveat the will, for he has not been appointed administrator of this estate, and has no interest whatever therein.

Under Consol. Stat. § 20, the public administrator can apply for letters of administration "when the period of six months has elapsed from the death of any decedent, and no letters testamentary, or letters of administration or collection, have been applied for and issued to any person," and even then such public administrator is not entitled in all cases to be appointed. See citations under that section.

In this case the Wachovia Bank & Trust Company has already been appointed, and there is no ground upon which the public administrator can be entitled to qualify unless such administration is set aside upon a caveat of the will or by order of the clerk for other sufficient cause.

In the trial of the caveat now pending, it must be determined whether the mother is living, or whether the deceased left a wife and child, as alleged, and in the trial of such caveat the University of North Carolina is a proper party, as, in view of the claims of the first two parties being negatived, the University would be entitled to the property, if the will is set aside, by the terms of the charter of that institution in 1789 (chapter 305), which conferred upon it all property escheating for lack of heirs and distributees, or otherwise. If the contest should be decided in favor of either of these three parties and the alleged will should be set aside, the administration would be conferred upon the successful contestant, or someone selected at the request of such party. In no event has the public administrator any right to be appointed to administer until the successful party has waived its right to do so, Consol. Stat. §§ 29 and 30. The position of public administrator confers no right to administration until the parties having the prior right to qualify have waived their right or been adjudged unfit by the clerk. He has no interest in the estate and no right to qualify unless and until appointed to the particular estate by the clerk. Until so appointed he is simply an "eligible" for public administrator to file

appointment upon the default of the parties who have a prior right to appointment. 24 C. J. p. 1201, § 2873, note (a).

The right of succeeding by escheat to all property, when there are no wife or parties entitled under the Statutes of Descent and Distribution, was conferred upon the University by its charter in 1789 (chap. 306, § 2), and has been confirmed since by the state Constitution (art. 9, § 7), and has been extended by several statutes, which are now Consol. Stat. §§ 5784–5786. This is a most valuable right, which will become more and more a source of revenue to the University as the state grows in wealth and population. One of the first cases in which the matter was presented is University of North Carolina v. Johnston, 2 N. C. 373, and among those since have been two recent cases, one from Wilmington and the other from Goldsboro (Grantham v. Jinnette, 177 N. C. 229, 98 S. E. 724), out of which the University became entitled, under decisions of this court, to receive very considerable sums.

The University, therefore, is the proper, if not necessary, party to represent the public interest, if there is a default of heirs and distributees; but the public administrator is not when he has not been appointed and qualified upon the estate in question. Consol. Stat. § 6.

This contest turns upon the validity of the alleged will, a copy of which has been probated in common form in lieu of the alleged original will. The parties who are entitled to urge the caveat to set aside this probate are, as already stated, the alleged mother, the alleged wife and son, and the University of North Carolina.

The judgment dismissing the petition of the public administrator is affirmed.

Stacy, J., concurs in result.

ANNOTATION.

Right of public administrator or state to file caveat to or contest will.

- I. General statement, 79.
- II. Public administrator, 79.
- III. State, 81.

I. General statement.

Since proceedings to contest a will are statutory, and the statutes of most of the states authorize contests by "persons interested," or use similar terms, the question whether the state or a public administrator may contest or oppose the probate of a will is one of statutory construction, and depends largely upon the inquiry as to who may be regarded as an interested person. The authorities are not agreed either as to the right of the state or a public administrator to contest a will.

II. Public administrator.

There are several decisions to the effect that a public administrator is not a "person interested," entitled to contest a will. Re Sanborn (1893) 98

Cal. 103, 32 Pac. 865; Re Hickman (1894) 101 Cal. 609, 36 Pac. 118; Re Healy (1898) 122 Cal. 162, 54 Pac. 736 (obiter); State ex rel. Eakins v. District Ct. (1906) 34 Mont. 226, 85 Pac. 1022; RE NEAL (reported herewith) ante, 77.

In Re Sanborn (Cal.) supra, it was held that a public administrator cannot contest the probate of a will under a statute permitting contests by "persons interested." The court said: "The probate of a will can be contested only upon 'written grounds of opposition' filed by a 'person interested,'—that is, interested in the estate, and not in the mere fees of an administration thereof. . . . A public administrator has no interest in an estate, or in the probate of a will. That is a matter which concerns only those to whom the estate would otherwise go. . . . If a public administrator could legally assume the character of a standing contestant of wills, notwithstanding the wishes of heirs and devisees, he would certainly enlarge the sphere of his activities; but the limitations of the statute do not allow such inflation."

And, citing the Sanborn Case, the court in State ex rel. Eakins v. District Ct. (1906) 34 Mont. 226, 85 Pac. 1022, held that the public administrator was not an interested person, entitled to object to the probate of a will.

It was held in the reported case (RE NEAL, ante, 77) that under a statute by which a party entitled to file a caveat must be someone "entitled under such will, or interested in the estate," a public administrator was not entitled to maintain a caveat to contest the validity of a will unless and until appointed administrator of the particular estate.

But in several New York cases the holding, or assumption at least, is to the effect that a public administrator may appear in opposition to the will.

Thus, under the New York statute authorizing any person interested in sustaining or defeating a will to appear, and at his election support or oppose the application for probate, it was held in Re Davis (1905) 182 N. Y. 468, 75 N. E. 530, affirming (1905) 105 App. Div. 221, 93 N. Y. Supp. 1004, that a public administrator appointed in another state as administrator of the property of the decedent in that state, under a claim that the decedent died intestate, should be allowed to intervene in a proceeding for the probate of an alleged will of the decedent, pending in New York, the domicile of the decedent, and to oppose such probate. The court said: "As was said by the learned surrogate in his opinion, 'the right to administer the estate is a sufficient interest, in this state, to entitle the person in whom it is vested to contest the probate of the will.' The administrator in California was authorized by a decree of the proper court in that state to take possession of the assets of the deceased in his county, to convert them into money, and to distribute the proceeds according to law. That decree was granted before any application had been made to prove the will. The assets were of great value, and the administrator had a personal interest to the extent of his fees for services already rendered, and a much more important interest as the representative of others; for, if there was no will, he had exclusive jurisdiction and control of all the personal property of the decedent in the county of Fresno, California, for the purpose of administration. He represented the beneficiaries, who were the substantial owners of the property. Probate of a will, however, would deprive him of power to administer, and leave the validity of all his acts before he heard that there was a will open to question. He had an interest to protect and the right to become a party to the proceeding, so as to see that no paper purporting to be a will of the decedent was admitted to probate unless it was genuine and executed by a competent person according to law." See also opinion of the surrogate court, on objections to the application of the administrator for leave to appear and oppose the probate, reported in (1904) 45 Misc. 306, 92 N. Y. Supp. 392, in which the same conclusion was reached and in which the court distinguished the case from Re Hickman (1894) 101 Cal. 609, 36 Pac. 118, supra, on the ground that in the latter case the interest of the public administrator was simply his right to letters of administration, whereas in the case before it letters of administration had been issued to the public administrator, and he appeared not as one seeking to enforce his right to administer, but as one to whom letters of administration had in fact been issued, and for the purpose of vindicating his rights and authority over the estate.

It was apparently assumed in Gombault v. Public Administrator (1857) 4 Bradf. (N. Y.) 226, that a public administrator representing the city of New York was entitled to oppose, on the ground of testamentary incapacity and undue influence, the probate of a will of one who died in that city, where it did not appear that the decedent left any known heirs or next of kin.

And it appears to be assumed in Public Administrator v. Watts (1829) 1 Paige (N. Y.) 347, reversed on other grounds in (1829) 4 Wend. 168, that a public administrator may appeal from a decree allowing probate of a will.

III. State.

A question related to that already considered, is whether or not the state has a right to contest or oppose the probate of a will. This question is interesting from a practical point of view, because the question may arise as to who may represent the public in preventing a probate, or in setting aside the probate, of a forged or fraudulent or improperly executed will, in case the property, in the absence of a will, would escheat to the state. If the public administrator cannot oppose the will, may the state do so on the ground that it is an interested party? Or may both the public administrator and the state oppose the will? The authorities are not in harmony on the question of the right of the state to oppose or to set aside probate.

In several cases it has been held that the state has a right to contest the validity of a will. State ex rel. Donovan v. Second Judicial Dist. Ct. (1901) 25 Mont. 355, 65 Pac. 120; State v. Nieuwenhuis (1920) 43 S. D. 198, 178 N. W. 976; State v. Lancaster (1907) 119 Tenn. 638, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 991, 105 S. W. 858, 14 Ann. Cas. 953; Davis v. Davis (1824) 2 Addams, Eccl. Rep. 223, 162 Eng. Reprint, 275. See also Gombault v. Public Administrator (1857) 4 Bradf. (N. Y.) 226.

In State v. Nieuwenhuis (1920) 43 S. D. 198, 178 N. W. 976, supra, it was held that the state is a party in interest within the meaning of a statute providing that, where a will has been admitted to probate, any person interested therein may, at any time within a year, after such probate, contest the same or the validity of the will. It was contended in this case that the remedy of the state was not in the county court, which had exclusive jurisdiction of probate proceedings, but in the circuit court in an action to declare an escheat, and that the admission of a will to probate in no way affected the rights of the state. But the court took the view that in any action instituted by the state in the circuit court to declare an escheat of the property, the devisees under the will might offer in evidence the decree of the county court admitting the will to probate, which decree would be conclusive on the state; and that the state, therefore, was an interested party, entitled to contest the will in the county court.

So, under a statute providing that any person interested may appear and contest a will, it was held in State ex rel. Donovan v. Second Judicial Dist. Ct. (Mont.) supra, that the state had such interest, under the statutory right to the estate by escheat in case there were no heirs, as would entitle it to contest the probate of a will, on allegations that the will was a forgery and that the testator had no heirs in the state or elsewhere, to the knowledge of the contestant, even though the statutory time for an escheat proceeding had not arrived and the state's interest might subsequently cease on the appearance of heirs. The court regarded the interest of the state, contingent on the non-appearance of heirs, as sufficient to entitle it to contest the will. Another statute provided that if no person, within a year after probate, instituted a contest, the probate was conclusive; while an escheat proceeding could not be begun within five years after the death of the decedent. And the court said it was apparent, therefore, that if the state could not contest the will before its probate or within a year thereafter, its rights were lost.

And it was held in State v. Lancaster (1907) 119 Tenn. 638, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 991, 105 S. W. 858, 14 Ann. Cas. 953, supra, that statutory authority is not necessary to enable the state to contest a will, in the absence of which the testator's property would escheat; and it may therefore institute such contest in the probate court, after instituting the proceedings to declare the escheat in the court designated by the statute for that purpose.

In Davis v. Davis (1824) 2 Addams, Eccl. Rep. 223, 162 Eng. Reprint, 275, supra, his Majesty's proctor intervened in proceedings instituted for the purpose of proving in solemn form a codicil, since, in the event the codicil should not be sustained, the testator would have died intestate as to the residue of his property. It was apparently assumed that he had the right to intervene, it being held that the costs of his appearance should be taken out of the estate, although the codicil was held valid.

And it is said in the syllabus in Gombault v. Public Administrator (1857) 4 Bradf. (N. Y.) 226, supra: "On the probate of a will, where the deceased leaves no known heirs or next of kin, the public administrator of the city of New York may intervene to contest the will in relation to the personal estate and the attorney general in relation to the real estate." In this case objections were made to the probate of the will by the attorney general on behalf of the estate, and by the public administrator representing the city of New York, but the court decreed in favor of probate, on the merits, without discussing the question of the right of the public administrator or the state to oppose the will.

Without referring to the right of the state to contest the will, the court in Cardwell's Estate (1891) 28 W. N. C. (Pa.) 291, dismissed an appeal by the commonwealth of Pennsylvania from the decision of the register of wills admitting a will to probate, brought on the ground that the testatrix was incapacitated to make a will, and that as the will was, for that reason, void, the estate escheated to the commonwealth in default of heirs or next of kin. It was held that the facts did not show that the testatrix was incompetent to make a will.

There are decisions, however, out of harmony with the above.

Thus, in Re Leslie (1915) 92 Misc. 663, 156 N. Y. Supp. 346, affirmed on different grounds in (1916) 175 App. Div. 108, 161 N. Y. Supp. 790, it was held that, as the state could not contest the validity of a will, parties who stood in the position of donees of the state had no right to contest the will. The court said: "It has never been understood that the ultimate right of the state in what are known as caducary successions, including escheats, entitles it to contest the probate of a will of an heirless person in order to promote its right to escheats. The will of an heirless testator stands free from attack in that quarter. It would be contrary to public policy and to all principles of the common law, nay, contrary to all rights secured to our citizens by our constitutions of government, if the state could promote its caducary succession by a resort of that kind to its own courts of justice. The only remedy of the state for escheats is by way of office found, or its substitute. If the state had itself no right, power, or authority to contest the probate of a will of an alleged heirless man or woman, then, under the great maxim already quoted [non debeo melioris conditionis esse, quam auctor meus a quo jus in me transit'], those succeeding to its rights stand in no better position."

And where an application for probate of an alleged will was resisted on behalf of the state on the grounds of the testator's incapacity and improper execution, the court in Hopf v. State (1888) 72 Tex. 281, 10 S. W. 589, in holding that, on the evidence, the court had erroneously refused to admit the will to probate, said that no reason was shown which entitled the state to contest the probate, and that an escheat could not be declared in a proceeding to probate a will; but that it did not appear that any objection was made to the contest, and as it would have been the duty of the court to bring out all the facts, if it thought necessary, bearing upon the execution of the alleged will, it was unimportant that this was done by a person not entitled to make the contest.

Gen. v. Superior Ct. (1895) 148 Cal. 55, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643, 82 Pac. 672, that the state has no interest which will entitle it to contest a will, where it merely shows that there is a probability that some heir may fail to appear and claim the property, so as to permit proceedings to declare an escheat, and that the heir may fail to appear within the statutory period thereafter to claim the property, so that the state's title may become absolute. It was said: "The only ground upon which the state can claim that it has an interest sufficient to authorize it to maintain the contest is that, although the deceased did leave surviving heirs in whom, if the will is invalid, the title to his property has vested, and who are not aliens whose titles will be forfeited by escheat if they do not claim the property within five years, yet, that there is a possibility that all the heirs, or someone of them, may fail to appear and claim the property, that thereupon proceedings may be instituted, under § 1269, Code Civ. Proc., to declare an escheat, and that no heir entitled may then, or within twenty years after judgment therein, appear to claim the property or its proceeds; and thereupon the state may take as absolute owner. . . . We do not think this remote and contingent possibility, or series of successive possibilities, constitutes an interest which will authorize the party, having nothing more substantial, to maintain a contest of a will."

In State v. Ames (1871) 23 La. Ann. 69, where, in an action in the name of the state to annul the probate of a will on the ground that it was a forgery, and that there was no one entitled to succeed to the property except the state, the court held that the state was not entitled to notice of probate, and was not recognized as an heir entitled to inherit in the absence of all other heirs, under a statute providing that "the party praying for the opening and proof of the will shall cause to be summoned the number of witnesses possessing the qualities required for such proof; and, if the presumptive heir of the deceased, or any of them, reside in the place, he shall give them notice in writing that they may attend . . . at the opening and proof of the will."

An application by the state for a writ of mandamus to compel the superior court to hear a motion for an order to set aside the probate of a will on the ground that no citation was issued, and that no attempt was made to find anyone interested in the estate, and, claiming that, under the Washington statute, the state was interested in testing the validity of the will, was refused, in State ex rel. Stratton v. Tallman (1901) 25 Wash. 295, 65 Pac. 545, on the ground that there was an adequate remedy at law.

Mr. Eugene A. Cox, for respondent:

It has generally been considered that taking a special deposit falls within the general scope of the banking business, although no express power is conferred by the bank's charter, or by the organic law, so to do. It has been regarded as an incident to the general function of the institution.

The bank had notice that the box contained valuables, and, from the proven course of dealing of the plaintiff, had sufficient reason to infer that the box contained some money. Such notice is sufficient to render it liable where the bailment consists of money, and that fact is not specifically disclosed.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover the value of certain personal property alleged to have been left by the plaintiff in the custody of the defendant about the 12th of August, 1916, said property being of the alleged value of $6,895.50, including $702 in money. The answer denies the receipt by the defendant of any of the property set out in the complaint.

A jury having been waived, the case was tried before the court, who found that the property described in the complaint was delivered to the defendant, and that its value was as follows: Lawful money of the United States, $702; one gold ring, $10; one strong box, $1.50; and documents described in the complaint, the stipulated cost of the replacement of which is $50—making a total of $763.50, for which, with $42.50 as costs, judgment was entered against the defendant. The appeal is from the judgment.

The second assignment of error is that "the court erred on the evidence in the case in awarding plaintiff judgment for $702, claimed to have been in the box delivered to the defendant."

Our conclusion as to this assignment will dispose of the case.

The evidence offered on behalf of respondent, so far as it attempts to show a delivery to appellant, consists wholly of the testimony of Mrs. Mary E. Riggs, wife of respondent. She testified that she was in the bank of appellant about the time she and her husband were preparing to leave Grangeville, and, relating a conversation with Mr. Otto Nail, who was bookkeeper, and sometimes acted as teller of the bank, she says: "I asked Mr. Nail if we might leave a box of papers and other valuables in the bank until such time as we could send for them, as we were leaving town, . . . and I asked Mr. Nail if it would be all right, and he said: 'Certainly; you can leave the box here, and we will send it to you whenever and wherever you want it. We will send it by express.' And when I asked him about leaving some papers, he said: 'We have cloth envelops which you might use;' and I said: 'No; there are too many papers and other things which couldn't be put up in cloth envelops.' And that is about all."

The witness testifies further that she and her husband bought a tin box with a lock on it, and placed therein the personal property that they desired to leave with the bank, and that she took this box to the bank and delivered it to Mr. Otto Nail.

On or about the 9th of April, 1917, the wife of respondent returned to Grangeville, and requested the return of the tin box with its contents, but a diligent search by the officers and employees of the bank failed to discover it, and this action followed.

At the time of the deposit of the box with the bank, nothing was said as to its contents except what has been quoted above. Not until demand for the return of the box was anything said indicating that it contained a large sum of money, or any money. Under the testimony given on behalf of respondent, we do not think the bank became a bailee of the money. Among the requirements necessary to constitute a party a bailee of property of another are delivery and acceptance of the property.

"The very essence of the relation is possession, and so it may be said, as a general rule, that there must be an acceptance of the property on the part of the bailee; for one cannot be made a bailee against his will, and must have knowledge of the fact that he is in possession of the property." Van Zile, Bailm. & Carr. § 18.

"Since the duties and responsibilities of a bailee cannot be thrust upon a person without his knowledge or against his consent, it is essential to a bailment that there be an acceptance of the subject-matter." 6 C. J. 1104, § 24.

"It is necessary, however, that the person sought to be charged as a bailee shall have notice of his possession of the goods." 6 C. J. 1104, § 25. Story, Bailm. § 60.

To the same effect is the case of Bertig v. Norman, 101 Ark. 75, 81, 141 S. W. 201, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 943.

The appellant was entitled to know at the time of receiving the box in question that it contained the money that respondent claims to have been contained therein, or to know that its contents were of such value as to require the great care that is ordinarily bestowed on large sums of money. When his wife, who delivered the box to the bank, undertook to state its contents, it certainly was incumbent upon her to advise the bank, not only that the box contained "papers and other valuables," which expression contains no intimation of money, but, if it did in fact contain this large sum of money, to so advise the bank in order that it might give the box the care that should be given a thing of such value, or in order that it might decline, if it saw fit, to take the care of so large an amount of money delivered to it in this manner. The effect upon the bank was the same whether this information was withheld by her intentionally or unintentionally. Failing thus to advise the bank of the presence of the money in the box, we think the respondent cannot now successfully contend that the bank accepted the custody of this money, which acceptance was necessary in order to make it a bailee of this fund. The loss of the money, therefore, cannot be charged to the negligence of the bank, since it did not know of its presence in the box. Sawyer v. Old Lowell Nat. Bank, 230 Mass. 342, 346, 1 A.L.R. 269, 119 N. E. 825; Copelin v. Berlin Dye Works & Laundry Co. 168 Cal. 715, L.R.A.1915C, 712, 12 N. C. C. A. 362, 144 Pac. 961; Scollans v. E. H. Rollins & Sons, 179 Mass. 346, 354, 88 Am. St. Rep. 386, 60 N. E. 983; Belknap v. National Bank, 100 Mass. 376, 381, 97 Am. Dec. 105.

If the expression "papers and other valuables" be held to include the gold ring in this case, as we think it may, it could certainly not so be held if, instead of a single ring of small value, there had been a large amount of very valuable jewelry, and no intimation of that fact had been given to the bank.

We think the findings and judgment are supported by sufficient evidence as to the remainder of the property, the value of which the court found to be $61.50. The judgment is accordingly modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $702 and the costs allowed by the trial court, and as modified is affirmed for $61.50. No costs to either party on this appeal.

ANNOTATION.

Acceptance of receptacle as charging one as bailee of contents.

Generally, as to what amounts to delivery of or assumption of control over property essential to a bailment, see the annotation following Zetserstrom v. Thomas, 1 A.L.R. 392.

The earlier cases upon the question under consideration in the present annotation are treated in the annotation following Sawyer v. Lowell Nat. Bank, 1 A.L.R. 269. As shown in that treatment of the subject there is a difference of judicial opinion as to whether or not the acceptance of a receptacle charges the depositary as a bailee of the contents, which conflict seems to extend through the more recent cases.

On the one hand, the reported case (RIGGS v. BANK OF CAMAS PRAIRIE, ante, 83), in holding that the gratuitous bailee of a locked box represented as containing "papers and other valuables" is not liable for the loss of a large sum of money contained in the box,—at least, in the absence of notice of such contents,—supports the rule that a depositary of a receptacle is not a bailee of the contents thereof. And further support for this rule is found in Waters v. Beau Site Co. (1920) 114 Misc. 65, 186 N. Y. Supp. 731. In this case the relation of bailor and bailee was created by the leaving of a trunk in defendant's hotel for safe-keeping, and the question was as to the liability of the defendant for the loss of a diamond pendant worth over $1,000, which had been left in the trunk, but which was missing when the bailment was ended. In holding that there was no liability, because of the fact that the defendant had no notice that the pendant was in the trunk, the court, among other things, said: "The relation between the parties as to the stored property was that of bailor and bailee, and not that of innkeeper and guest. Upon the foregoing facts the court dismissed the complaint, upon the ground that the defendant, by becoming a bailee of plaintiff's trunks and their contents, was not required to and did not assume that the same contained articles other than those ordinarily contained in trunks, and that, consequently, there was no bailment as to the pendant. There was no testimony in the case to show that defendant had actual notice of the fact that this valuable piece of jewelry was in plaintiff's trunk. Nor is it so usual or customary to place articles of this character in trunks as to warrant or require any assumption on defendant's part that the trunk contained the jewel in question. In such case there is no contract of bailment, for the bailee cannot by artifice be compelled to assume a liability greater than he intended. Edwards, Bailm. 3d ed. § 49. It does not follow that there must be an intention to impose upon the bailee. It is sufficient if such is the practical effect of the bailor's conduct. By the use of the word 'artifice' it is not intended to convey that plaintiff had any motive or design inconsistent with absolute honor and fair dealing. A better characterization would probably be a concealment without design. It is true that plaintiff testified that in her conversation with defendant's manager she referred to her trunks as baggage or luggage; but the mere use of this expression is insufficient to give notice to the defendant that the trunks contained articles of a character different from those ordinarily placed in trunks left for storage. Luggage and baggage are essentially the bags, trunks, etc., that a passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience with reference to his necessities or to the ultimate purpose of his journey, and in this connection it has been held that, within limits, the same include such jewelry as may be adapted to the tastes, habits, and social standing, and be necessary for the convenience, use, and enjoyment, of the traveler, either while in transit or temporarily staying at a particular place. The trunks here were to be stored, and not to be used as luggage or baggage, and for this reason it is apparent that the above rule respecting jewelry is not applicable. Plaintiff insists that jewelry of the kind ordinarily worn upon the person is part of a woman's baggage, and that defendant, by undertaking to care for plaintiff's baggage, became a bailee of the diamond pendant contained in one of the trunks. . . . Plaintiff also claims that, even though defendant may not have been informed of the presence of the pendant in the trunk, it would nevertheless be liable in an action for breach of the contract of bailment if the pendant were stolen by one of the employees of defendant, and that testimony in the case made it reasonably plain, or at least permitted the inference, that the pendant was stolen by one of the defendant's employees. For this reason it is asserted the case should have been submitted to the jury. . . . In the instant case, as above stated, there was absolutely nothing to indicate to defendant the presence of valuable jewelry in the trunks of plaintiff."

On the other hand, however, in Miles v. International Hotel Co. (1919) 289 Ill. 320, 124 N. E. 599, reversing (1918) 211 Ill. App. 323, where a guest, upon leaving a hotel, left an old, small trunk for storage, and which later could not be found, the court, in holding that the hotel company as gratuitous bailee, upon proof of failure upon its part to exercise such care and diligence in the preservation of the trunk as a prudent man would take of his own goods of like character, would be liable for the loss, seems to have assumed that the bailee would be liable for the contents of the trunk, even though they exceeded $1,000 in value.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Fulton County (Bell, J.) to review a judgment sustaining a caveat filed in a proceeding for the probate of the will of Lacy Irving, deceased. Reversed.

Statement by Beck, P. J.:

Lacy Irving died on December 6, 1919, leaving a last will and testament which contains various bequests to Willie Bell Irving, referred to in the will as his wife, and to certain named children of his. This will was offered for probate by Willie Bell Irving and J. W. E. Lindner; and to the application for probate a caveat was filed by Lena Irving. One of the grounds of caveat—the one out of which springs the question to be determined here—is that subsequently to the death of Lacy Irving there was born to Willie Bell Irving a posthumous child of the said Lacy Irving, this child being known as Lacy Irving, Jr.; and it is contended that the birth of the child subsequently to the execution of the will, in which no provision is made in contemplation of such an event, revoked the will. The case was appealed to the superior court, and was submitted to the judge without the intervention of a jury, on the following agreed statement of facts: "It is agreed that Lena Irving is the lawful widow of Lacy Irving, deceased, she and the said Lacy Irving having married in Key West, Florida, on October 26, 1898; that as the issue of this marriage between Lena Irving and Lacy Irving there are three surviving children, Lewis Irving, age twenty, Leroy Irving, age nineteen, and Lillian Irving, age seventeen; that about two years before his death the said Lacy Irving, while still lawfully married to Lena Irving, contracted in Fulton county, Georgia, a second marriage with Willie Bell Irving; that on December 6, 1919, Lacy Irving died; that a few weeks after his death there was born to the said Willie Bell Irving a posthumous child of the said Lacy Irving, said posthumous child now being known as Lacy Irving, Jr.; that on August 7, 1919, Lacy Irving executed the instrument referred to in the petition and purporting to be a last will and testament. It is further agreed that the marriage between Lacy Irving and Willie Bell Irving was never annulled and declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction. It is agreed that said will is regularly and properly executed, and is entitled to probate unless same is revoked by the subsequent birth of the child referred to in paragraph 1 hereof."

After evidence submitted and argument of counsel, the court rendered the judgment sustaining the caveat on the ground that the will had been revoked by the subsequent birth of a child to the testator. The propounders excepted.

Messrs. Anderson, Rountree, & Crenshaw, for plaintiffs in error:

Under the common law, marriage alone, or the birth of a child alone, was insufficient to revoke a man's will. It took the conjunction of marriage and birth of issue to effect a revocation.

Mr. William A. Fuller for defendant in error.

Beck, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The ground of the caveat out of which springs the issue which this court has to determine does not show good ground for the refusal to admit the will to probate. Section 3923 of the Civil Code declares that "in all cases the marriage of the testator, or the birth of a child to him, subsequently to the making of a will in which no provision is made in contemplation of such an event, shall be a revocation of the will."

The word "child," as here used in this section, where it is declared that the birth of a child subsequently to the making of a will in which no provision is made in contemplation of such an event revokes the will, means a legitimate child. Such is its ordinary meaning in laws and statutes prescribing the rules of inheritance and property rights; and usually where the term "child" is allowed to include illegitimate children it is done under the provisions of statutes recognizing the rule just stated, and which make an exception to that rule. No doubt the court below recognized this doctrine, but the court evidently was of the opinion that § 2935 of the Civil Code, relating to void marriages, and legitimacy of children, made the posthumous child, Lacy Irving, Jr., a legitimate child. This section reads as follows: "Marriages of persons unable to contract, or unwilling to contract, or fraudulently induced to contract, are void. The issue of such marriages, before they are annulled and declared void by a competent court, are legitimate. In the latter two cases, however, a subsequent consent and ratification of the marriage, freely and voluntarily made, accompanied by cohabitation as husband and wife, shall render valid the marriage."

This section does not have reference to bigamous marriages, but includes three classes of marriages: (1) Marriages between parties unable to contract; (2) marriages between parties unwilling to contract, that is, marriages procured by force or duress; (3) marriages where one of the parties is fraudulently induced to contract. Clearly the bigamous marriage does not fall within the last two classes; nor do we think it falls within the first class, that is, marriages between persons unable to contract. While the expression "marriages of persons unable to contract" might be sufficiently broad if we consider only the expression "unable to contract" to include marriages of persons one of whom had a living spouse, when we take the entire expression "marriages of persons unable to contract," we do not think that bigamous marriages were included, for the reason that a mere marriage ceremony between a man and a woman, where one of them has a living wife or husband, is not a marriage at all; it is a mere empty ceremony, and effects nothing and creates no status between the parties.

Such a marriage is an absolute nullity, and may be treated so by the parties to such a ceremony and by all the world.

"The marriage of a man and woman, where one of them has a husband or wife by a prior marriage, who is then living and undivorced, is void, and not merely voidable. Being a nullity, no decree is necessary to avoid the same. Reeves v. Reeves, 54 Ill. 332; Drummond v.

A void marriage is good for no legal purpose, and its invalidity may be shown in any court, between any parties, either in the lifetime of the parties thereto, or after their death." Cartwright v. McGown, 121 Ill. 388, 2 Am. St. Rep. 105, 107, 12 N. E. 737.

An almost unbroken line of precedents for this ruling, taken from the decisions of other states of this country, might be cited to support the proposition here stated. See annotations on the subject of bigamous marriages, whether void or voidable, in L.R.A.1916C, 711. But this court has more than once held that bigamous marriages are absolutely void. In the case of Murchison v. Green, 128 Ga. 339, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 702, 57 S. E. 709, where the presumption of the validity of the marriage arising from the performance of the ceremony came in conflict with the presumption of the continued life of a former spouse of one of the parties, neither presumption being aided by proof of extraneous facts, the presumption of the validity of the second marriage, it was ruled, will prevail over the presumption of the continuance of the life of the former spouse; and Presiding Justice Cobb, delivering the opinion of the court, gave as one of the reasons for holding that the presumption of the validity of the marriage should prevail that "the status of the woman is involved, as well as the legitimacy of children, and every reasonable presumption must be indulged which will relieve the woman of the charge of being a concubine and her children being declared bastards."

The converse of the proposition stated by the learned justice is that, if the first presumption had prevailed—that is, the continuation of the life of the former spouse—then the wife who became such by a bigamous marriage was a mere concubine, and her children who resulted from such bigamous marriage were illegitimate. And such we have concluded to be the law, and consequently that the birth of a child to a testator as the issue of a bigamous marriage, subsequently to the making of a will, does not work the revocation of the will, although no provision was made in the will in contemplation of the birth of such child. And it follows that the court below erred in sustaining the caveat on the ground that the birth of the posthumous child worked a revocation of the will of Lacy Irving.

Judgment reversed.

ANNOTATION.

Illegitimacy of child as affecting revocation of will by subsequent birth of child.

Under the general common-law rule the marriage of a man and the birth of a child, both occurring subsequent to the making of a will by him, revoked the will. And under the statutes of some states the birth of a child will of itself operate to revoke a prior will. The present annotation purports to deal only with the question of the effect of the illegitimacy of the child on the rule under statute or common law with respect to the revocation of a will by the birth of children to the testator subsequent to the making of the will.

There is little authority on the question under annotation, and, because of differences in the inheritance laws affecting illegitimate children, the courts have reached different conclusions. It seems that, unless special statutory provisions control, the question whether a will is revoked by the subsequent birth of an illegitimate child, assuming that had the child been legitimate the will would be revoked,—in other words, the question whether the circumstances of illegitimacy affects the matter,—may depend on the question whether, in the absence of a will, the illegitimate child would inherit under statute. As has been brought out in one case, if under the laws of the state the illegitimate child would not inherit in case the will were revoked, there would seem to be no good reason for revoking the will on this ground.

The word "child," in a statute providing that in all cases the marriage of the testator, or the birth of a child to him, subsequently to the making of a will in which no provision was made in contemplation of such an event, should be a revocation of the will, was held in the reported case (IRVING v. IRVING, ante, 88) to mean a legitimate child; so that it was held that a will was not revoked by the birth of a posthumous child which was the issue of a bigamous marriage of the testator. The court held, also, that bigamous marriages were not within a statute providing that marriages of persons "unable to contract, or unwilling to contract, or fraudulently induced to contract," were void, but that the issue of such marriages, before they were annulled or declared void by a competent court, were legitimate.

And that a will is not revoked by the subsequent birth of an illegitimate child to the testator, not mentioned in the will, is held in Sneed v. Ewing (1831) 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 460, 22 Am. Dec. 41. This case involved the right to real estate in Kentucky, and a slave in that state, both of which belonged to the testator, who was a resident of Indiana. It was contended that at the time of the testator's marriage the wife had a husband who was living, but who had abandoned her several years previous, and that the marriage was therefore illegal; that the child was illegitimate and therefore the will not revoked. A statute, however, in Kentucky, provided that "issue in marriage deemed null in law shall nevertheless be legiti-mate." The court held accordingly that the child was legitimized in Kentucky, and, so far as the real estate was concerned, there was an implied revocation of the will. But it was held that, as regards the slave, the law of Indiana controlled, and, unless by that law the marriage was valid and the child legitimate, there was no implied revocation. In regard to the point under consideration, the court said: "According to the common law, a child born out of 'lawful wedlock' is 'filius nullius,' and cannot inherit the father's estate. The rule as to implied revocations is, as we have stated, fixed and inflexible. It does not allow courts to speculate ad libitum on the moral duties, the affections, or actual intentions of testators, but restricts them to an isolated fact, and the countervailing or corroborating circumstances. Were it otherwise, the statute of wills would be virtually abolished. In this case, the essential fact is the birth of the child; and the law requires the birth of a legitimate child. 'Ita lex scripta est.' The reason is obvious. It would be inconsistent with the object of implied revocation to permit a will to be revoked by the birth of a child who, after the sentence of nullification, would not be entitled to one particle of the estate of the testator. Hence, a revocation will be implied by the birth only of a child who, by operation of law, would have been entitled to the estate, or a portion of it, if there had been no will, and who would take it, or some of it if the will be set aside."

It was held in Re Bunce (1887) 6 Dem. (N. Y.) 278, that the subsequent birth of an illegitimate child to a testatrix did not effect a complete revocation of the will so as to prevent its admission to probate. In this case, where probate of a will was opposed by an illegitimate daughter of the testatrix, born after the execution of the will and not provided for or mentioned therein, the court said that the daughter would be entitled under the statutes of the state, in the event of the decedent's intestacy, to succeed to her entire estate, and had, therefore, a right to appear in opposition to the probate of the will; but that if the will were duly executed, the circumstances set up were not sufficient to work its complete revocation; that the instrument, in the absence of other objections, must go to probate, even though none of its provisions except its appointment of an executor might be practically effective. And decision regarding the claims of the illegitimate child was deferred until after submission of proofs as to the execution of the will.

The will involved in the preceding case came before the supreme court in Bunce v. Bunce (1891) 27 Abb. N. C. 61, 20 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 332, 14 N. Y. Supp. 659. And it was held that the illegitimate daughter, who was the only child and was born after the execution of the will, had a right to her share, which in this case would amount to the whole property, of the mother's independent estate, under statutes providing that illegitimate children, in default of lawful issue, might inherit property from their mother as if legitimate, and that whenever a testator had a child born after the making of a will, and should die leaving such child unprovided for by any settlement and not mentioned in the will, such child should succeed to the portion of the parent's estate as would have descended or been distributed to it had the parent died intestate.

The statutes of some states provide expressly for revocation of the will by the subsequent birth of "legitimate" children of the testator. See, for example, Lewis v. Hare (1853) 8 La. Ann. 378. This would seem to negative any implied revocation by the birth of an illegitimate child.

But the birth of an illegitimate child to the testator after the making of the will was held in Milburn v. Milburn (1882) 60 Iowa, 411, 14 N. W. 204, to revoke the will, where there was general and notorious recognition by the testator of the child as his, and a statute provided that under such circumstances illegitimate children should inherit from their father. The court said: "It must be regarded as the settled rule in this state that the birth of a legitimate child to the testator, subsequent to the making of a will and before the testator's death, will alone operate as an implied revocation of the will. . . . It is provided by statute: 'Illegitimate children inherit from their mother, and the mother from the children. They shall inherit from their father, whenever the paternity is proved during the life of the father, or they have been recognized by him as his children, but such recognition must have been general and notorious, or else in writing.' . . . For the purpose of inheritance, an illegitimate child, when recognized by its father, stands on precisely the same footing as if it were legitimate. If the father dies intestate, both inherit, and such right can only be cut off by a will of the father, which is equally effectual as to both classes of children. The birth of a legitimate child entitles it to inherit, but this is not so as to an illegitimate child. For mere birth does not entitle the latter to inherit, but the notorious recognition does. Such recognition legitimizes the child. In the case at bar the testator, after making the will, recognized the plaintiff as his child. This being so, the statute provides that the right to inherit shall, from that time, exist. It follows that the plaintiff could only be deprived of such right in the same manner as a legitimate child, and that is by a will executed subsequently to the birth of the child. The statute does not provide that the birth of a child subsequently to the execution of a will has the effect to revoke it. In this respect the statute makes no difference between different classes of children. . . . It seems to us the statute under consideration leaves no room for construction, and as the rule is that the birth of a legitimate child, after the execution of a will by its father, has the effect to revoke a will, that, under the statute, the same results must follow the birth and recognition of an illegitimate child."

The question under consideration does not strictly arise in such cases as Re Del Genovese (1907) 56 Misc. 418, 107 N. Y. Supp. 1033, affirmed without opinion in (1909) 136 App. Div. 894, 120 N. Y. Supp. 1121, where the illegitimate child was legitimized by the marriage of the parents, and it was held that a will made before such marriage was revoked. It does not appear whether the will was executed prior to the birth of the child, but the court said that the will was completely revoked by the marriage of the deceased and the birth of lawful issue.

See, however, in this connection, McCulloch's Appeal (1886) 113 Pa. 247, 6 Atl. 253, among possibly other cases of the kind, where the illegitimate child was legitimized by the subsequent marriage of the parents, but it was held that a will made after the birth of the child, but before the marriage, was not revoked, since the child was not an "after-born" child, within the meaning of a statute providing that when any person made a will and afterwards married or had a child not provided for in the will, such child should be entitled to such share of the estate as if there had been no will; since the statute, in providing for after-born children, meant a physical birth, and not a mere legislative legitimation, after the making of the will.

Other cases, such as Caballero v. Executor (1872) 24 La. Ann. 573, and Davis v. Davis (1899) 27 Misc. 455, 59 N. Y. Supp. 223, involve the rights of a child legitimized by the marriage of its parents, where the parent died leaving a will, but in these cases the will was executed subsequently to the birth of the child.

Although not within the annotation, and valuable only by way of analogy, attention is called to several cases construing statutes relative to the rights of children unintentionally omitted from wills, because of their bearing on the construction of the term "children," where the party claiming that the will was revoked, at least partially, was an illegitimate child.

Where the statute made an illegitimate child an heir of its mother, it was held in Re Wardell (1881) 57 Cal. 484, that such a child, who was omitted from her mother's will with nothing to show that the omission was intentional, was within a statute providing that when any testator omitted to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appeared that such omission was intentional, such child, or the issue of such child, should have the same share in the estate of testator as if he had died intestate.

But it was held in Kent v. Barker (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 535, involving the mother's will, that an illegitimate child, although by a later statute given the right of inheritance from the mother in case of intestacy, was not within a statute providing in effect that when any testator unintentionally omitted to provide in his will for any of his children, they should take the same share in his estate as they would have been entitled to if he had died intestate.

To a similar effect is King v. Thisell (1915) 222 Mass. 140, 109 N. E. 880, where, relying on the case last above cited, the court held that the words "issue of any deceased child," in the statute providing that if a testator omitted to provide in his will for any of his children or for the issue of a deceased child, they should take the same share of his estate which they would have taken if he had died intestate, unless they were provided for by the testator in his lifetime, or unless it appeared that the omission was intentional, meant the legitimate issue of a deceased child, and that the illegitimate child of a child of the testator had no right under the statute.

And to the same effect is Mansfield v. Neff (1913) 43 Utah, 258, 134 Pac. 1160, the court referring to Kent v. Barker (Mass.) supra, and stating that the statute in that state was copied from the Massachusetts law.

Illegitimate children born after the execution of a will were held not entitled to share in the property in Mortimer v. West (1827) 3 Russ. Ch. 370, 38 Eng. Reprint, 615, 5 L. J. Ch. 181, 27 Revised Rep. 98, and Metham v. Devon (1718) 1 P. Wms. 529, 24 Eng.

Reprint, 502; but the decisions turn on the construction of the particular provision in the wills and the right of after-born children to take under a will, rather than on the question whether a will is revoked by the subsequent birth of an illegitimate child.

Mr. E. P. McDermott for appellees.

Day, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question involved in this case is the validity of a certain ordinance of the city of Kearney, Nebraska.

Plaintiff, who was the owner of certain lots abutting upon Central avenue at Twenty-fourth street in the city of Kearney, had commenced to erect thereon a filling station for the purpose of selling on the premises gasoline and lubricating oil to the users of motor vehicles. When the city council of defendant city learned of the character of the improvement the plaintiff intended to make and the nature of the business it proposed to conduct on the premises, the council very promptly passed the ordinance in question. Section 1 provides: "That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, firm, or corporation to erect or construct upon any lot, piece of lot, or parcel of land, a filling station wherein motor-propelled vehicles are run in for the purpose of receiving gasoline and oils, between Eighteenth and Thirty-first streets on Central avenue, in the city of Kearney, Nebraska."

Section 2 provides a penalty for a violation of the ordinance.

Acting under authority of this ordinance, the municipal authorities were proceeding to stop the further progress of the work on the filling station when this action was commenced. By this action the plaintiff sought an injunction restraining the municipal authorities from interfering with it in the construction of the improvement, upon the ground that the ordinance is unreasonable, discriminatory, and an illegal invasion of its property rights. The trial court found the issues in favor of the defendants, and dismissed the plaintiff's cause of action. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

It is conceded that the legislature has, by § 4862, Rev. Stat. 1913, delegated to the municipal authorities of cities of the class of defendant city the power to enact all needful ordinances, rules, and regulations for maintaining the peace, good government, and general welfare of such cities. It is manifest that the council, in passing the ordinance in question, was acting under the "general welfare" clause of the power delegated to it by the legislature. Generally speaking, it is within the right of municipal legislative authority, acting under the "general welfare" clause, to determine what ordinances are required to protect and secure the public health, comfort, and safety, but it may not, under the guise of such power, enact ordinances which are unreasonable, or discriminatory, or an invasion of constitutional rights.

In Peterson v. State, 79 Neb. 132, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 292, 126 Am. St. Rep. 651, 112 N. W. 306, it was held: "The determination of the question whether an ordinance is reasonably necessary for the protection of life and property within the city is committed, in the first instance, to the municipal authorities, and, when they have acted and passed an ordinance, it is presumptively valid, and the courts will not interfere with its enforcement until the unreasonableness or want of necessity of such measure is made to appear by satisfactory evidence."

The same principle is announced in State ex rel. Krittenbrink v. Withnell, 91 Neb. 101, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 898, 135 N. W. 376. Whether an ordinance of this character is a proper exercise of power becomes, therefore, in its last analysis, a question for the courts to decide, and when it appears from all of the facts and circumstances, to the satisfaction of the court, that an ordinance is unreasonable or discriminatory, or an invasion of constitutional rights, it is the duty of the courts to declare such ordinance void.

With this general principle in mind, we proceed to examine the facts and circumstances existing at the time the ordinance was passed, and the mischief proposed to be remedied thereby. The record shows that the plaintiff was proceeding to erect upon its lots abutting on Central avenue and Twenty-fourth street a filling station for the purpose of vending oils and gasoline to the users of motor vehicles, when stopped by the defendants. The general plan of the improvement contemplated the construction of a small one-story cement and concrete office building, standing well back from the two streets, and having a wide semi-circular driveway extending from Central avenue to Twenty-fourth street across the plaintiff's premises. The plan was that a customer by driving across the sidewalk could enter upon the premises from either of the two streets, it being the intention that a customer who entered the premises from Central avenue, after having his wants supplied, could make his exit on Twenty-fourth street, and vice versa. Pumps were to be stationed along the driveway in the open air, well back from the streets, by means of which customers were to be supplied with gasoline. It was the plan to store the gasoline upon the premises in large steel tanks specially designed for the purpose, and buried in the ground, while the oil was to be stored in metal cans such as are generally used for that purpose. The building itself fully complied with the fire-protection and building ordinances of the city, and the proposed manner of storing the gasoline and oils on the premises was not in violation of any ordinance of the city, or any law of the state.

It further appears that Central avenue is the principal business street in the city, and that the plaintiff's property is one of the important corners along that street. For about four blocks south of the proposed improvement, the business consists mostly of retail stores in buildings of one and two stories. Along the street are a few very valuable improvements, such as the Federal postoffice building, a church, a hotel, and residences.

It will be noted that the ordinance forbids the construction of a "filling station" wherein motor-propelled vehicles are run in for the purpose of receiving gasoline and oil. Just what the council may have intended by the term "filling station" is not entirely free from doubt. It would seem, however, that there could be an equipment which would come within the general meaning of that term, where no building was employed, and that therefore, the building which the plaintiff proposed to construct was not the objectionable feature of the improvement. The ordinance, as we view it, does not prevent the storing of oils and gasoline on the premises within the restricted district, and selling them to users of motor vehicles at the curb of the street. In fact, it is shown that within a few doors from the plaintiff's premises, and within the district, gasoline is being sold to users from a pump at the curb; the gasoline being stored in a large tank beneath the sidewalk. If the ordinance was really intended as a good-faith fire protection measure, it would seem that it would have been more general in its application, both as respects the territory in which it operated and the persons to whom it applied. It is difficult to see how there would be more danger to the public from selling gasoline and oil from a pump on the premises, than from selling the same commodities from a pump at the curb of the street; both being in the open air. Besides this, the ordinance by its terms operates on Central avenue only, and from the conditions as shown by the photographs in evidence there would be as much danger from such a business conducted just off Central avenue as along that street.

In further support of the ordinance, it is argued that the crossing of the sidewalk by motor vehicles would unwarrantably interfere with the use thereof by pedestrians. The record does not show the approximate number of pedestrians using the sidewalk, nor the extent of the interference which the motor vehicles would entail. The court will, however, take judicial notice of the fact that the population of defendant city is less than 8,000, and from the circumstances in evidence, as shown by the photographs, we are convinced that the slight inconvenience to pedestrians by motor vehicles crossing the sidewalk is not of sufficient magnitude to justify the ordinance on that ground. The automobile as a business and pleasure vehicle has come to stay, and the rights of users, who constitute a considerable part of the public, must also be considered in determining the validity of ordinances of this nature. Besides this, within one block from the plaintiff's premises, and within the district, is a public garage, access to which is had across the sidewalk. It is conceded that the ordinance does not prohibit crossing the sidewalk to enter the garage. It is also claimed that the noise of the honking of horns and the running of the engines would be a nuisance to the other users of the street. The noise, however, is only incidental to, and not a necessary part of, the proposed business. If the protection of the public from noise was the purpose sought to be attained, it would seem that it could be easily controlled by proper ordinances going directly to that subject.

judicial notice—

Without extending the argument further, we are satisfied from a consideration of the entire record that the ordinance cannot be sustained.

While there are some phases of it which, upon first impression, appear to be within the domain of the proper exercise of the police power of the municipality, yet, when considered in connection with the facts and circumstances as shown by the record, it becomes apparent that it is an unreasonable, arbitrary, and discriminatory exercise of power. We think the real reason for the ordinance is set forth in the defendant's answer, wherein it is charged that the construction of an oil filling station on the principal street of the city would be an "everlasting eyesore and disgrace." While great latitude must be given to municipalities in the matter of the exercise of police power, it must not be carried to the extent that it is unreasonable, arbitrary, or discriminatory.

From what has been said, it follows that the trial court should have granted the relief prayed. The judgment of the District Court is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree granting the injunction prayed.

Dean, J., dissenting:

Under the facts and the law it seems that the judgment should be affirmed. The ordinance prohibits the erection, on a certain designated part of a certain street, of all oil filling stations of a certain class, namely, those "wherein motor-propelled vehicles are run in for the purpose of receiving gasoline and oils."

There is a stipulation in the record wherein, among other things, substantially these material facts appear: Immediately east, and across Central avenue, from the proposed site of the oil filling station, is located the United States postoffice, a two-story marble building erected at a cost of about $150,000, and also an apartment house. One block away from plaintiff's lots is located the three-story 100-room Midway hotel, and just across the street therefrom, and one block from plaintiff's lots, is the Christian Church, and east and north of that church is a residence district. About a half block west of plaintiff's lots is a Catholic Church, and connected therewith is a parochial school, which is open and in continuous session nine months in the year. A block south of the Catholic Church and school is the Presbyterian Church, and across the street east from the Presbyterian Church is the Christian Science Church. Both sides of the four blocks that are directly south of plaintiff's lots are practically all built up with business houses. Central avenue, whereon the proposed oil filling station is to be permanently located, is one of Kearney's principal business streets, and is one of the main traveled routes from the business center, on a paved street that leads to the State Teachers' College. On the east and south sides of the block in which are situated plaintiff's lots the sidewalks are about 20 feet wide.

It is in the midst of such an environment that there has been permanently located, almost under the eaves of a $150,000 Federal building, by a judgment of this court, a noise-producing oil filling station that is to be used, as we are informed by plaintiff's brief, "in said business of vending oils, grease, and gasoline." The environment of the new structure will, as the stipulation shows, consist of a group of four leading churches, a church school, an apartment house, a large hotel, and the Federal building; a residence section of the city being on one side and the business center on the other. The oil station is permanently established over the protest of the city council, and in violation of an ordinance, adopted under the police power, and contrary to a judgment of the district court pronounced by a judge who has resided in Kearney more than thirty years, and who has been a district judge for almost twenty years.

One of Kearney's leading citizens, who lives directly across the street from a "two-pump" oil filling station, testified, in substance, that on Saturday evenings, from 5 o'clock until midnight, and on Sunday afternoons and evenings and on holidays, the station does a very large business, and at such times from four to six cars stand and honk and wait, all clamoring to be served at one time, and that to add to the confusion about half of the cars, while waiting, permit their engines to run, so that the noise interferes with ordinary conversation on his porch and injuriously affects the health of his family. He further testified that the traffic on the street was congested by large motor trucks and mule trucks backing up to the curb to fill the tank of the station with gasoline almost every evening; and that it was further obstructed by from three to six cars standing at the curb in the evenings waiting to have air pumped into the tires. He said his knowledge was confined to the hours named, as he was not at home very much during the day throughout the week. No evidence was offered by plaintiff on the question of noise, other than that of an employee of plaintiff, who testified that their men were instructed to ask car drivers to stop their engines while the tank was being filled. It is, however, suggested in plaintiff's brief that it was the customers, and not the plaintiff, that created the noise and the confusion of which complaint is made. But that suggestion does not meet the objection. In view of the evidence it is perhaps well that the Federal court has not yet begun to hold its sessions on the second floor of the Federal building.

In its argument plaintiff contends that the ordinance is discriminatory because two "gasolene curb pumps" have been installed on the street in question. The contention is not sound. There is a vast difference between a "gasolene curb pump," a temporary and transitory contrivance, installed before the passage of the ordinance in question, and a permanent "oil filling station," to be used for selling "oils, grease, and gasolene." They are not in the same class, nor can a comparison properly be drawn between a "gasolene curb pump" that was first brought into use by the pioneer oil sellers, and now almost obsolete, and a pretentious, modern, and permanent "gas filling station," the last word in architectural expression and design of the modern oil vender.

The majority opinion points out that the automobile, that indispensable adjunct of modern and social life, has come to stay. Likewise the pedestrian. And some inalienable rights remain to him. Among these is the right freely to walk in peace and in safety on either side of a public street that he may choose. It is obvious that an oil filling station, located on a street corner in the business center, no matter how attractive, when newly built, in architectural design and appearance, with cars darting in and darting out, across a greasy sidewalk, adds to the perils of the passing pedestrian, of whatever age or sex. But in its brief plaintiff makes this argument in extenuation of its persistent and unwelcome intrusion. It says: "The slight inconvenience to pedestrians using the sidewalks on the same side of the street, although they could use the ones on the opposite side, must, as a public necessity, be submitted to."

Doubtless the same argument, upon which comment may well be spared, was advanced in the district court and was noted by the trial judge.

It has often been said that the police power is to the state what self-protection is to the citizen. It is for the city council, then, under that beneficent power, reasonably to determine in the first instance in what district certain occupations, and the erection of certain structures, shall be prohibited. Under the police power the city council may determine, too, whether the perils of automobile traffic to pedestrians upon the main street intersections shall be diminished, and the safety of the citizens enhanced, by preventing the establishment on its prominent street corners of such oil filling stations and at such locations as the present case contemplates. And if complaint is made, as here made, and notwithstanding we must try the case here de novo, we have held, in the past, that the judgment of the district court, in an equity case, should be given great weight by this court when sitting as a court of review. And this case is not an exception. The question is: Has the council been unreasonable in its exercise of the police power? I submit that it does not clearly so appear. I fear that the fact has been overlooked that a reasonable exercise of the police power inheres in the city council.

A citizen should not be permitted so to use his property as to thereby create a nuisance, nor so to use it that it will become a menace to the personal and physical safety of others. Plainly speaking, plaintiff has been given permission to do both. In support of the views expressed herein these authorities are cited: Ex parte Wolf, 14 Neb. 24, 14 N. W. 660; Peterson v. State, 79 Neb. 132, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 292, 126 Am. St. Rep. 651, 112 N. W. 306; Re Anderson, 69 Neb. 686, 96 N. W. 149, 5 Ann. Cas. 421; *State ex rel. Krittenbrink v. For the reasons herein stated, I respectfully dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court.

ANNOTATION.

Public regulation of gasoline filling stations.

There is very little authority upon this subject, due probably to the recent origin of gasoline filling stations.

The public regulation of such stations is ordinarily in the hands of municipal corporations, which receive their authority from the legislature.

It will be observed that the ordinance on the subject was held invalid in the reported case (STANDARD OIL Co. v. KEARNEY, ante, 95) as being an arbitrary, unreasonable, and discriminatory exercise of the police power.

In the similar case of Invader Oil & Ref. Co. v. Ft. Worth (1921) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 229 S. W. 616, where, as in the reported case (STANDARD OIL Co. v. KEARNEY), the erection of a gasoline filling station upon private premises had been commenced and the ordinance was immediately passed to prevent it, the court, although calling attention to the elaborate briefs of counsel and the authorities cited therein upon the point, refused to decide the question of the validity of an ordinance prohibiting the erection of gasoline stations within the corporate limits of the city without first obtaining a permit from the board of commissioners of the city, in so far as such ordinance might affect the issuance of future permits, because it had reached the conclusion that the ordinance should not be held to operate against and affect one who had obtained all the permits necessary for a filling station prior to the passage of the ordinance. It was held that this ordinance, which made its violation a misdemeanor, was penal in effect, and should be construed strictly against the accused and favorably and equitably for him; and that as the intention that it operate retroactively did not clearly and strongly appear, and was not manifested in appropriate words, it was not to be given such operation, where to do so would materially change existing rights. The court said that there was a further consideration that might be noted, that while a statute, although subordinate to the Constitution, is not dependent for its validity upon its reasonableness, yet an ordinance, unless expressly authorized by the legislature, must be reasonable. Under a section of the ordinance where it enumerated the things to be considered by the commissioners in granting or refusing a permit, it provided that said commissioners may consider "how long existing filling stations have been in operation, and the consent or acquiescence in their location by the occupants or owners of the adjacent buildings or residences;" and the court was of the opinion, in view of the strict rule of construction to be invoked, that this reference should be held to refer to filling stations already in operation, but which had not secured a permit under any ordinance. The court, however, intimated that the city could revoke its permit for the construction of the gasoline station in question, under the principle that a municipality is not estopped to withdraw its privilege or permit theretofore granted to conduct a business within its confines.

And a city was held, in Des Moines v. Manhattan Oil Co. (1921) — Iowa, —, — A.L.R. —, 184 N. W. 823, to have power to rescind a permit for the construction of a gasoline and oil filling station upon private property, in what was to be a restricted residence district, upon the ground that the adoption of the resolution of the city council granting such permit did not have the effect of conferring upon the owner of the property, or the one to whom it was leased for the site of such a station, a vested right which could not be canceled or recalled, under the circumstances shown, which were stated in the opinion as follows: "The lessor had not yet acquired title to the property, and did not acquire it until after the permit had been rescinded. The proposed filling station had not been constructed, though it is claimed certain material intended for that use had been deposited there. When the application for permit was made, there was then pending and undisposed of before the council, as the applicant well knew, the petition of the property owners within this area to make it a restricted residence district, and if the council, having adopted the resolution to grant the permit under such circumstances, concluded it had acted inadvertently, or improvidently, or without regard for the rights of the petitioners for a restricted district, rescinded the resolution with reasonable promptness, we are of the opinion it did not exceed its authority or abuse its discretion."

In construing a by-law of a city requiring a license for the privilege of carrying on the business of a public garage, passed in pursuance of the provision of a municipal act authorizing the passage, by the councils of cities, of by-laws for licensing and regulating public garages, and defining a public garage to be a "garage where motor cars are hired or kept or used for hire, or where such cars, or gasoline, oils, or other accessories, are stored or kept for sale," it was held in Toronto v. Canadian Oil Cos. (1919) 45 Ont. L. Rep. 225, that such by-law did not apply to a business which consisted in supplying, to persons using automobiles, gasoline and air, where the building on the premises where the business was conducted did not and could not afford storage for automobiles.

As to gasoline filling stations in the street, it was held in Keyser v. Boise (1917) 30 Idaho, 440, L.R.A. 1917F, 1004, 165 Pac. 1121, that a municipal corporation is without authority, in the absence of a legislative enactment expressly permitting it, to grant a private person or corporation a permit to erect or maintain a gasoline pump in a street, and therefore its purported license for that purpose may be revoked at pleasure, although expense has been incurred on the faith of it. The court said: "Anyone obtaining a permit from the city for the private use of a public street, as in this case, takes the same with notice that it is subject to revocation at the will of the city, and indeed, in this view, it matters not whether the use is made in accordance with a permit or without one; the use is merely permissive in either event, and revocable at any time without notice.

. . . The holder of a permit to install an obstruction in a public street or thoroughfare, for a private purpose, acquires no property or contractual right by reason of the issuance to him of such permit, and whenever the city authorities, in their discretion, deem it necessary, as a proper police measure, to vacate and revoke such permit, the holder of the same has no alternative, but must comply with the order of revocation.

. . . It may be that a different rule would apply if the municipality had been given the right to grant such a permit by statute. Some cases have gone to the extent of announcing a rule contrary to the one herein expressed, apparently upon the theory that a municipality has a right, in the absence of a statute authorizing it, to grant an irrevocable license or permit of a private use of the streets, so long as such use does not materially interfere with the use thereof by the public. . . . While the latter view has some very plausible arguments in its favor, we are not in accord with it; for, as indicated above, the former view is supported by the weight of modern authority and by sound legal principle."

That the legislature has power to confer authority upon a municipality to grant a permit to install a gasoline station in a street was conceded in New Orleans v. Shuler (1916) 140 La. 657, 73 So. 715, the question being as to whether it had done so. It was there held that the authority of a city to adopt an ordinance forbidding, unless by permission of the council, the placing of a gasoline pump on the outer edge of a sidewalk, and requiring, as one condition of such permission, the payment of an annual fee to the city, was delegated to the city by the following provisions of its charter: "The city shall also have all powers, privileges, and functions which, by or pursuant to the Constitution of this state, have been or could be granted to or exercised by any city. The legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the city shall extend to all matters of local and municipal government, it being the intent thereof that the specifications of particular powers by any other provision of this charter shall never be construed as impairing the effect of the general grant of powers of local government hereby bestowed."

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a judgment affirming a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County in favor of complainant in a suit to partition certain lands. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John A. Huff for plaintiffs in certiorari.

Mr. Charles M. Roberts for defendant in certiorari.

L. D. Smith, Special Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a partition proceeding. The complainant, James McGhee, claims that he owns a one-half undivided interest in the two certain tracts of land described in the original bill, and concedes that the defendants own the other one half. The defendants claim that the complainant owns only a one-sixth undivided interest, while they themselves own a five-sixths undivided interest.

James McGhee is the child and only heir at law of Emma L. McGhee Henry, deceased, and the defendants are the only children and heirs at law of Robert H. Henry, deceased. Emma L. McGhee Henry and Robert H. Henry were married sometime prior to the 8th of April, 1910. One of the tracts of land sought to be partitioned was conveyed to Robert Henry and wife, Emma L. McGhee Henry, on April 8, 1910; the other was conveyed to them on the 7th of December, 1910. They owned these tracts or lots of land by the entirety at the time of their deaths. They died simultaneously on the 13th day of January, 1919, by being burned up in a building which was burned down over them at Lonsdale, West Virginia.

The chancellor, upon a reference, decreed that the lands were not susceptible of partition in kind, and ordered a sale of the lands for division of the proceeds. He decreed that the complainant, as the only heir of Emma L. McGhee Henry, the wife, was entitled to one half of the proceeds, and that the defendants, the children and only heirs at law of Robert H. Henry, the husband, were entitled to the other one half. From this decree of the chancellor the defendants appealed to the court of civil appeals. The latter court affirmed the action of the chancellor. The case is now before this court upon a petition for certiorari by the defendants, who claim that each of them is entitled to a one sixth of the entire proceeds and that the complainant is entitled to only a one sixth instead of a one half as decreed by the chancellor.

There is no question in this record but that Robert H. Henry and his wife, by virtue of deeds executed to them, owned the property in question as tenants by the entirety. Neither is there any question as to whether the husband or the wife survived the other; it being stipulated that they died simultaneously in a disaster.

An estate by the entirety is one limited to the lifetime of the husband and wife; indeed, it is one limited to the continuance of the relationship of husband and wife. It is an estate which can be ended by the joint conveyance of husband and wife. It is like a joint estate, in that each is entitled to an equal interest and to take the whole upon the death of the other. It is unlike a joint estate, in that neither can separate his interest from the other except by the joint action of both or by operation of law. This result is based upon the legal notion of the unity of two persons who are husband and wife. "In point of fact," as stated by Mr. Preston, "and agreeable to natural reason, free from artificial deductions, the husband and wife are distinct and individual persons."

It follows from what has been said that every other right than that which has been deduced from this legal notion of unity of husband and wife,—that is, on the death of one of them, the entire estate goes to the survivor without the power of alienation or forfeiture of either alone to prejudice the right of the other,—must be treated as applying to them without respect to their social unity; therefore as being held by them in moieties, as other distinct and individual persons would be. In other words, the only limitation of the full property right in the lands conveyed to them jointly is the right of survivorship in the other, and that neither had the power of alienation so as to prejudice the right of the other. —held as tenants in common.

In all other respects they must be treated as holding the property as if they were separate individuals, which under our statutes is as tenants in common, and at common law is equal. Washb. Real Prop. § 406.

While the exact question presented here has never arisen before in this court or before in any other court of which we are advised, the principles above stated were applied in Hopson v. Fowlkes, 92 Tenn. 697, 23 L.R.A. 805, 36 Am. St. Rep. 120, 23 S. W. 55. In that case there was a separation of husband and wife by divorce, and the question presented was the effect of the divorce on this estate by the entirety. It was reasoned therein that the relation of husband and wife was terminated by the divorce; that their interests and duties from thenceforth as related to each other were as though they never existed. The court said, among other things: "It was that circumstance [marriage], and that alone, which gave to them the joint life estate and the right to joint possession. When the very thing which, by operation of law, gave them a joint estate was destroyed, by operation of the same law the joint estate ceased, and they then became vested with an estate per my as tenants in common."

This doctrine was also applied in the case of Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 683, 70 Am. Dec. 269, wherein it was said: Since "they cannot longer hold by a joint seisin, they must hold by moieties. The law, in destroying the unity of persons between them, has, by necessary consequence, destroyed the unity of seisin in respect to their joint estate; for independent of the matrimonial union this tenancy cannot exist."

Likewise it must be held that the estate is limited by the period of the matrimonial union, and, when death comes to both at the same instant, it must descend as if husband and wife had been tenants in common.

Descent and distribution—of estate held by entirety.

There is no room in this case for the presumption that one or the other survived. The weight of modern authority is, except where the question is governed by statute, if two or more persons perish in the same disaster and there is no fact or circumstance to prove which survived, there is no presumption whatever on the subject. 8 R. C. L. p. 716, and authorities there cited. As heretofore stated, it is stipulated in this case that the husband and wife died simultaneously.

Evidence—presumption as to survivorship in case several perish in same disaster.

It results, therefore, that there was no error in the decree of the Chancery Court, and the same is in all respects affirmed, and the case will be remanded to the Chancery Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Effect on joint estate, community estate, or estate by entireties, of death of both tenants in same disaster.

The earliest case in which arose the question of the devolution of a joint estate when both tenants meet their death in a common disaster was Broughton v. Randall (1596) Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 502, 78 Eng. Reprint, 752, Noy, 64, 74 Eng. Reprint, 1032. In that case there was evidence by which the fact of survivorship could be and was determined. It appeared that a father and his son were both hanged from the same cart. They were joint tenants in certain real estate, and the widow of one of them claimed and established her dower right on the ground that her husband lived longer. The two reports differ as to whether it was the father or the son who lived longer, but both agree on the determining fact in the case; namely, that one victim was noticed to move his feet or shake his legs after the other's muscles were stilled in death.

The question was next presented in Bradshaw v. Toulmin (1784) 2 Dick. 633, 21 Eng. Reprint, 417. The report contains no statement of the facts, and merely states that "Lord Thurlow, C., said, if two persons, being joint tenants, perish by one blow, the estate will remain in joint tenancy, in their respective heirs." It is apparent, however, that there was no evidence as to which of the tenants survived the other.

In the reported case (McGHEE v. HENRY, ante, 103), wherein it appeared that husband and wife, tenants by the entirety, died simultaneously in a fire, it is held that the property descended as if the husband and wife had been tenants in common. No question of survivorship was in issue, it being stipulated that their deaths were simultaneous. (The question as to the disposition of life insurance which, by the terms of the policy, is dependent upon survivorship, where there is no presumption or proof of survivorship, is the subject of annotation in 5 A.L.R. 797).

It appeared in Hollister v. Cordero (1888) 76 Cal. 649, 18 Pac. 855, that husband and wife owned certain community property. Both were murdered at their home, and the house was set afire. On the issue of survivorship the evidence was without conflict. The witnesses testified that they arrived at the scene of the murder on the morning after the killing. The body of the woman lay near the door; the hoops of her crinoline lay over her head, showing that she had been dragged into the house by the feet; there were small foot tracks around a large rock a few yards from the house, and blood on the rock; there was a mark on the ground, indicating that the body of the woman had been dragged from the rock to the house, and there was the blood mark of a small hand on the stone doorstep, showing that she had clutched the doorstep as she was being dragged into the house. The body of the husband lay in the middle of the floor near the fireplace, with several large wounds on it. Both bodies were badly burned. The remains of the servant—a shepherd—were found several days later in the bottom of a stream several rods from the house. Affirming a finding by the trial judge that the husband survived the wife, and hence a judgment for his heirs, the court said: "We cannot agree with counsel for appellant in saying that the evidence 'points clearly and unmistakably to the conclusion that the husband was first slain within their dwelling on the ranch, and that the wife was afterwards pursued, seized outside of their habitation, murdered, and dragged by the feet over the threshold of the door, and the building then set on fire.' It may be that such was the fact; but there is nothing to show which one expired first. The husband may have been wounded, and left on the floor of the house while they were pursuing the wife, and may have been alive when the latter was dragged into the house. No one can say from the evidence which one died first. Both may have been living while the house was burning. The court below, we think, properly indulged the presumption authorized by subdivision 40, § 1963, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: 'When two persons perish in the same calamity, such as a wreck, a battle, or a conflagration, and it is not shown who died first, and there are no particular circumstances from which it can be inferred, survivorship is presumed from the probabilities resulting from the strength, age, and sex, according to the following rules: If both be over fifteen and under sixty, and the sexes be different, the male is presumed to have survived; if the sexes be the same, then the older.' Both were between the ages of fifteen and sixty. Both perished in the same calamity. The murder, perpetrated as it was, was a calamity within the meaning of § 1693, supra,—as much so as would be a shipwreck or a battle; and the court found that there were no particular circumstances from which it could infer who died first. We think the decision of the court upon the issue was right." A. S. M.

STATE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

(— Neb. —, 184 N. W. 84.)

Insurance — blood poisoning — effect of wound.

1. Where the insured sustains an injury through violent, external, and accidental means, and blood poisoning sets in, finally resulting in death, it is immaterial whether the infection was introduced at the time of the accident, and through the instrument operating to cause the injury, if the infection enters before the wound has become so cured as to prevent exposure to infection, and if the infection comes about naturally, without any apparent human act to produce it.

Evidence — presumption against suicide.

2. In a suit on an insurance policy, covering death caused by violent, external, and accidental means, where the proof reasonably shows that an injury was produced by violent and external means, and where there is no ground for suspicion that the wound was intentionally inflicted, there is a presumption that the insured did not voluntarily inflict the injury upon himself, and it is presumed that the injury was the result of accident.

Insurance — death result of accident.

3. The blood poisoning resulting in such a wound will be considered as the effect of the injury, and not as an additional or other cause aside from the accident, and the consequent death is held to be the result of the accident exclusively and independently of other causes.

Trial — instruction — consideration of circumstances.

4. An instruction that the jury, in determining the cause of the injury, might consider all the facts and circumstances in evidence, and were entitled to draw reasonable inferences and conclusions from such facts and circumstances, held not erroneous and not misleading so as to authorize the jury to draw illogical inferences.

Evidence — opinion — basis.

5. An opinion of an expert must be based upon facts, proved or assumed, sufficient to form a basis for an opinion, and cannot be invoked to supply the substantial facts necessary to support that conclusion.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County (Estelle, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. W. Blackburn for appellant.
Messrs. Merton L. Corey and Edward F. Dougherty, for appellee:

Where death results from disease which follows as a natural though not as a necessary consequence of an accidental wound, the death is caused by the wound within the requirements of an accident policy which insures against death resulting solely from external, violent, and accidental means.

Rathjen v. Woodmen Acci. Asso. 93 Neb. 629, 141 N. W. 815; Western Commercial Travelers' Asso. v. Smith, 40 L.R.A. 653, 29 C. C. A. 223, 56 U. S. App. 393, 85 Fed. 401; Caldwell v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 156 Iowa, 327, 136 N. W. 678; French v. Fidelity & C. Co. 135 Wis. 259, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1011, 115 N. W. 869; Delaney v. Modern Acci. Club, 121

Proof that an injury was external, violent, and accidental may be furnished by the nature of the injury itself and the surrounding circumstances.

1 C. J. 495; Omberg v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 101 Ky. 303, 72 Am. St. Rep. 413, 40 S. W. 909; Meadows v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 129 Mo. 76, 50 Am. St. Rep. 427, 31 S. W. 578; Caldwell v. There is a legal presumption that a wound was not intentionally inflicted either by the wounded person himself or by a third person, and this presumption is available as affirmative evidence from which a jury may draw the inference that the wound was caused by accidental means.

A medical expert who has examined a wounded person may give his opinion, not only as to the nature and effect of the wound, but also as to the manner in which, and the instrument with which, it might have been inflicted, and he may state his opinion as to the cause of his injury or the cause of his death.

State v. Brackey, 175 Iowa, 599, 157 N. W. 198; 5 Enc. Ev. p. 580.

Flansburg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover on an insurance policy under a provision allowing double indemnity in case of the death of the insured, resulting from bodily injury, sustained and effected directly through external, violent, and accidental means, exclusively and independently of all other causes. The company had paid the face of the policy, but denied liability for double indemnity, under the provision mentioned. Trial was had to a jury and judgment resulted in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant insurance company appeals.

The testimony upon which plaintiff's case is based stands practically without contradiction, and the defendant contends, under the facts so shown, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and argues that there is no evidence that the insured sustained a bodily injury through external, violent, and accidental means, and that there is no evidence sufficient to show that death was the result of the accidental injury alleged, since death is shown to have been caused by blood poisoning, and since it does not appear that the poisonous infection was introduced into the wound at the time of the initial injury.

The testimony in behalf of the plaintiff shows that insured and his son, in the latter part of October, 1918, were engaged on the farm of the insured near Valentine, Nebraska, in harvesting a crop of beans and that the field was badly infested with sand burs. While the harvesting was going on, as insured's wife says, or shortly after it concluded as insured's son puts it, the insured was noticed by them to be pressing and picking at his thumb. The son testifies that he looked at insured's thumb and there appeared to be a small hole, a place like a thorn leaves after it has gone in, and that just about the little red spot in the center the skin had turned red and that a sort of callous had formed about the place. The widow's testimony was that she noticed the insured pressing his thumb and picking at it, as if to remove a sliver.

Insured was engaged in the undertaking business, to which he devoted part of his time each week. Shortly after the time the above observations were made, the insured left for Valentine, and was gone a week, engaged in his undertaking business. The testimony shows that he did not directly-handle bodies, as he had a helper to do that, but that he did do embalming and inject embalming fluids. When he returned to the farm he was still pressing and working with his thumb. At that time it had become slightly swollen, and from then on the testimony fully shows the progress of an infection, resulting in the swelling of his entire arm, and finally in his death, which occurred on November 17 following. The testimony of physicians in behalf of the defendant was to the effect that any such infection, originating underneath the skin, is always due to entrance of germs by means of some injury which has resulted in an opening of the skin, although the opening may be ever so slight, and that in this particular instance the infection must have entered through the opening in the skin of insured's thumb. That death resulted from blood poisoning, so introduced into the physical system of the insured, would seem to be beyond reasonable question.

The testimony, however, in behalf of the defendant, which stands undisputed, is that whenever an infection enters a wound it will manifest itself in a few hours, almost always within twenty-four to thirty-six hours, and never more than three days afterwards. It would seem, then, from the testimony as it stands, that the infection of which the insured died, though perhaps not received at the time of the original injury to his thumb, was at least received later through that injury and before it had become entirely cured.

It is one of defendant's contentions that the evidence is insufficient to show that the insured met with any injury through external, violent, and accidental means, and that, though there is evidence to show that there was a small abrasion or slight hole in the insured's thumb, there is nothing to show how it was produced, and that its cause must rest entirely in conjecture; and in argument defendant suggests that the insured may have had a pimple or a growth in his thumb resulting from some internal cause, and may have picked at it so as to, himself, have opened the skin and caused a wound through which the poisonous infection entered, and that, since one inference is as likely to be drawn as the other, the plaintiff has not carried the burden of proof, and that the plaintiff's action should, therefore, be dismissed.

The testimony of plaintiff's physicians shows that insured's thumb had been examined, in an endeavor to find some foreign substance that had pierced the skin, but that no thorn, or other foreign substance, was discovered, and that the place where any such foreign matter might have lodged was cut away. One of these physicians testifies that when the skin is pierced by a thorn, or other foreign substance, and the foreign matter, or a part thereof, is left in the skin, a callous will form immediately about it, thus walling off the foreign substance from the physical system; that nature thus provides a protective remedy.

The testimony of insured's son, describing the wound as a place like a thorn leaves after it has gone in, with a little red opening where the skin had been pierced, and with a callous about it, in connection with the circumstance of the insured's being employed at that time, or immediately before, in a field infested with sand burs, and in the light of the actions of the insured in pressing his thumb and picking at it, as if to remove a sliver, would, to the ordinary mind, it seems to us, reasonably result in the conviction that a thorn, or some such foreign matter, had pierced insured's thumb.

This evidence, furthermore, is aided by the presumption that insured did not voluntarily inflict an injury upon himself. It is plain that the insured's thumb was pierced by some foreign substance. The wound and the nature of the wound are proved. Such an injury could only be the result of violent and external means, and, when the proof goes so far, the presumption is in favor of an accident. Under this condition of the evidence, aided by such presumption, we are unable to agree with the defendant's argument that the cause of the injury must be left entirely to conjecture, or that the jury was called upon to guess, without evidence or reasonable inference to guide it, between the theory that the wound was caused through accidental means and the theory that the insured had, himself, with some instrument, voluntarily produced it. Caldwell v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 156 Iowa, 327, 136 N. W. 678; Omberg v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 101 Ky. 303, 72 Am. St. Rep. 413, 40 S. W. 909; Peck v. Equitable Acci. Asso. 52 Hun, 255, 5 N. Y. Supp. 215; 1 C. J. 495, § 278.

Though we do not deem it necessary to go into that question, some of the decisions are to the effect that even where the insured, through a voluntary act, pricks at a pimple and opens the skin, and in doing so unknowingly uses an instrument carrying infection, the resulting blood poisoning will be held to be the result of accident, rather than due to the voluntary act of the insured. Nax v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (C. C.) 130 Fed. 985; Lewis v. Ocean Acci. & G. Corp. 224 N. Y. 18, 7 A.L.R. 1129, 120 N. E. 56; Interstate Business Men's Acci. Asso. v. Lewis, 168 C. C. A. 325, 257 Fed. 241. And see National Surety

Defendant makes the contention, since it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that death resulted from an accident exclusively and independently of all other causes than the accident that, before he can recover in this case, he must show that the poisonous infection was received as a part of the accident and at the time of the original injury.

It is argued that when there is an accidental injury, resulting in an abrasion of the skin, but no infectious matter is injected into the wound through the instrument operating to cause the injury, the injury resulting from the accident becomes complete, and, when an infection enters later through the wound produced, it becomes a new and intervening cause and one other than from the accident itself, and that, when death results in such case from blood poisoning, though, under the general rules of law on proximate cause, the death may be considered to have been caused by the accident, yet, under the specific provisions of the policy, before there can be a liability, the death must result from the accident exclusively and independently of all other causes, and it is argued that the accident is not the sole cause independent of all others, where blood poisoning later sets in and acts as a contributing cause, and that the company is not liable for the results of such several causes taken together.

The question then, as it now occurs, is whether the infection shown in this case, entering a wound which had been previously produced by accidental means, was an additional, contributing, or other cause than the injury produced by the accident itself, or whether it was merely incidental to the wound and a natural consequence therefrom.

The abrasion of the skin caused a necessary exposure to such an infection. It was an exposure that could not be entirely guarded against until the foreign substance was removed, or the wound cured. It was a natural consequence that such an infection might set in, and that the wound, of slight and trivial nature in its beginning, should through the wound produced by the dire results. The infection was not of some specific disease to which there had been a careless or conscious exposure (see Maryland Casualty Co. v. Spitz, L.R.A.1918C, 1191, 159 C. C. A. 119, 246 Fed. 817), but of a kind that naturally develops from the wound itself, without any apparent human act to aid it. When the infection enters through the wound produced by the original accidental injury, naturally and before the wound has become so cured as to prevent exposure to infection, it seems to us immaterial when the infection enters. Rich v. Hartford Acci. & Indemnity Co. 208 Ill. App. 506; Delaney v. Modern Acci. Club, 121 Iowa, 528, 63 L.R.A. 603, 97 N. W. 91; Bell v. State L. Ins. Co. 24 Ga. App. 497, 101 S. E. 541. When it appears that the original injury continues to develop in character and grow worse, it is impossible to determine just when an infection has entered it. In the eyes of the ordinary individual it is the original injury, through the process of development, which produces the final result, and the provision of the policy must be interpreted in that light. Lewis v. Ocean Acci. & G. Corp. 224 N. Y. 18, 7 A.L.R. 1129, 120 N. E. 56; Delaney v. Modern Acci. Club, 121 Iowa, 528, 63 L.R.A. 603, 97 N. W. 91. There is no specific expression in the policy, as is found in some policies covering death by accident, that, whenever an accidental injury through the complication of infection shall produce death, there shall be no liability on the part of the company, unless the infection is shown to have been introduced at the time of the accident and by the instrument operating to cause the injury; and where the contract does not so provide we can see no reason for making such an exception.

It is true, as defendant argues, that when insured's son first examined the wound he said that, though there was a small hole, it appeared to have healed over. Just what he meant is somewhat indefinite, but that testimony does not show that the wound had been cured, or that the danger of infection from the original injury had passed. The insured, it was shown, continued to work at his thumb, in an apparent endeavor to remove some object from the wound. It seems quite apparent that the injury had not been cured, but continued from the beginning to be a source of irritation, though it may be true that the surface of the skin over it may have appeared to heal.

We believe that the blood poisoning shown in this case was a natural incident of the wound, and should be considered as an effect of the original —death result of accident. injury, rather than as an independent or additional cause. Ward v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 82 Neb. 499, 118 N. W. 70; Maloney v. Maryland Casualty Co. 113 Ark. 174, 167 S. W. 845; Caldwell v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. supra; 1 C. J. 430, § 76.

Error is predicated upon the giving of an instruction telling the jury that, "in determining the question as to whether or not the death of said George H. Hornby would have resulted from external, violent, and accidental means exclusively and independently of all other causes, you are entitled to consider all the facts and circumstances which have been introduced in evidence before you, and you are entitled to draw reasonable inferences and conclusions from such facts and circumstances."

The case of Grosvenor v. Fidelity & C. Co. 102 Neb. 629, 168 N. W. 596, is relied upon. That was an action upon an insurance policy covering death by accidental means. Insured died from drinking carbolic acid. The lower court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, relying upon the presumption that death was by accidental means. This court, however, said, in reversing the case, that, since it appeared that insured drank carbolic acid, it was presumed that he did so voluntarily, and that the evidence of suicidal intent so introduced into the case destroyed the force of the presumption of death by accidental means, and held that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that the death was accidental, "by evidence of the actual facts or a situation from which accident is the reasonable inference." In other words, the record must present to the jury such a state of facts that reasonable inferences, showing accident, can be drawn therefrom, and the case cannot be left to the jury for a guess or conjecture in arriving at a conclusion.

In a similar case, Rawitzer v. Mutual Ben. Health. & Acci. Asso. 101 Neb. 219, 162 N. W. 687, where death was also the result of carbolic acid poisoning, the court held that the surrounding circumstances were shown to be such as to allow of reasonable inferences as to the cause of death, and that the case was one which should have been submitted to the jury.

As before pointed out, we are of opinion that the condition of the evidence in this case presents a situation where a natural and reasonable inference could be drawn that the injury was accidental, and the matter of passing upon those inferences was for the jury. Since there was sufficient to take the case to the jury, we believe there was no error in the instruction given. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Roderf, 203 Ill. 413, 67 N. E. 812, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 281; Vandalia Coal Co. v. Moore, 69 Ind. App. 311, 121 N. E. 685; Wilcox v. Southern R. Co. 91 S. C. 71, 74 S. E. 122; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Ellison, 199 Ala. 571, 75 So. 159; 38 Cyc. 1673.

It is argued that there is prejudicial error in the admission of testimony. Dr. Jonas, who examined the insured after the poisoning had progressed up the arm, was allowed to testify in behalf of the plaintiff that the poisoning was from external means. We see nothing improper in the admission of that testimony, since the doctor testified that poisoning of that kind in that locality always came from without, through an opening in the skin. On cross-examination he was asked, if septicemia had been in the body prior to the injury, whether or not it might not extend to the surface and manifest itself there, to which the doctor answered that he had only one opinion about this case,—that the poisoning came from without, from "an accident." No motion was made to strike out this answer, but it is now contended that the doctor was thus allowed to express his opinion that the injury was the result of accidental means, and therefore that the testimony was improperly received. Such an opinion as to a Evidence—opinion—basis. conclusion of fact could, of course, not be received as evidence. Dreher v. Order of United Commercial Travelers, 173 Wis. 173, 180 N. W. 815. We take it that the doctor meant "injury" instead of "accident," and was not attempting to give evidence as to how the injury had been caused, and we cannot see that the answer would mislead the jury.

The further objection is made that the petition did not state a cause of action, since the name of the beneficiary under the policy was not disclosed. The action was brought by the administrator, and upon a policy, the provisions of which were fully known to the defendant. The trial court allowed an amendment of the pleadings during the trial, and the name of the beneficiary was inserted. We do not see that the defendant could have been taken by surprise by this amendment, or prejudiced in any way.

The case is therefore affirmed.

Letton, J., dissenting:

It seems to me the majority opinion rests upon an inference based upon an inference. First, the inference that a sand bur, or other substance, penetrated the thumb. Second, the inference that a malignant germ entered the body through a perforation of the skin thus created. In my opinion the evidence does not justify the recovery.

Petition for rehearing denied October 11, 1921.

ANNOTATION.

Accident insurance: infection through a wound previously received.

As indicated by the title, cases where the wound and infection were practically simultaneous are not within the scope of this annotation.

Generally, as to provision in accident policy exempting from, or limiting liability, where death or injury results from poison, see annotation in 2 A.L.R. 61.

In actions on policies insuring against injury or death resulting solely, exclusively, or independently from accidental means, it is held that when infection enters through a wound, produced by an accidental injury, naturally and before the wound had become so healed or cured as to prevent exposure to infection, it is immaterial whether the infection enters at the exact time of the injury or subsequently, the wound under such circumstances being considered the proximate cause of the injury. Rich v. Hartford Acci. & Indemnity Co. (1917) 208 Ill. App. 506; Delaney v. Modern Acci. Club (1903) 121 Iowa, 528, 63 L.R.A. 603, 97 N. W. 91; HORNBY v. STATE L. INS. CO. (reported herewith) ante, 106; Cary v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. (1906) 127 Wis. 67, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 926, 115 Am. St. Rep. 997, 106 N. W. 1055, 7 Ann. Cas. 484.

In Delaney v. Modern Acci. Club (1903) 121 Iowa, 528, 63 L.R.A. 603, 97 N. W. 91, it was held that death caused by blood poisoning received through a slight wound on the hand resulted solely from an accidental injury within the meaning of an accident policy, whether the poison was introduced into the wound by the instrument which inflicted it, or from some other source. The court said: "Their contention is that the bacilli causing the diseased condition of the hand, and the subsequent death, may have been, and probably were, introduced into the blood of the hand through the cut, but after it was received; and they depend on evidence of the physicians to the effect that the bacilli causing the result known as 'blood poisoning' may easily be introduced and are often introduced into the blood through such a wound from a great variety of possible sources, such as washing the wound with contaminated water, or the bandaging of it with contaminated bandages, or in other like methods. It seems to us, however, that it is wholly immaterial when or how the specific bacilli which caused the disease known as 'blood poisoning,' which resulted in the death of Delaney, were introduced into the wound, whether at the time it was inflicted or subsequently. Blood poisoning is a disease, just as many other pathological conditions of the human system, resulting from the introduction therein of other specific bacilli, are diseases. It occurs to us that it is, indeed, wholly immaterial whether the pathological condition which results in death is due to bacilli or not. The simple question is whether the death of Delaney resulted, through natural causes, without the interposition of a new and independent cause, from the cut on his finger. Disease brought about as the result of a wound, even though not the necessary or probable result, yet if it is the natural result of the wound, and not of an independent cause, is properly attributed to the wound; and death resulting from the disease is a death resulting from the wound, even though the wound was not, in its nature, mortal or even dangerous.

Even though the wound results in disease and death, through the negligence of the injured person in failing to take ordinary and reasonable precautions to avoid the possible consequences, the death is the result of the wound."

And in French v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1908) 135 Wis. 259, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1011, 115 N. W. 869, where infection apparently entered subsequent to the time an accidental abrasion was sustained, it was held that the wound produced by the accident was the sole and proximate cause of death; that, had it not been for the accidental injury, there would have been no cause for infection; that, but for the abrasion, the disease germs could not have entered; and that the insured's death was the result of bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means, independently of all other causes.

And in Ballagh v. Interstate Business Men's Acci. Asso. (1915) 176 Iowa, 110, L.R.A.1917A, 1050, 155 N. W. 241, where the insured accidentally sustained an abrasion of the skin of his leg and blood poisoning occurred shortly afterwards, it was held that the infection of the wound with streptococci, causing the blood poisoning, did not prevent the wound from being the direct cause of death without intervening cause within the meaning of an accident insurance policy, the court relying on Delaney v. Modern Acci. Club (Iowa) supra, and quoting from that part of the opinion wherein it was stated that it was wholly immaterial when or how the specific bacilli which caused the blood poisoning were introduced into the wound, whether at the time it was inflicted or subsequently; and it was also held that full liability on the accident policy in suit could not be avoided by the fact that the policy provided that there shall be no liability for death resulting from infection, except that whenever as a direct result of an injury the skin has been abraded, and there shall be introduced into the system through said abrasion, and by the very instrument causing the abrasion, any specific bacteria which shall produce blood poisoning, the insurer's liability shall be only a small percentage of the face of the policy. The court said: "We have already expressed our agreement with the precedents which hold that in such cases the original injury is the sole proximate cause, and that the death in such case is not a 'death resulting from infection.'"

And in Cary v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. (1916) 127 Wis. 67, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 926, 115 Am. St. Rep. 997, 106 N. W. 1055, 7 Ann. Cas. 484, the jury were held warranted in finding that the insured's death resulted "proximately and solely from bodily injury caused solely by external, violent, and accidental means" within the meaning of an accident policy, where there was evidence, in effect, that the insured fell and sustained an abrasion of the skin on his leg, and that the wound appeared red and inflamed the second day after the injury, and that several days thereafter he was found to be suffering from blood poisoning. The court said: "This finding is assailed upon the ground that it is impeached by the undisputed facts established by the evidence and the findings in the special verdict. These findings are, in effect, that bacteria, causing septicemia, or blood poisoning, entered Mr. Cary's system through the abrasion of the skin caused by Mr. Cary's accidental fall, and that his death was immediately caused by the septicemia produced from the infection by such bacteria. This contention involves the inquiry as to what is meant, under the law of insurance, by 'the proximate cause' as applied and used by the parties to the contract. The term 'proximate cause' as here employed must be understood to have been used by the parties to the contract in its common and accepted meaning, as adopted and approved in the law under like conditions and circumstances. While attempts to define it are numerous, and the phraseology employed in these attempts differs in the use of terms, they all aim to express a certain and definite meaning, which has been observed and applied on many occasions in the decisions of this court. The proximate relation of cause and effect, establishing legal responsibility, implies that the result produced had its inception in some responsible agency. The difficulty lies in ascertaining the agency to which the result is legally attributable. As stated by this court, the proximate cause 'is not necessarily the immediate, near, or nearest cause, but the one that acts first, whether immediate to the injury, or such injury be reached by setting other causes in motion, each in order being started naturally by the one that precedes it, and altogether constituting a complete chain or succession of events, so united to each other by a close causal connection as to form a natural whole, reaching from the first or producing cause to the final result.' Deisenrieter v. Kraus-Merkel Malting Co. (1897) 97 Wis. 288, 72 N. W. 735. To determine it we must ascertain the cause which, from its inception, acts in a continuous sequence, and produces the injury as a natural and probable result. It cannot be ascertained by any specific and direct test, but must be determined as any ultimate fact is inferred from evidentiary facts. If different agencies share in producing a result, it then becomes necessary to determine which is the responsible and efficient cause from which the injury proceeds, by tracing it to the active agency from whose inception the injury naturally follows, either directly or through other causes set in action by it. . . . The facts upon which the jury based their finding of the special verdict that Mr. Cary's death resulted proximately and solely from bodily injury, caused solely by external, violent, and accidental means, are, in effect, that he accidentally fell and sustained an abrasion of the skin on his right leg, which wound appeared somewhat red and inflamed on the second day; that on the eighth day a physician first saw the wound and then found Mr. Cary to be suffering from blood poisoning; and that two days thereafter he died. The evidence also shows that the abrasion of the skin furnished the portal of entrance through which bacterial infection entered Mr. Cary's system and caused the septicemia which was the immediate cause of his death. It is urged that, unless the evidence establishes the fact that the bacterial infection occurred at the time of the bodily injury by the fall, it cannot be found that his death was proximately and solely caused by the accident. As above stated, responsible causation, as applied in the law, is not dependent on time, distance, or a mere succession of events. If an injury is inflicted by an event, and it is found that it has set in motion all the succeeding agencies sharing in the result, then such event, as the efficient producing cause of the injury, is held to be the proximate cause of the injury. Under such circumstances, the causal connection in the chain of events is shown by the dependence of each event for its action on the one preceding it, which thus forms a continuous whole, with a proximate relationship established between the event which acted first through those naturally succeeding and the point of injury. Apply this test to the facts before us, and it is shown that no such bacterial infection would, in all probability, have occurred had there been no abrasion of the skin. This leads to the inevitable inference that the bacterial infection and the resultant septicemia were, in the natural course of events, dependent upon and set in motion by the abrasion of the skin caused by the fall. The entry of bacteria into the system cannot be considered as an independent cause and as having intervened between the accidental fall and the death, because of the fact that it was conditioned on the existence of the abrasion of the skin, and was wholly incidental to, and set in motion by, it, thus making it one of the events in the chain of causation. We are satisfied that the jury were well warranted in their conclusion that Mr. Cary's death resulted proximately and solely from his accidental falling on the floor."

And in the Cary Case it was held that a provision in the accident policy, exempting the insurer from liability for death resulting from poison or infection, did not apply; since the infection, under the facts of that case, was not the proximate cause of the death, although it might not have entered the abrasion at the time the abrasion was sustained.

In Rich v. Hartford Acci. & Indemnity Co. (1917) 208 Ill. App. 506, where the court, at the instance of both parties, instructed the jury that the insurer was liable only if the insured inoculated himself with the noxious germs causing his death at the same time he sustained an accidental cut, and that if the germs entered through the cut at a later time there was no liability, it was held that there was evidence sufficient to support the jury's finding that the germs entered at the same time the wound was sustained, and that a directed verdict for the defendant was properly refused. The court in this case stated that, if the question was treated as a matter of law, it was immaterial when the germs entered the wound, if it actually entered and blood poisoning resulted.

In National Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Singleton (1915) 193 Ala. 84, 69 So. 80, where there was testimony that the insured cut his lip while shaving, and that it became infected, and that death resulted, the evidence was held sufficient to carry to the jury the question whether death resulted from or was caused by the cut, the court holding that, if death did result from the cutting of his lip while shaving, the loss was within the protection of the policy, which provided against bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means. It does not clearly appear in this case whether the infection entered at the time of the cut or thereafter, and there is no intimation that this would vary the conclusion.

In Bell v. State L. Ins. Co. (1921) 151 Ga. 57, 105 S. E. 846, reversing (1919) 24 Ga. App. 497, 101 S. E. 541, where double indemnity was sought on a life policy, providing therefor in case it was shown that death resulted from bodily injury sustained and effected directly through external, violent, and accidental means, a petition alleging that the insured was a physician, and while attending a patient suffering from erysipelas, in adjusting his glasses, he accidentally caused a scratch or abrasion of the skin, which became infected with the germs of erysipelas, was held to justify the construction that the abrasion occurred at some time between the first and last visits to the patient, and not necessarily in his presence, and that so construed the allegation would be sustained by evidence showing that the abrasion occurred in the physician's office, which was located in a city adjoining the place where the patient lived.

And in the Bell Case, where there was evidence authorizing a finding that the infection from which the insured, a physician, died, originated in an abrasion on his ear, which was caused by a scratch in adjusting his glasses while attending a patient suffering from erysipelas, it was held a question for the jury whether the infection occurred as a consequence of the insured's voluntary act in subjecting the abrasion to such a serious and dangerous exposure as a visit to a patient suffering from erysipelas.

2 The owners of neighboring property are not estopped by permitting one to expend money in fitting up a tuberculosis hospital, to apply for an injunction against his conducting the institution as such, if they were assured by him that the institution was not intended for such use.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County in Chancery (Barton, J.) in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from conducting a sanatorium for the treatment of tuberculosis in a residential district of a city. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Weston & Fox and Harry C. Howard for appellant.

Mr. Marvin J. Schaberg, for appellees:

Plaintiffs are entitled to the relief prayed for.

Fellows, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant, a physician, is conducting a tuberculosis sanatorium in what is called the "Inkster home-stand" in the city of Kalamazoo. The property is part of an addition known as "Inkster park addition." Plaintiffs, thirteen in number, are residents of the vicinity, and were such prior to the establishment of the sanatorium, the home of one being within 70 feet of the sanatorium, of two others less than 150 feet, and of the others being of varying distances. The oral testimony and the photographs introduced in evidence establish beyond doubt that the locality is a strictly residential district, although doubtless not as thickly settled as some of the other parts of Kalamazoo. The relief sought and granted by the trial court was injunctive, restraining defendant from conducting a sanatorium for the treatment of tuberculosis in this residential district.

Unless these plaintiffs have lost their rights by laches, we are persuaded that they are entitled to the relief prayed under the former holdings of this court. Barth v. Christian Psychopathic Hospital Asso. 196 Mich. 642, 163 N. W. 62; Saier v. Joy, 198 Mich. 295, L.R.A. 1918A, 825, 164 N. W. 507; Birchard v. Board of Health, 204 Mich. 284, 4 A.L.R. 990, 169 N. W. 901. In the Barth Case an injunction was decreed restraining the erection and maintenance of a psychopathic hospital in a strictly residential district. In the Saier Case a like decree was entered against the maintenance of an undertaking establishment, and in the Birchard Case a similar decree was entered against the maintenance of a detention hospital for infectious diseases. In the first of these cases the trial judge dismissed the bill without taking the testimony; but in the others the testimony was quite persuasive, as it is in the instant case, that the institution, if properly conducted, would cause no actual danger to near-by residents, that there was little or no danger of communicating disease such a distance as intervened between the plaintiffs' residences and the defendant's institution, but, as in those cases, the fear of the disease being communicated is present. In each of these cases we recognized the claim that the institutions were not nuisances per se, but in each of these cases we held that they might become nuisances as to private individuals by their location in strictly residential districts, and in the Birchard Case, referring to the earlier cases, we said: "We held in these cases that, while the institutions involved were not nuisances per se, they became such by reason of their location in a residential district. We recognized that there might be no actual danger if properly conducted, but that their maintenance in close proximity to the home would create such dread and fear in the mind of the normal person as would destroy the comfort, the well-being, and the property rights of the plaintiffs,—depressing the mind and lowering the vitality of the normal person, rendering one more susceptible to disease, and reducing the value of the property so situated; and in each of the cases this court decreed injunctive relief."

There is testimony in the record that property in this locality has increased in value, and one of defendant's witnesses, who is interested in the sale of lots in this addition, expresses the view that the establishment of the sanatorium has materially increased the value of surrounding property, but the undisputed testimony establishes that housing conditions in the city were abnormal at the time the case was heard, and that improved real estate commanded exceedingly high prices. The weight of the testimony clearly establishes that property values in this locality are at least 25 per cent lower with the sanatorium there than they would be without it. The maintenance of the sanatorium would cause the plaintiffs a distinct, definite financial loss.

The record discloses that in this state tuberculosis stands at the head of diseases in the toll it annually collects. The record likewise discloses the herculean efforts of the medical profession and the anti-tuberculosis societies to alleviate this condition. Circulars have been sent out, advice has been given, preventive measures have been advocated and adopted, and much has been accomplished. The public has been advised of its ravages and has a well-grounded fear of its effect. It is a communicable disease as matter of fact, and is so declared to be by § 5099, Comp. Laws 1915. The maintenance of a hospital for the treatment of this communicable disease in a strictly residential district cannot fail to deprive residents of near-by homes of the comfort, well-being, and enjoyment of their homes to which they are entitled, and this, coupled with their financial loss, justifies an appeal to a court of equity for relief. Upon principle the instant case is controlled by our former decisions above cited, and we need not consider the sustaining authorities from other states, some of which are cited in the opinion in the Birchard Case.

against maintenance of

In the brief of defendant's counsel and upon the oral argument much stress was laid upon the fact that this proceeding was not launched until something like a year after the defendant had commenced the operation of the hospital, and the doctrine of laches is invoked to defeat the relief. Defendant claims to have invested considerable money in remodeling, repairing, and fitting the house for use for a tuberculosis hospital, and claims to have obligated himself for the payment of a very considerable additional sum, and he insists that all this was done with the full knowledge of the plaintiffs and their attorney that the premises were to be used for a tuberculosis hospital, and that it is therefore unconscionable and inequitable to now prevent such use of the property by injunction. This claim is met by the plaintiffs with testimony tending to show that not only were they without knowledge that the premises were to be used and were being used for a tuberculosis hospital, but that defendant specifically assured some of them and their attorney that he would not use the premises as a tuberculosis hospital, and that it was but a few days before this bill was filed that they had any definite proof that it was so used. Upon this disputed question of fact the trial judge made the following finding: "The court finds as a fact that the doctor, when he made the investment,—bought this property,—had notice of the fact that it was in a residential district, that he made the investment with his eyes open to the fact, and that the institution he was about to establish was established as a tubercular hospital for the treatment of tubercular patients would be a detriment to the community. He gave the residents to understand that it was not what might technically be called a tubercular institution; and that impression remained until he made the formal statement February 24, 1920, at which time it became apparent that he could no longer dodge the issue that such was the purpose of the institution."

A reading of the somewhat conflicting testimony in this record is convincing that the trial judge, who heard and saw the witnesses, correctly disposed of this question of fact. We are satisfied that at the very inception of defendant's project he was informed by plaintiff's attorney that, if he intended to maintain a tuberculosis hospital, plaintiffs would apply for an injunction; and that he assured the attorney he would not conduct a tuberculosis hospital; one plaintiff he assured he would treat only cases of slight chest ailments; to another he said he should not conduct a tuberculosis sanatorium; and in a carefully worded announcement in the press he gave the public and plaintiffs to understand that the institution would not be a tuberculosis hospital as such an institution is generally understood to be. On February 24, 1920, he made application to the city commission for a sewer on the street, and therein stated that he was conducting a tuberculosis sanatorium. This was the first definite, positive proof plaintiffs had of the character of the institution. Shortly thereafter this bill was filed. Under these circumstances defendant cannot invoke the doctrine of an equitable estoppel.

v.

CITY OF FALL RIVER.

Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court—May 31, 1921.

(— Mass. —, 131 N. E. 346.)

Injunction — against tuberculosis hospital.

1. Injunction will not lie against the construction by a municipal corporation under legislative command of a tuberculosis hospital in the vicinity of residences because it will affect the comfortable enjoyment of the neighboring property and may depreciate its market value, where it is found that there is no valid reason to fear contagion if the hospital is well conducted.

Appeal — admission of evidence — nonprejudicial error.

2. There is no reversible error in admitting, in a suit to enjoin the erection of a tuberculosis hospital, a report of experts merely recommending the site chosen for the hospital, or the written approval of the site by the state board of health.

Witness — competency — discretion of master.

3. The determination of the competency of an expert witness rests largely in the discretion of the master before whom the testimony is offered.

[See 11 R. C. L. 574.]

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Superior Court for Bristol County (Thayer, J.) confirming the report of a master, and dismissing a bill filed to enjoin the erection of a tuberculosis hospital as a nuisance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John W. Cummings, Charles R. Cummings, and John B. Cummings, for appellants:

The facts found by the master entitle the plaintiffs to a decree.

Everett v. Paschall, 61 Wash. 47, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 827, 111 Pac. 879, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1128; Cherry v. Williams, 147 N. C. 452, 125 Am. St. Rep. 566, 61 S. E. 267, 15 Ann. Cas. 715; Grover v. Zook, 44 Wash. 494, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 582, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 87 Pac. 638, 12 Ann. Cas. 192.

Injury to comfortable enjoyment or beneficial use of property, and not depreciation in value, is the real test.

Stotler v. Rochelle, 83 Kan. 86, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49, 109 Pac. 788; Baltimore v. Fairfield Improv. Co. 87 Md. 352, 40 L.R.A. 494, 67 Am. St. Rep. 344, 39 Atl. 1081; Walker v. Brewster, L. Even if the board had power to approve the site, its approval is not conclusive against the plaintiffs.

The danger to the health of the plaintiffs and their families is also an adequate reason for enjoining the erection of the hospital building.

Board of Health v. Tupper, 210 Mass. 378, 96 N. E. 1096.

Mr. David R. Radovsky, for respondent:

In fixing on the location of the hospital, the trustees were exercising the discretion which the legislature required them to exercise as public officers. Their decision on the question, being quasi judicial or quasi legislative, was final, and could not be reviewed by the court.

The determination of witness Borden's qualification as an expert was discretionary with the master.

22 C. J. 526, § 610; Jordan v. Adams Gaslight Co. 281 Mass. 186, 120 N. E. 654.

De Courcy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity to enjoin the erection of a tuberculosis hospital on the ground that it will constitute a nuisance. The case was sent to a master, and he found the following salient facts: By virtue of Stat. 1912, chap. 151, it became the duty of the city of Fall River to establish and maintain within its limits a hospital for persons having tuberculosis; and it was subject to a penalty of not more than $500 for each refusal or neglect to do so when requested by the state board of health. The city had been using the Bay street hospital for tuberculosis patients since 1910. The state board of health, and its successor, the state department of health, disapproved of this building as a permanent structure on account of its inadequacy as to size, location, and facilities; from time to time requested the city to erect and maintain a suitable hospital for the care and treatment of tuberculosis patients; and on March 25, 1915, threatened to take action through the attorney general if the city should fail to do so by the 1st of September. The location of the required hospital excited a great deal of public attention, and engaged the active interests of representatives of various organizations of the city, in addition to the board of health, and the board of trustees of hospitals for the city of Fall River, established under Stat. 1913, chap. 259. The board of hospital trustees called in three eminent experts to advise them as to the proper site; and after viewing various locations, these unanimously reported that the Highland site (the one in question) was the best. This location was approved also by the local board of health and the state department of health.

The locus is portion of a 40-acre tract owned by the city, and known as the Poor Farm land. Here are maintained the City General Hospital, built in 1895, and a temporary hospital for contagious diseases. Tuberculosis patients were treated there in shacks and tents until 1910. In February, 1920, the city turned over to the board of hospital trustees approximately 15 acres of this tract. The trustees are having plans prepared for the erection of a tuberculosis hospital for the accommodation of from 150 to 200 patients, at an estimated cost of $400,000 to $450,000.

The plaintiffs reside in the Highland district, but the land of only two of them is immediately adjacent to the hospital location. They are strongly opposed to having in the vicinity of their homes a hospital which will bring together for treatment many patients who are suffering from this infectious disease, because it will affect comfortable enjoyment of their property, and may depreciate its market value. The master finds, however, that there is very little danger of infection, provided the hospital is well managed, and that there will be no substantial depreciation of land values after the hospital has been in existence for a time. Practically the same conditions prevail as to all the sites considered, and the local health authorities consider this site more suitable from a public health point of view than any other that is available. The controlling fact is that the master is "unable to find that the erection and maintenance of a well equipped and controlled tuberculosis municipal hospital will inevitably create a nuisance." He finds: "Experience has demonstrated that there is no real danger from a well-conducted hospital or sanatorium and there is no valid reason for fear in regard to it. Whatever danger of infection there may be will be no greater to the neighborhood in the Highland section than there would be wherever said hospital would be located, and, if there is any danger to be expected from patients traversing the streets in traveling to and from the hospital, that danger would be the same wherever the hospital would be located."

On these facts the judge could not enjoin the defendant without virtually nullifying the statute which requires the city to maintain a tuberculosis hospital within its limits, as the objections raised by these petitioners apply with at least equal force to every other available site. Hospitals for contagious diseases must be established and maintained for the protection of the general public; and it is not to be assumed in advance that such a hospital, well equipped and managed under the supervision of public health boards, will be a nuisance. Manning v. Bruce, 186 Mass. 282, 71 N. E. 537. In Anonymous, 3 Atk. 750, 751, 26 Eng. Reprint, 1230, on a motion for an injunction to stay the building of a house to inoculate for the small-pox, it was said by Lord Hardwicke: "The fears of mankind, though they may be reasonable ones, will not create a nuisance."

Without going so far as to say that purely mental discomfort cannot constitute a nuisance, certainly the law will not enjoin the erection of a municipal hospital on facts such as are disclosed by this record, in order to protect the plaintiffs from dangers which are found to be unreal.

Frost v. King Edward VII. Welsh Nat. Memorial Asso. [1918] 2 Ch. 180; Board of Health v. North American Home, 77 N. J. Eq. 464, 78 Atl. 677. Depreciation of the market value of the petitioners' land, assuming it to be proved, would not be decisive in their favor. Barry v. Smith, 191 Mass. 78, 89, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1028, 77 N. E. 1099, 6 Ann. Cas. 817. In Everett v. Paschall, 61 Wash. 47, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 827, 111 Pac. 879, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1128, relied on by the petitioners, the defendant maintained in his cottage, adjoining the lots of the plaintiffs, a private sanatorium for the treatment of tuberculosis patients; and the injunction was granted, partly at least, under the influence of a statute of that state which broadened the definition of "nuisance." There is nothing in that case, nor in Cherry v. Williams, 147 N. C. 452, 125 Am. St. Rep. 566, 61 S. E. 267, 15 Ann. Cas. 715, to support a claim that a public hospital for the treatment of tuberculosis is a nuisance per se. In view of the findings of the master we should have to go substantially to this extreme in order to say that the trial judge was not warranted in dismissing the bill for an injunction.

There were certain exceptions to the master's report relating to the admission of evidence. We find no reversible error in the admission of the report made by Dr. Woodward and two other experts to the trustees of hospitals, which merely recommended the Highland site as the most desirable one among those specified. The same is true of the written approval of this site by the state board of health, which was required by statute, and the records of their meeting at which the approval was voted. Stat. 1912, chap. 151. The master, in his discretion, admitted this evidence for a limited purpose; that of showing why this site was selected, and probably to meet any insinuation of lack of good faith or sound discretion on the part of the trustees. The other exceptions relate to the qualification of Mr. Borden as an expert, and the admissibility of his testimony. The determination of his competency rested largely in the discretion of the master. It seems to have been exercised properly. Jordan v. Adams Gaslight Co. 231 Mass. 186, 120 N. E. 654. We find no substantial error in the particular questions objected to, in view of his testimony as a whole.

ANNOTATION.

Pesthouse or contagious disease hospital as nuisance.

This annotation is supplementary to that in 4 A.L.R., beginning at page 995, discussing the decisions rendered since the preparation of that note.

In COOK v. FALL RIVER (reported herewith) ante, 119, it is held that the erection by a city of a tuberculosis hospital will not be enjoined at the instance of the owners of property immediately adjacent to the proposed location of the hospital. The decision is rested on the ground that there is no presumption that the hospital will constitute a nuisance.

In Le Bourgeois v. New Orleans (1919) 145 La. 274, 82 So. 268, the court likewise refused to enjoin the erection of a municipal tuberculosis hospital, but rested its holding chiefly on the location of the property of the complaining taxpayers, saying: "Two of them have moved away from the neighborhood, and may, therefore, be considered to be out of the case in so far as suing in their individual capacity. Another of them lives 600 feet from the square in question. He also may be considered to be practically out of the case, so far as the question of nuisance is concerned; for to hold that a tuberculosis hospital cannot be located within 600 feet of any residence would be practically to hold that it cannot be located at all in a city or town, and, we imagine, no one would so contend. The fourth plaintiff's residence does not face the square in question, but is on the near corner of one of the adjoining squares. If it were proved with certainty that this hospital would endanger the health of this plaintiff or his family, perhaps a case might be presented for judicial interference. But the very opposite is conclusively shown by the evidence, which is all one way, to the effect that a well-kept tuberculosis hospital is not a menace to the health of the people living in its vicinity; and the presumption is that this hospital will be well kept. The square in question, or proposed hospital site, is 346 by 326 feet, and is vacant. And so are two of the squares adjoining it, the one in back, and the one to the right, if we assume it to face Carrollton avenue, and so is the territory further on in that direction, a distance of several squares except for some saw-mills. Carrollton avenue is a wide street, with two roadways and a neutral ground. On the square on the other side of it, opposite the hospital site, the constructions on that side facing the avenue are two cottages, one gasolene station, and a vulcanizing plant. The square to the left, on the other side of Ulloa street, has, on the side facing Ulloa street, only two structures, one of which, we understand, is a sort of factory, and the other a residence. This residence faces Carrollton, but is near the corner of Ulloa. One of the cornering squares on the other side of Carrollton avenue is occupied by a baseball park; one of the cornering squares on the other side of Ulloa street is vacant. If on such a spot as this a hospital could not be located, where else could one be located, except entirely outside of city limits? And to locate it out of city limits would rob it of the greater part of its usefulness. Our conclusion is that the suit is groundless in so far as it is sought to be founded on the apprehended injurious character of the proposed hospital."

But in BRINK v. SHEPARD (reported herewith) ante, 116, the court, upon the authority of Birchard v. Board of Health (1918) 204 Mich. 284, 4 A.L.R. 990, 169 N. W. 901, to which the earlier annotation was appended, upheld an injunction, granted in a suit by residents in the vicinity, restraining the maintenance in a strictly residential district of a private sanatorium for the treatment of tuberculosis, the plea of laches being held, in the circumstances, not to have been well founded. FRED A. VAUGHAN, Secretary of State, Appt.,
NASHVILLE, CHATTANOOGA, & ST. LOUIS RAILWAY.

Corporation — domestication of foreign corporation.

1. A foreign railroad does not become a domestic corporation, so as to be subject to the payment of the tax upon capital stock required by statute to be paid as a condition to incorporation, when it complies with constitutional and statutory provisions declaring that it shall not own real estate or exercise the power of eminent domain within the state until it shall have become a body corporate in accordance with the local laws which require the filing of its charter and the acceptance of the Constitution.

— creation of separate corporations.

2. There cannot be a creation of a single corporation by two or more states or sovereignties.

[See 7 R. C. L. 89.]

— creation of separate corporations.

3. The creation by two or more states of corporations having the same name, same powers, the same management, and the same principal office creates a separate and distinct corporation in each state; not a single corporation in all the states.

— how intent ascertained.

4. Whether a state providing for domesticating a foreign corporation intends to create a new corporation, or only confer certain powers on the foreign one, is to be gathered from the language employed in the constitutional or statutory provisions prescribing the method.

— what must appear to indicate intent.

5. Before an intention will be inferred on the part of the legislature to create anew a foreign corporation for the domestication of which it provides, such intention must appear from the language employed, as well as the intent to confer upon it all the powers usually exercised by similar domestic corporations, and to reserve to the state power to exercise the authority over it that is usually exercised over its originally created and wholly domestic ones.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Franklin County granting a writ of mandamus requiring him to accept and file plaintiff's articles of incorporation, without requiring payment of an organization tax. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles I. Dawson, Attorney General, for appellant:

When a foreign railroad corporation organizes under § 763 of Kentucky Statutes, it loses its identity as a foreign corporation, so far as Kentucky is concerned, and becomes solely a Kentucky corporation and must pay its organization tax as any other Kentucky corporation is required to do, and this requirement and exaction on the part of the state may not be defeated by a plea that it interferes with interstate commerce.

A foreign corporation which merely becomes "domesticated" or "naturalized" in Kentucky is not required to pay an organization tax under Kentucky Statutes, § 4225.

Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Com. 119 Ky. 196, 83 S. W. 562.

Compliance by a foreign railroad company with § 765 of Kentucky Statutes is but a "domestication" or "naturalization" of the foreign railroad company, and not the creation of an original corporation.

Plummer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 143 Ky. 102, 83 L.R.A.(N.S.) 362, 136 S. W. 162.

A construction of a statute which would make it unconstitutional, or even raise a serious doubt as to its constitutionality, will be avoided if possible.

United States ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & H. R. Co. 213 U. S. 366, 53 L. ed. 835, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527; Union P. R. Co. v. Laramie Stock Yards Co. 231 U. S. 190, 58 L. ed. 179, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 101.

If the statutes involved, when properly construed, require a foreign railroad corporation, engaged in interstate commerce, to pay to the state of Kentucky a tax upon its entire capital stock as a condition to purchasing property there, necessary for the carrying on of its interstate business, then they are contrary both to the commerce clause and to the due process clause of the Federal Constitution.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question involved on this appeal is whether or not a foreign railroad corporation, which was incorporated in the state creating it long before the adoption of our present Constitution, and which from about that time owned and operated a portion of one of its railroad lines located in this state, and has also long since complied with §§ 570 and 841 of our Statutes, entitling it to "possess, control, maintain, or operate" a railroad in this state, must pay the organization tax of $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per centum of its capital stock, as provided in § 4225 of the Statutes, upon becoming naturalized, domesticated, or incorporated in the manner provided by § 765 of the Statutes.

The question arises in this way: The appellee and plaintiff below, Nashville, Chattanooga, & St. Louis Railway, is a corporation created under the laws of the state of Tennessee about December 11, 1848. It soon thereafter constructed, or became the owner of, a line of railroad running from Nashville, Tennessee, to Hickman, Fulton county, Kentucky, with something like 10 miles of railway trackage in this state. It has since acquired other lines running into different states, and has been engaged since that time as an interstate carrier of passengers and freight. About 1896 it leased a line of railroad running from Paducah, Kentucky, via Jackson, Tennessee, to Memphis, Tennessee, and has since then operated that line as lessee thereof. In the meantime it accepted the provisions of the Constitution of this state as provided by § 570 of the Statutes, and it also complied with the provisions of § 841 of same by filing in the office of the secretary of state, at Frankfort, and in the office of the railroad commission of this state, a duly certified copy of its charter and articles of incorporation, as required by that section, and thereby, as provided therein, became "a corporation, citizen, and resident of this state," and it received from the secretary of state a certificate of such incorporation. A short while before the filing of this action by it against the appellant and defendant below, Fred A. Vaughan, secretary of state for the commonwealth, it concluded to become domesticated or incorporated in this state pursuant to the provisions of § 765 of the Statutes, so as to enable it to own in fee-simple title land in the state of Kentucky necessary for its purposes as a common carrier, and to enable it to exercise the right of eminent domain so as to acquire land for that purpose, and it prepared the necessary papers and documents in the manner specified in that section, and in § 763, which is referred to therein, and offered to file them with the defendant as secretary of state, and he declined to accept them or to file them in his office, unless plaintiff would first pay the organization tax required by § 4225, supra, which, since the capital stock of plaintiff was $16,000,000, amounted to $16,000. Plaintiff declined to pay that tax, and filed this action against defendant in the Franklin circuit court, praying that a writ of mandamus issue against him, commanding him to file the executed writings presented to him, and to give it an attested copy thereof to be filed in the office of the railroad commission, and to do so without exacting or demanding of it any part of the $16,000 organization tax. The petition alleged in due form all the facts hereinbefore recited, and filed copies of its Tennessee charter with the papers presented to the secretary of state. A demurrer filed to the petition was overruled, and, defendant declining to answer, the court issued the mandatory writ prayed for, and to reverse that judgment he has appealed.

Before attempting a discussion of the merits of the question involved, it may be stated that the regularity of the steps taken by plaintiff to become incorporated in the manner provided by § 765 is not attacked, since it is conceded by counsel for defendant that the provisions of that section, as well as the one referred to therein (763), were strictly followed.

Section 211 of the Constitution says: "No railroad corporation organized under the laws of any other state, or of the United States, and doing business, or proposing to do business in this state, shall be entitled to the benefit of the right of eminent domain or have power to acquire the right of way or real estate for depot or other uses, until it shall have become a body corporate pursuant to and in accordance with the laws of this commonwealth."

Section 765 of the Statutes provides that: "No railroad corporation, organized or created by or under the laws of any other state, shall have the right to condemn land for, or acquire the right of way for, or purchase or hold land for its depots, tracks, or other purposes, until it shall have first filed in the office of the secretary of state of this state, in the manner provided in the first article of this chapter, its acceptance of the Constitution of this state, and shall have become organized as a corporation under the laws of this state, which it may do by filing in the offices of the secretary of state and the railroad commission articles of incorporation in the manner and form provided in § 763 of this article."

And § 763, referred to therein, provides the method by which a newly created railroad corporation may be organized in this state by any number of persons, not less than seven, executing original articles of incorporation specifying and enumerating the things therein required, and proven by the affidavits of two of the named directors therein, and that such articles shall then be filed in the office of secretary of state and in the office of the railroad commission, and, when a certificate of the facts shall be issued by the officers before whom the articles are required to be filed, the persons executing them "shall be a body corporate by the name specified in the articles."

Section 841 of the statutes provides how a foreign corporation may become a domestic one for the purpose of possessing, controlling, maintaining, or operating a railway, or any part thereof, in this state, which it may do "by filing in the office of the secretary of state, and in the office of the railroad commission, a copy of the charter or articles of incorporation of such company, association or corporation, authenticated by its seal and by the attestation of its president and secretary, and thereupon, and by virtue thereof, such company, association, or corporation shall at once become and be a corporation, citizen and resident of this state. The secretary of state shall issue to such corpora-

Section 4225 of the Statutes, which is the one that provides for the collection of the organization tax demanded by the defendant, says: "Every corporation which may be incorporated by or under the laws of this state, having a capital stock divided into shares, shall pay into the state treasury one tenth of one per centum upon the amount of capital stock which such corporation is authorized to have, and a like tax upon any subsequent increase thereof. Such tax shall be due and payable on the incorporation of the company and on the increase of the capital stock thereof, and no such corporation shall have or exercise any corporate powers until the tax shall have been paid, and upon payment it shall file a statement thereof with the secretary of state."

Counsel for plaintiff, both in the petition and in brief filed on this appeal, take the position that: (a) It was the intention of the legislature in enacting the last-inserted section to demand and require the payment of the organization tax, therein provided for, only from corporations created in this state for the first time, and that it was not intended that such organization tax should be collected from a prior created foreign corporation, which still desired to maintain its foreign identity, when it sought to become domesticated in the manner pointed out in § 765, supra, in order that it may become vested with the powers set forth in § 211 of the Constitution; and that (b) if those sections are susceptible to the construction that it was the intention of the legislature to impose the organization tax upon foreign railroad companies seeking to become domesticated in the manner pointed out, then such an intention and purpose were beyond its power to enact, and that § 4225, in so far as it provides for such a purpose, if it does do so, is unconstitutional and void, as imposing an unlawful burden upon interstate commerce.

The attorney general, in behalf of the secretary of state, contests the correctness of both of these propositions. In support of the second one—(b)—counsel for plaintiff cites and relies on the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 1, 54 L. ed. 355, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190; but the question there involved, as we interpret that opinion, was the domestication of the foreign corporation in a manner similar to that provided by § 841, supra, of our Statutes, in order to permit it to transact business in the domesticating state. No question relating to the conferring of authority on the foreign corporation to own real property within the borders of that state, or conferring upon it power to exercise the right of eminent domain therein, was involved in that case. Whether a different rule would prevail if those questions had been involved we will not attempt to discuss or determine, since we have arrived at the conclusion that contention (a) of plaintiff's counsel is correct, which disposes of the necessity of determining the other one.

Strictly speaking, there is no such thing known to the law as the creation of a single corporation by two or more states or sovereignties. 14a C. J. 1227-1230.

But, while this is true, different states may, and sometimes creation in different

do, create under their own laws corporations having the same name, the same powers, the same management, and with their principal offices in one of the creating states, but, as stated in the text of the work just referred to: "The result of such legislation is in law to create a separate and distinct corporation in each state not a single corporation in all the states, 'but two [or more] corporations of the same name having a different pater- nity,' each of which is, for purposes of jurisdiction and in other cases in which residence or citizenship is material, a citizen and a resident or inhabitant of the state by or under the laws of which it was created."

Whether the method provided by the domesticating state, to which the applying corporation is a foreign —how intent ascertained. one, was intended to create a new corporation, or only to confer certain powers upon the foreign corporation, is a question of intention to be gathered from the language employed in the constitutional or statutory provisions prescribing the method. C. J. supra, 1332, and 8 Fletcher, Cyc. Corp. § 5709, pp. 9304-9309. From the same sources, and from other authorities which might be cited, we learn that before such an intention will be inferred it must appear from the language employed that the purpose was to create the corporation exercised by similar domestic corporations, and to reserve to the state the power to exercise such authority over the corporation as is usually exercised over its originally created and wholly domestic ones. "The mere grant of privileges or powers to an existing corporation, without more, does not do this, and does not make it a citizen of the state conferring such powers." C. J. supra, 1232; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 118 U. S. 290, 30 L. ed. 83, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1094, and numerous other cases cited in note 34 to the above text.

Section 211 of the Constitution only purports to confer two rights: one to own real estate in this state, and the other the power to acquire it by condemnation through the exercise of the right of eminent domain; and it is only upon foreign railroad corporations that even those two rights may be conferred by that section. Both it and § 765 of the Statutes recognize the continued existence of the foreign railroad corporation after their provisions have been complied with by it.

There is no intimation in either of them that, after being clothed with the power and authority attempted to be conferred, the creature or entity thereby becoming possessed of them has been made a new creature by being born again. The section of the Constitution withholds from such foreign corporations either of the two rights referred to, "until it shall have become a body corporate," etc. Logically there would no longer be a foreign corporation to which the pronoun "it" could apply, if the domesticating method extinguished the foreign corporation by creating an entirely new one under the laws of this state. Likewise § 765 of the Statutes, in providing the method by which the same rights may be conferred upon a foreign railroad corporation, withholds them "until it" (not individuals proposing to form a new corporation) shall do the things prescribed in the section. Indeed, if the contention of the secretary of state and of his counsel, the attorney general, be true, i. e., that it was the intention of § 211 of the Constitution and of § 765 of the Statutes to create outright a new corporation in Kentucky, and that none but domestically created corporations can exercise the rights proposed to be conferred by those sections, then there would have been no use for their enactment, since in that case it would have been sufficient to say, both in the Constitution and the Statutes, that no railroad corporation "shall be entitled to the benefit of the right of eminent domain or have power to acquire the right of way or real estate for depot or other purposes," unless it be one created exclusively under the laws of this state. All the references to a foreign corporation in each of the sections, and to what "it" must do, and to the powers which "it" will receive thereafter, can have no meaning unless it was the intention to recognize "it" as a continuing foreign corporation.

It must, furthermore, not be overlooked that the sections of the Constitution and of the Statutes now under consideration propose only to confer upon the corporation the limited powers above referred to. They do not pretend to confer all of the corporate powers usually given to and exercised by newly created corporations. If the effect of a compliance with the sections of the Constitution and Statutes under consideration is complete domestication for all purposes, so as to convert the foreign corporation into a newly created Kentucky one, the result would be that the foreign corporation would become citizenized here so as to deprive it of the status of a foreign corporation, and bar its right to invoke the jurisdiction of Federal courts upon the ground of diverse citizenship.

In the case of Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co. 174 U. S. 552, 43 L. ed. 1081, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817, the Supreme Court of the United States had before it facts substantially the same as we have here, and it held that the foreign corporation did not extinguish its foreign identity, or lose its status as a citizen of the foreign state (Indiana), by becoming incorporated in Kentucky so as to enable it to purchase and own real estate here for railroad purposes, and to exercise in this state the right to acquire such property by condemnation under the power of eminent domain. In that case the Louisville, New Albany, & Chicago Railway Company had been incorporated and organized under the laws of the state of Indiana, and in 1880 the legislature of this state passed an act incorporating it in this state as a Kentucky corporation, which method of incorporating companies in this state, by special act of the legislature, was both legal and common at that time, but has since been abolished by our present Constitution. The special act incorporating that company in this state conferred upon it, not only the powers above enumerated, but all the powers incident to a corporation, and which are possessed by all other corporations created under the laws of this state. The company accepted its Kentucky charter, and thereafter, on a number of occasions and in a number of transactions, described itself as a Kentucky corporation. It filed a suit in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, the defendants in which were citizens of Kentucky. They contested the jurisdiction of the court upon the ground that the plaintiff therein was a citizen of Kentucky, and could not invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal court on the ground of a diversity of citizenship. The Supreme Court in rejecting that contention said: "As to the jurisdiction, it being clear that the plaintiff was first created a corporation of the state of Indiana, even if it was afterwards created a corporation of the state of Kentucky also, it was and remained, for the purposes of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, a citizen of Indiana, the state by which it was originally created. It could neither have brought suit as a corporation of both states against a corporation or other citizen of either state, nor could it have sued or been sued as a corporation of Kentucky, in any court of the United States. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black, 286, 17 L. ed. 130; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. James, 161 U. S. 545, 40 L. ed. 802, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621; St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Steele, 167 U. S. 659, 663, 42 L. ed. 315, 316, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 925; Barrow S. S. Co. v. Kane, 170 U. S. 100, 106, 42 L. ed. 964, 966, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526."

If the baptismal ceremony administered to the foreign corporation in that case did not have the effect of extinguishing it and making of it an entirely new creature, so as to destroy its foreign identity in Kentucky, it is difficult to see how the administration of our present provided ceremony would have that effect, since it goes no further toward manifesting such an intention on the part of the legislature than did the domesticating acts in the case referred to; and manifestly the organization tax demanded of plaintiff is not required by § 4225 of the Statutes of any other corporations than those created (sometimes referred to as "born") here, and those terms can have no application to a corporation which still has its former foreign existence.

This court in the case of Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Com. 119 Ky. 196, 83 S. W. 562, held that the organization tax sought to be collected in the instant case as imposed by the section of the Statutes, supra, could not be exacted of a foreign railroad company which had complied with the provisions of § 841, although the section says that a foreign corporation complying with its terms "shall at once become and be a corporation, citizen, and resident of this state."

In the case of Plummer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 143 Ky. 102, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 362, 136 S. W. 162, there were presented to this court questions relating to the domesticating of foreign railroad corporations pursuant to the method provided by, and for the purposes contained in, § 765, supra, of the Statutes, and it was expressly held in that case that the process of domestication provided by the two sections (765 and 841) were for distinct and separate purposes, but, as said in the opinion, so we may say now: "Why this distinction was made it is not essential, in the consideration of the question before us, to inquire."

In that opinion this court discussed the legal effect of a compliance by a foreign corporation with those two sections of the Statutes, the one making it "a corporation, citizen, and resident of this state," and the other making it one "organized as a corporation under the laws of this state," and then said: "It would therefore seem that, so far as our laws can affect the question, the corporation that has complied with § 841 is to the same extent a Kentucky corporation as is a foreign corporation that complies with § 765. The only difference between the two sections is in the means or method by which the foreign corporation is converted into or becomes a Kentucky corporation. . . . So far as the principle involved is concerned, the requirements imposed by one section cannot be distinguished from those imposed by the other."

It naturally follows that if a compliance with § 841 would not domesticate the complying corporation, so as to destroy its foreign identity and to render it amenable to the payment of the organization tax required by § 4225, supra, as held in the case of Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Com. supra, a compliance with the provisions of § 765, supra, would also not have that effect.

Upon the whole case we conclude that it was not the intention of the legislature, in enacting § 4225 of the Statutes, to include therein foreign corporations seeking domestication under the provisions of § 765, and that plaintiff cannot be required to pay the organization tax demanded of it by the defendant. He should have accepted and filed the papers tendered him without the payment of that tax, and the judgment appealed from, conforming to these views, is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Effect of domestication of foreign corporations.

- I. Distinction between licensing to do domestic business and domesticating foreign corporation, 131.
- II. Distinction between creation of domestic corporation united to, and domestication of, foreign corporation, 133.
- III. Mutuality of action by state and corporation to effect domestication of foreign body, 134.
- IV. Residence of domesticated foreign corporation, 135.
- V. Citizenship of domesticated foreign corporation, 135.

VI. Amenability of domesticated foreign corporation to legal process of domestic courts, 140.

VII. Local taxation of domesticated foreign corporation, 141.

VIII. Conclusion, 142.

1. Distinction between licensing to do domestic business and domesticating foreign corporation.

Every corporation, unless the law or its charter forbids, may be permitted to transact corporate business beyond the limits of its own state. Canada Southern R. Co. v. Gebhard (1883) 109 U. S. 527, 27 L. ed. 1020, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 363; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Gonzales (1894) 151 U. S. 496, 38 L. ed. 248, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 401.

A mere grant of privileges or powers to a foreign corporation, without more, does not make it a domestic one. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. (1886) 118 U. S. 290, 30 L. ed. 83, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1094. Thus, the mere consent of a state to the extension within its territory of the line of a foreign railroad corporation, and to the carrying on of the business of such railroad within the state, does not make the railroad company a domestic corporation. Ibid.

The domestication of a foreign corporation does not result from compliance with the Texas statute that provides, in substance, that foreign corporations shall obtain from the secretary of state permission to do business, and shall designate a chief office within the state, and shall then have and enjoy all the rights and privileges conferred by law upon domestic corporations. Coca Cola Co. v. Allison (1908) 52 Tex. Civ. App. 54, 113 S. W. 308.

It, confessedly, is not easy to differentiate a legislative purpose to create a new domestic corporation, owing its life to the statute creating it, out of a foreign corporation, from a legislative intent to enable a corporation of another state to function within the domestic territory. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. (1886) 118 U. S. 290, 30 L. ed. 83, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1094. According to this case, the language of the statute designed to effect the domestication of a foreign corporation must be such as to imply the creation or adoption of the corporation in a form that clothes the state with powers usually exercised by it over its own domestic corporations, and that requires the foreign body to render to that state the allegiance which a corporation owes to its creator.

This proposition has been reaffirmed, and may be asserted to be the law of the United States Supreme Court. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co. (1899) 174 U. S. 552, 43 L. ed. 1081, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817.

The consolidation of a foreign and a domestic corporation effected in strict compliance with statutes of the domestic state conferring upon the combined organization the status, rights, powers, and privileges of a domestic corporation, and subjecting it to all the duties and liabilities of such a corporation, makes the consolidated body, to all intents and for all purposes, a domestic corporation, governed by and subject to the laws of the domestic state. State ex rel. Leese v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1888) 25 Neb. 156, 2 L.R.A. 564, 41 N. W. 125.

A statute naming a railroad corporation chartered by the legislature of an adjoining state, and authorizing it to extend and construct its line between designated points through the territory of the enacting state, and providing that, if such company should avail itself of the privilege thereby granted, it should, as to all its rights, franchises, property, powers, duties, and obligations within the state, be subject to all the provisions of the laws thereof, was construed to create a domestic corporation of such railroad. Goshorn v. Ohio County (1865) 1 W. Va. 308.

The purchase by a foreign railroad company of the railroad and franchises of a domestic one, and its acquisition by statute of authority to have, use, and enjoy them and the rights, powers, and privileges of its vendor, subject to all the latter's duties and liabilities, make it, in respect of what it has thus acquired, a domestic corporation in its vendor's home state. Clark v. Barnard (1883) 108 U. S. 436, 27 L. ed. 780, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 878.

Where the legislation of a state permits the sale of the property and franchises of one of its railroads, and provides that upon its taking place the corporation shall forthwith be dissolved and the purchaser shall immediately become a new corporation of the state, which shall succeed to all the franchises, rights, and privileges, and perform all the duties that would or should have been performed by the first corporation. But for such sale and the conveyance pursuant to it, a foreign corporation which acquires a domestic railroad by purchase at a mortgage foreclosure sale, and takes possession of and operates the purchased road within the state, becomes ipso facto a domestic corporation of the state as fully and as completely as was the defunct corporation. Carolina Coal & Ice Co. v. Southern R. Co. (1907) 144 N. C. 732, 57 S. E. 444.

Under the Kentucky Constitution (§ 211), providing that a foreign railway corporation shall not have the right of eminent domain or power to acquire a right of way or real estate for depot or other uses in the state, until it shall have become a body corporate pursuant to and in accord with the laws of Kentucky, and the statutes (Ky. Stat. § 765) prescribing the method for a foreign railroad corporation to become a body corporate in Kentucky, it is a condition precedent to the right of a foreign railroad company to purchase or own any domestic railroad, and to function as such in Kentucky, that it shall comply with the statutory requirements and be domesticated. Plummer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1911) 143 Ky. 102, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 362, 136 S. W. 162.

A foreign corporation becoming domesticated in Tennessee by complying with the laws thereof requiring the filing and registration of a copy of its foreign charter, and acquiring thereby the entry to the state courts and subjection to the local jurisdiction, supervision, and control of the state as fully as corporations created originally under the laws thereof, nevertheless becomes a domestic corporation only as respects its property, operations, and conduct within the state, and differs essentially from corporations of other states with distinct local incorporators, domestic directors, local stock issues, and other earmarks of domesticity in states where they have sought and obtained additional charters. Adams v. Chattanooga Co. (1913) 128 Tenn. 505, 161 S. W. 1131.

It was said by one Federal judge that he had no doubt but that a foreign railroad corporation would become a domestic one by complying with legislation enacted by the domestic state, declaring that a foreign railway company, by building its road within the state and filing its articles of incorporation with the secretary of state, should be a domestic corporation with respect of all its transactions within such state. Stout v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. (1881) 3 McCrary, 1, 8 Fed. 794.

A foreign corporation which, pursuant to the statutes of Tennessee, filed and registered in that state a copy of its foreign charter, and thereby became domesticated, was held by the state supreme court, notwithstanding a legislative pronouncement that such corporations should be "deemed and taken to be corporations of this state and . . . may sue and be sued in the courts of this state and shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the state as fully as if created under the laws of Tennessee," did not become a new and distinct entity, but only a domestic corporation quoad hoc any property and acts within the jurisdiction of the state, and, therefore, the state courts could not and would not take jurisdiction of a suit in equity by stockholders to dissolve such corporation and distribute its property and assets. Adams v. Chattanooga Co. (1913) 128 Tenn. 505, 161 S. W. 1131.

The effect of a domestication of a foreign railroad corporation entering and operating its line within the state, by legislation appropriate for such a result, has been held to make the corporation competent to receive aid by means of bonds issued by local counties under authority of statutes authorizing counties to subscribe to the capital stock of domestic railroads, and aid them in that manner, and hence to make bonds so issued and delivered valid public obligations according to their tenor and effect. Goshorn v. Ohio County (1865) 1 W. Va. 308.

II. Distinction between creation of domestic corporation united to, and domestication of, foreign corporation.

As a rule, when a railroad of one state is authorized by the laws of another state to extend its line into and operate in the latter, and exercises the privilege of doing so, it really becomes in the new territory, not a domesticated foreign corporation, but a new and distinct domestic body corporate. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. (1886) 118 U. S. 290, 30 L. ed. 83, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1094.

Two states have no power to join in legislation as an amalgamated sovereignty, to create a single body corporate constituting a single legal entity of both, rather than a distinct corporation of each or of one of them. Quincy R. Bridge Co. v. Adams County (1878) 88 Ill. 615; Newport & C. Bridge Co. v. Woolley (1880) 78 Ky. 523.

When two states enact legislation similar in verbiage, creating a corporation to build and operate a bridge across a river which forms their common boundary, having the same name, like powers and duties, and the same persons as directors and administrative officers, they each call into existence a separate body corporate in their respective territories, and neither domesticates a corporation of the other. Newport & C. Bridge Co. v. Woolley (Ky.) supra.

If, pursuant to legislation in similar terms enacted by two states, two distinct and separate railroad corporations, one created by one state and the other by the other state, are merged and consolidated into a continuous line under the same management, with the same stockholders, each constituent corporation will remain a domestic one, and retain its separate identity in the state of its origin, and will continue to be, as before the union, a foreign corporation in the other state. Muller v. Dows (1877) 94 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 207; Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. (1890) 136 U. S. 356, 34 L. ed. 363, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1004; Racine & M. R. Co. v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. (1868) 49 Ill. 331, 95 Am. Dec. 595; State v. Northern C. R. Co. (1862) 18 Md. 213; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn (1868) 28 Md. 287, 92 Am. Dec. 688; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Auditor General (1884) 53 Mich. 79, 18 N. W. 586; Rece v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. (1889) 32 W. Va. 164, 3 L.R.A. 572, 9 S. E. 212.

A railroad company chartered by, and operating in, two or more states, is regarded as a domestic corporation in each for all local government purposes apart from matters under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. Stone v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. (1886) 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191; Graham v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. (1886) 118 U. S. 161, 30 L. ed. 196, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1009.

Whenever a corporation of one state becomes by legislative sanction also a corporation of another state, either by consolidation or otherwise, the acts it afterwards does in the latter state are done as a domestic and not as a foreign corporation. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Meeh (1895) 30 L.R.A. 250, 16 C. C. A. 510, 32 U. S. App. 691, 69 Fed. 753.

The effect of a statute declaring that the lessees, their associates, successors, and assigns, of a foreign railroad company operating in the enacting state, shall be a railroad corporation in that state, is to make it a domestic corporation there. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Vance (1878) 96 U. S. 450, 24 L. ed. 752.

A statute which authorizes and empowers a foreign corporation to create and establish in the enacting state, under the control of local directors, one or more branch departments, whenever a stated sum as capital stock for the same shall be subscribed and paid, or satisfactorily secured by local citizens, and which declares that, when any such department or departments shall thus be created and established, such corporation shall be regarded as a domestic body and be entitled to exercise and enjoy all the rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities of similar domestic corporations, has the legal effect of creating a domestic corporation, the same in name and possessing the same franchises as the foreign one, and of calling into being a distinct legal entity. And regardless of whatever may have been the legislative purpose in enacting such statute, it did not either merely license the foreign corporation to do business in the state, or domesticate it, but resulted in making a new corporation, so that there was one in each state and each one was confined to the territory of the sovereign from which it derived its existence. Grangers' Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Kamper (1882) 73 Ala. 325.

III. Mutuality of action by state and corporation to effect domestication of foreign body.

The power of a state legislature by appropriate legislation to authorize a foreign corporation, which does or desires to do business within its borders, to become a domestic corporation upon prescribed conditions in respect of its property, conduct, duties, and liabilities within the domestic territory, is generally conceded and nowhere denied. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler (1862) 1 Black (U. S.) 286, 17 L. ed. 130; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Harris (1871) 12 Wall. (U. S.) 65, 20 L. ed. 354; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co. (1899) 174 U. S. 552, 43 L. ed. 1081, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817; Carolina Coal & Ice Co. v. Southern R. Co. (1907) 144 N. C. 732, 57 S. E. 444; Stonega Coke &

Coal Co. v. Southern Steel Co. (1910) 123 Tenn. 428, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 278, 131 S. W. 988. And see 14a C. J. p. 1227, § 3934, and cases cited.

A state may in this manner adopt a foreign corporation and make it a domestic one, instead of giving it a mere license to do domestic business. And in giving the corporation a domestic status, the state may, at will, either invest it with the same franchises and powers, and impose the same duties, that it enjoyed or was bound to discharge in the state of its origin, or may confer upon it greater or less powers and privileges and subject it to more or fewer obligations. Com. v. United Cigarette Mach. Co. (1916) 119 Va. 447, 89 S. E. 935.

And a state legislature may not only license a foreign corporation to enter and carry on its corporate business within the borders of the state, but may, in addition, without going so far as to domesticate it, grant it powers usually reserved to domestic corporations exclusively; for example, the power to exercise the right of eminent domain. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Welsh (1894) 143 N. Y. 411, 42 Am. St. Rep. 734, 38 N. E. 378.

A foreign corporation which becomes a domestic one by legislative sanction derives all its powers to act as a body corporate, in the state of its adoption, from the local laws. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Meeh (1895) 30 L.R.A. 250, 16 C. C. A. 510, 32 U. S. App. 691, 69 Fed. 753.

The United States Supreme Court has declared that a foreign corporation adopted and domesticated by law in another state, and there invested with full corporate powers, does not become a corporation of the latter state until it does some act signifying its acceptance of the domestic status and its purpose to be governed by the domesticating statute. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. (1886) 118 U. S. 290, 30 L. ed. 83, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1094.

When a foreign railroad corporation accepts a legislative grant of permission to be domesticated and to exercise its functions in another state, it may be treated by the latter state as a domestic corporation. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. James (1896) 161 U. S. 545, 40 L. ed. 802, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621.

A state which created a corporation has no ground for revoking its charter in the fact that it accepts incorporation from another state. Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co. (1868) 58 Pa. 26.

IV. Residence of domesticated foreign corporation.

As a general rule, a corporation has its legal existence in the state which created it, and is incapable of passing beyond its boundaries. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French (1856) 18 How. (U. S.) 404, 15 L. ed. 451; Canada Southern R. Co. v. Gebhard (1883) 109 U. S. 527, 27 L. ed. 1020, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 363.

It cannot change its residence, but must dwell and have its sole legal home in the state where it was chartered. Ex parte Schollenberger (1878) 96 U. S. 369, 24 L. ed. 853.

It may be allowed to transact its business outside of the home state, but it does not, by doing so, acquire a residence elsewhere. Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Francis (1871) 11 Wall. (U. S.) 210, 20 L. ed. 77; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Koontz (1881) 104 U. S. 5, 26 L. ed. 643; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Estill (1893) 147 U. S. 591, 37 L. ed. 292, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 444; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Gonzales (1894) 151 U. S. 496, 38 L. ed. 248, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 401; Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co. (1868) 58 Pa. 26.

A statute requiring a foreign corporation which desires to carry on business in the state to designate a place within the state as its chief office therein, and to procure a permit from the secretary of state, does not give a corporation of another state which complies with its terms a local domicile as a domestic corporation. Coca Cola Co. v. Allison (1908) 52 Tex. Civ. App. 54, 113 S. W. 308.

This is the established rule, but nevertheless, to a limited extent and for certain purposes, a foreign corporation domesticated in another state may have a residence in such state, regardless of its technical citizenship and domicile in the state of its origin. Gaunt v. Nemours Trading Corp. (1921) 194 App. Div. 668, 186 N. Y. Supp. 92; Bernhardt v. Brown (1896) 118 N. C. 700, 36 L.R.A. 402, 24 S. E. 527, 715, rehearing denied in (1896) 119 N. C. 506, 36 L.R.A. 407, 26 S. E. 162; Young v. South Tredegar Iron Co. (1886) 85 Tenn. 189, 4 Am. St. Rep. 752, 2 S. W. 202; Stonega Coke & Coal Co. v. Southern Steel Co. (1910) 123 Tenn. 428, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 278, 131 S. W. 988; Com. v. United Cigarette Mach. Co. (1916) 119 Va. 447, 89 S. E. 985.

Legislation in North Carolina, clearly intended to create a new domestic corporation rather than to license an existing foreign one to do business within the state, has been held to domesticate a foreign body corporate which unreservedly accepts and acts under it, and to make such body, for all purposes, a resident domiciled in that state. Carolina Coal & Ice Co. v. Southern R. Co. (1907) 144 N. C. 732, 57 S. E. 444.

V. Citizenship of domesticated foreign corporation.

The doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, early adopted and consistently adhered to, that every corporation conclusively is presumed to be a citizen of the state which created it, in every litigation to which it is a party and for all purposes of jurisdiction of the Federal courts on the ground of diverse citizenship, has given rise to the general rule in the Federal courts, to which they admit no exception, that the domestication, as distinguished from a new incorporation, of a foreign corporation, does not affect its status as a citizen of the state in which it originated.

This doctrine has been accepted in certain states. Calvert v. Southern R. Co. (1902) 64 S. C. 139, 41 S. E. 963; Wilson v. Southern R. Co. (1902) 64 S. C. 162, 36 S. E. 701, 41 S. E. 971, overruling Mathis v. Southern R. Co. (1898) 53 S. C. 246, 31 S. E. 240; Rece v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. (1889) 32 W. Va. 164, 3 L.R.A. 572, 9 S. E. 212.

It is impossible for a corporation to cast off its allegiance to the sovereign which gave it a charter. Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co. (1868) 58 Pa. 26.

Of the above-cited cases, some may profitably be referred to more in detail.

For example: A foreign railroad corporation may acquire control and possession of other railroads in a neighboring state and operate them under contracts with their owners, which nevertheless continue their corporate existences and maintain their separate organizations; it may, too, comply with all the laws of such neighboring state, and, by virtue of so complying, be subject to the supervision and governmental control of such state, to the full extent and in the same way that a domestic corporation of that state would be; yet, it does not lose its identity as a corporation and a citizen of the state of its origin, nor become a corporation of the neighboring state so as to affect the jurisdiction of the courts over a litigation between it and a citizen of its original state. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. James (1896) 161 U. S. 545, 40 L. ed. 802, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621.

In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Castle (1912) 224 U. S. 541, 56 L. ed. 875, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606, the defendant railroad was sued by one of its employees, a citizen of Nebraska, for damages for personal injuries received by its negligence, a cause of action given by a statute of that state. The plaintiff alleged in his complaint, and the defendant admitted in its answer, that the railroad company was a corporation organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of Missouri, and a citizen of that state. Because of these averments and admissions in the pleadings the court refused to assent to the validity of the defendant's contention on argument that, although it had been originally created a Missouri corporation, it had, before suit, become in law and in fact a domestic corporation of Nebraska in virtue of the requirements of the Constitution and statutes of that state, with which it had complied, and consequently that the parties were both citizens of Nebraska so that the diverse citizenship necessary to give the Federal courts jurisdiction of the cause was wanting.

The legislation of Tennessee concerning foreign corporations established and doing business in that state, investing them with sundry powers, rights, and privileges theretofore exclusively belonging to domestic corporations, was held not so far to domesticate them as to entitle a foreign corporation, which had complied with the terms of, and accepted, such legislation, to a preference given by statute to citizens and domestic corporations of the state, who might be creditors of insolvent local debtors, in the distribution of assets as provided by a special statute in that behalf. Re Standard Oak Veneer Co. (1909) 173 Fed. 103. The court in this case, after referring to this legislation as having at the outset provided that a foreign corporation that should comply with the initial act should be deemed and taken to be a domestic corporation, subject to the jurisdiction of the state courts, capable of suing and suable therein like domestic corporations, and, later, that such a foreign corporation should, after its compliance with the terms of the pertinent statutes, "be to all intents and purposes a domestic corporation," with a status in the courts "just as though it were created under the laws of this state," cited a later amendatory statute (Acts 1895, p. 123, chap. 81) which omitted the previous provision that a foreign corporation, on complying with these statutes, should become "to all intents and purposes a domestic corporation," and deemed such omission significant evidence of the legislative intent that a foreign corporation shall not acquire a permanent home or habitation in the state, or be treated as a domestic corporation for purposes other than those of jurisdiction of the state courts.

A railroad corporation organized under the laws of and created by the state of Virginia, having stockholders conclusively presumed by the Federal courts to be citizens of that state, notwithstanding its domestication in South Carolina where its line extends and its corporate functions are exercised in conformity with the Constitution and statutes of that state (Const. art. 9, § 8, and 22 Stat. at L. 114), which make a foreign corporation that complies with the provisions thereof ipso facto a domestic one, enjoying all the rights and subject to all the liabilities of South Carolina corporations, and capable of suing and being sued in the state courts, and subject to the state's jurisdiction as fully as if it had been originally created under the laws of South Carolina, remains a citizen of Virginia and continues, in consequence, entitled to remove, on the ground of diverse citizenship, into the United States court, a suit brought against it by a citizen of South Carolina upon a cause of action arising in that state. Calvert v. Southern R. Co. (1902) 64 S. C. 139, 41 S. E. 963; Wilson v. Southern R. Co. (1902) 64 S. C. 162, 36 S. E. 701, 41 S. E. 971, overruling Mathis v. Southern R. Co. (1898) 53 S. C. 246, 31 S. E. 240.

There were strong dissenting opinions from two or three members of the court in these cases but the majority felt impelled to the stated conclusion by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and recognized a "distinction between the creation of a new corporation out of natural persons and the mere adoption of a foreign corporation for local purposes."

A state statute declaring foreign railroad corporations doing business in the enacting state shall be held, and taken to be, and treated as domestic corporations in all suits and legal proceedings, and which requires every such corporation to file an agreement to the same effect, does not and cannot constitutionally operate to take away from a foreign corporation its right to remove, on the ground of diverse citizenship, into the Federal courts, a litigation brought against it in the state court. Rece v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. (1889) 32 W. Va. 164, 3 L.R.A. 572, 9 S. E. 212.

The supreme court of North Carolina has taken the opposite stand.

A statute (Pub. Laws 1899, chap. 62) of that state provided that every foreign telegraph, telephone, express, transportation, or insurance company desiring to carry on business in North Carolina should, by filing with the secretary of state copies, duly authenticated, of its charter and by-laws, immediately become a domestic corporation and enjoy the rights and privileges and be subject to the liabilities of a domestic corporation the same as if originally it had been created by the laws of North Carolina; and, further, that it should sue and be sued in, and be subject to the jurisdiction of the state courts, like any domestic corporation. A telephone company of New York and a fraternal insurance company of the District of Columbia each complied with this statute, and under it established itself and carried on its business in North Carolina. Each was held by so doing to have become a naturalized citizen of, and in legal effect to have reincorporated in, the state, and thereby to have abrogated its right as a foreign citizen to remove into the Federal courts, on the ground of diversity of citizenship, a suit brought against it in the state court by a citizen of North Carolina. Debnam v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1900) 126 N. C. 831, 36 S. E. 269; Layden v. Endowment Rank, K. P. (1901) 128 N. C. 546, 39 S. E. 47. In these decisions it was the view of the court that by enacting the statute under consideration the legislature intended not merely to license these foreign corporations to do business within the state, but to require them actually to become domestic corporations, either by reincorporation or by adoption, and that the legal effect of the statute was to charter, and not simply to grant permission to carry on business in the state.

The Supreme Court of the United States afterwards held that this could not be accomplished by the mere filing of a copy of the act of incorporation, or organization papers and by-laws, and accepting the statutory terms. A foreign corporation might comply fully with the statute, and yet remain a foreigner and a citizen of its home state. Nothing short of an actual creation as a domestic corporation would accomplish the asserted result. It, therefore, condemned the two decisions just cited as unsound, and reaffirmed its long-maintained position to the contrary. Southern R. Co. v. Allison (1903) 190 U. S. 326, 47 L. ed. 1078, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 713. We have, said the court in that case, read with respectful consideration the cases of Debnam v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. and Layden v. Endowment Rank, K. P. (N. C.) supra, in which the North Carolina supreme court came to a different conclusion from that which we have reached in regard to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, in a case where a foreign corporation has been domesticated in North Carolina pursuant to compliance with legislation of that state, but we cannot concur in the doctrine announced in those cases. We feel bound by the decisions of this court upon that subject.

It is none the less quite possible for a foreign corporation to become a domestic one in another state than that of its origin, and thereby lose its right to remove a litigation from the state to the Federal court on the ground of diverse citizenship.

By a statute naming an existing corporation of another state and incorporating it in the enacting state, manifesting throughout a purpose to create a domestic corporation and to confer upon it all the powers, privileges, and franchises of such a body, and subject it to all the duties and liabilities thereof, there comes into being a full-fledged domestic body corporate, which may not, when afterwards sued by a citizen of the same state, remove the litigation into the Federal courts on the ground of diverse citizenship. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Alabama (1883) 107 U. S. 581, 27 L. ed. 518, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432.

This case afterwards was explained and distinguished by saying that, while it held that a railroad corporation previously created in Tennessee had been made an Alabama corporation, so that it could not remove into the United States circuit court a suit brought in Alabama by a citizen of that state, it was because the company, by the Alabama legislation, had been required to open stock subscription books in that state, and at its first meeting of stockholders designate a principal office therein, and consequently had, in virtue thereof, become an original Alabama corporation, created and controlled by that state. Southern R. Co. v. Allison (1903) 190 U. S. 326, 47 L. ed. 1078, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 713.

A foreign corporation which becomes domesticated in another state by complying with, and accepting, and acting under legislation enacted therein, plainly expressing a purpose to create a new, and not simply to license an old, corporation, becomes a citizen of such state by naturalization and adoption, and abrogates its right to remove into the Federal courts, on the ground of diverse citizenship, a suit brought against it in the state courts by a citizen of such state. Carolina Coal & Ice Co. v. Southern R. Co. (1907) 144 N. C. 732, 57 S. E. 444.

The court in that case distinguished Southern R. Co. v. Allison (1903) 190 U. S. 326, 47 L. ed. 1078, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 713, by reasoning that the case at bar was not against the foreign corporation of the name of defendant but against the new domestic corporation it had become, and hence that there was no diversity of citizenship between the litigants.

A united railroad corporation operating a line in two separate states, holding a charter from each in substantially the same terms, with the same name, and clothed with the same capacities and powers, designed to accomplish the same objects and to discharge the same duties in each state, and referred to in the laws of each as a single corporate body, is nevertheless a distinct legal entity in each state which is not domesticated in the other, so as to acquire therein the status of a citizen for the purposes of jurisdiction of the Federal courts. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler (1862) 1 Black (U. S.) 286, 17 L. ed. 130.

A railroad company incorporated in each of several states in which it operates a continuous line, must be deemed, for the purposes of jurisdiction of the Federal courts, a citizen of the state in which a suit is brought against it by a citizen thereof, upon a cause of action arising therein, regardless of whether or not it was originally incorporated in another state, when, by the Constitution and laws of the state of the forum, it is required to keep a general office therein and to have a majority of its directors residents of such state.

A railroad company with a continuous line partly in one and partly in an adjoining state, first incorporated by one and then by the other of such states, is a separate corporation in each, and, in a suit brought against it in either state by a citizen thereof, must, for the purposes of jurisdiction of the courts, be deemed a citizen of the state of the forum. Allegheny County v. Cleveland & P. R. Co. (1865) 51 Pa. 228, 88 Am. Dec. 579.

A corporation incorporated for the same general business and objects by two or more states, and perfecting its organization under each charter, becomes a citizen in each state, entitled to its protection and amenable to its laws. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Barnhill (1892) 91 Tenn. 395, 30 Am. St. Rep. 889, 19 S. W. 21.

It must be regarded as settled beyond doubt or controversy, according to one Federal court, speaking a quarter of a century ago, that two states of this Union cannot by joint action create a corporation which will be a single corporate entity and, for jurisdictional purposes, a citizen of each state. One state may create a corporation of a given name, and the legislature of the other may declare that it shall be a corporation of that state also, and be entitled within its borders to function through the same directors and officers, but nevertheless a single corporation is not thereby created, but two corporations, alike in name, of different parentage. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Meeh (1895) 30 L.R.A. 250, 16 C. C. A. 510, 32 U. S. App. 691, 69 Fed. 753.

A foreign life insurance company, engaged in business in the state of New York by permission and license of the insurance department, is, so far as any litigation in the courts of that state is concerned, deemed a citizen of New York. Webster v. Columbian Nat. L. Ins. Co. (1909) 131 App. Div. 837, 116 N. Y. Supp. 404, affirmed in (1909) 196 N. Y. 523, 89 N. E. 1114.

VI. Amenability of domesticated foreign corporation to legal process of domestic courts.

A foreign corporation which has filed its designation pursuant to the laws of New York, and been licensed to do business in that state, is considered a resident thereof for the purposes of jurisdiction of the New York courts. Gaunt v. Nemours Trading Corp. (1921) 194 App. Div. 668, 186 N. Y. Supp. 92.

A foreign corporation domesticated pursuant to law in North Carolina by being chartered, rather than simply licensed to do business in the state, is not open to an attachment against its property as a nonresident. Bernhardt v. Brown (1896) 118 N. C. 700, 36 L.R.A. 402, 24 S. E. 715, rehearing denied in (1896) 119 N. C. 506, 36 L.R.A. 407, 26 S. E. 162.

And in Tennessee a foreign corporation, allowed by law to carry on its business in that state upon certain prescribed conditions, pursuant to a statute declaring it to be a domestic corporation, to all intents and purposes, if it complies with such statute and meets the stated conditions, is immune from an attachment of its property as a nonresident of the state. Stonega Coke & Coal Co. v. Southern Steel Co. (1910) 123 Tenn. 428, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 278, 131 S. W. 988.

A foreign corporation which not only complies with the Tennessee statutes requiring it to file and register its charter in that state, and be thereby deemed a domestic body, subject to the jurisdiction of the local courts like all domestic corporations, but goes beyond this, and establishes in that state a general office where it keeps its corporate seal, holds meetings of stockholders and directors, has all its property, and carries on all its corporate operations, and whose officers all reside in Tennessee, has acquired such a situs and become so far domesticated in that state as to be lawfully and validly subject to legal process emanating from a state court in an action by a creditor of one of its nonresident stockholders, attaching his shares in such corporation. Young v. South Tredegar Iron Co. (1886) 85 Tenn. 189, 4 Am. St. Rep. 752, 2 S. W. 202.

That case was unusual, if not unique, in its facts, and was explained later and limited in Adams v. Chattanooga Co. (1913) 128 Tenn. 505, 161 S. W. 1131, where the court declined jurisdiction of a bill in equity filed by stockholders of a domesticated foreign corporation, to dissolve the company and distribute its assets. The court in the latter case said of the former one that it held that, while the iron company was a foreign corporation in one sense, it was, in view of its acts, to be deemed a domestic one as far forth as to give it a domestic situs for attachment of its shares of stock in Tennessee; that those "acts within the territorial jurisdiction" were adequate to drawing the corporate situs for the indicated purpose into the local jurisdiction, as the place of the actual home office of the company; that that "fact was allowed to overrule legal fiction." But, the court added, it was not meant to be there ruled that every corporation which complies with our statutes acquires by virtue thereof a situs for stock attachment purposes.

A statute of Virginia concerning a foreign railroad corporation, entitled, "An Act to Confirm a Law of the Foreign State Incorporating Such Corporation," setting out such act in extenso, and then conferring the same rights and privileges within the state upon that corporation, and subjecting it to the same pains, penalties, and obligations that the original charter imposed and reserved to the creative foreign state and its citizens, operates, it was held, to adopt, naturalize, or reincorporate such corporation as a domestic body, and to render it amenable to regular legal process of the domestic courts. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Gallahue (1855) 12 Gratt. (Va.) 655, 65 Am. Dec. 254.

A foreign corporation which procures a permit to do business in Texas from the secretary of state, and thereby, according to statute, has and enjoys all the rights and privileges conferred by law upon domestic corporations, notwithstanding it has designated, as required by law, a chief office within the state, remains a foreign corporation still, and is subject to the jurisdiction of the local courts just like other foreign corporations. Coca Cola Co. v. Allison (1908) 52 Tex. Civ. App. 54, 113 S. W. 308.

VII. Local taxation of domesticated foreign corporation.

However powerless may be a state to make a foreign corporation a citizen within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States, it may none the less domesticate a corporation of another state so as to subject it to taxation upon all its property, tangible and intangible, within the state. Com. v. United Cigarette Mach. Co. (1916) 119 Va. 447, 89 S. E. 935.

Irrespective of where may be the technical citizenship of a foreign corporation, one which has taken advantage of a state statute enabling foreign corporations to carry on their corporate business in the enacting state and requiring all those who desire to do so to comply with the local laws, to be subject to the jurisdiction of the local courts, and to be deemed and treated as domestic corporations for all purposes relating to contracts made, property located, and franchises exercised within the state, and which, being thereunto empowered in its articles of association, has established its chief offices, is carrying on all its business, keeping all its property and effects, and maintaining all its executive and administrative officers in such state (virtually reducing to a branch office its original home office in the place of its origin), has made itself, for all local taxing purposes, at least, a domestic corporation of the state. Ibid.

A railroad corporation formed by the consolidation of companies chartered by more than one state, and by statute of each entitled to all the privileges and advantages, and clothed with all the powers, exercised by its local constituent; and a bridge company incorporated in similar terms by two adjoining states to build and operate a bridge across a river, the common boundary of both, are, in each state subject to taxation upon so much of their property and franchises as may be within or derived from such state. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Maryland (1850) 10 How. (U. S.) 376, 13 L. ed. 461; Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Mayer (1877) 31 Ohio St. 317.

A statute imposing a tax upon domestic railroad corporations having capital stock divided into shares does not apply to a foreign railroad which has simply complied with another statute of the same state, and filed with the secretary of state and the railroad commission a copy of its articles of incorporation, in order to operate its line within that state. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Com. (1904) 119 Ky. 196, 83 S. W. 562.

A religious corporation originally chartered in Pennsylvania and renamed by an act of the legislature of that state in 1846, and the same year, by special statute of Massachusetts, continued a body corporate in that commonwealth, and later, by legislation in New York reciting its previous incorporation in the other states, constituted a corporation by the same name, was held to be a single body with a single organization reincorporated so as to become a domestic corporation of New York, and hence, under the laws thereof, immune from liability to pay a transfer tax upon a legacy given it by name, with the addendum, "Boston, Mass.," in the last will of a testatrix. Re Lyon (1911) 144 App. Div. 104, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1004. "Theoretically," it was remarked in the majority opinion in that case, "it may be said that there is a distinct legal entity in each of the three states, but the substance is the same in all. It is a single body, possessing the franchises and privileges of a domestic corporation in three states. To say that the bequest is to a foreign corporation, merely because the testatrix named the place where its principal office is located, is to substitute form for substance. If she had distinctly said that she intended the bequest to go to the New York corporation, it would have gone into the same treasury and have been disbursed in the same manner and by the same people."

In the reported case (VAUGHAN v. NASHVILLE, C. & ST. L. R. CO. ante, 124) the court explicitly and intentionally left undecided the question raised by counsel for the railroad, of the constitutionality of legislation designed to impose organization taxes upon foreign corporations engaged in interstate commerce, which sought to become domesticated or naturalized in the legislating state, pursuant to laws enacted long after they had been admitted to do business in such states, and had conformed fully with all the statutes thereof entitling them to do so.

VIII. Conclusion.

A domesticated foreign corporation should be viewed as a body corporate originating in one state, which another state has by appropriate action allowed to become established within its borders to carry on its corporate operations, and to which the latter state has granted sundry powers, rights, and privileges not usually exercised and enjoyed by foreign corporations merely licensed to do business in the state, and short of those usually belonging to original domestic corporations.

Whether a legislative act respecting a foreign corporation authorized to do business in the state constitutes an adoption, domestication, or naturalization of it, or a mere permission or license to function within the state, is ever a question of the construction and interpretation of the enabling statute, and of the intention and purpose of the legislature in enacting it. 14a C. J. 1231, § 3935.

A statute whose only effect is to recognize the legal existence of a foreign corporation, and to allow it to exercise its powers and to function in the enacting state, does not make it a domestic corporation, but merely licenses it to do business in the domestic territory, leaving its status as a foreign corporation unchanged, and its domicile and citizenship in the state of its origin. 14a C. J. 1231, § 3935.

It is a generally accepted doctrine that a corporation chartered by different states under the same name, clothed with the same powers, for the same purposes, meant to accomplish the same results, and bound to discharge the same duties in each state, is a separate and distinct body in each. 7 R. C. L. title Corp. subd. VII. § 111, p. 140; 14a C. J. 1231, § 3935.

The authorities are in accord in holding that, to complete the domestication of a foreign corporation, mutuality of action by the state and the corporation is requisite. There must be, on the part of the state, legislation looking to that result, and on the part of the corporation an acceptance of, or assent to, the status. See 14a C. J. 1232, § 3936.

In the reported case (VAUGHAN v. NASHVILLE, C. & ST. L. R. CO. ante, 124) an organization tax imposed by statute on every stock corporation incorporated under Kentucky laws was held not chargeable to a foreign railroad company, upon its applying for domestic incorporation or naturalization, where it had been chartered in its home state, and had operated in Kentucky before the adoption of the state Constitution forbidding foreign railroads which did, or purposed doing, business in the state, from exercising the right of eminent domain or acquiring real estate for rights of way, stations, or other uses, without first incorporating in Kentucky, and where also the applicant had many years before complied with the Kentucky statutes entitling it to construct, maintain, and operate its road as it had done. The reasons the court gave for its conclusion were that the legislature never intended to impose the organization tax in such a case, and that in requiring domestication of existing roads that body had no intention to create new corporations, but only to clothe old ones with sundry attributes and powers. It is logical to say that if the statute relied upon to sustain the claim of the state to recover an organization tax did not provide for the organization of a distinct body corporate, but merely accorded to one already fully organized certain rights and privileges, and imposed correlative obligations, it afforded no authority for imposing an organization tax. A fair interpretation of the statute inclines to the conclusion that it was only meant to domesticate a foreign corporation, and not to create a domestic corporation. J. B. G.

Poison — entrapment into violation of Drug Act — defense.

1. One who has been in the habit of using morphine to alleviate the pain of a malady cannot be prosecuted for violation of the Drug Act, where, having never sold the drug, and having no intention of doing so, the government officials induced an acquaintance of his to persuade such person to secure morphine for him from a stranger, furnishing the money for the transaction, for the purpose of entrapping him into commission of the offense.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska (Woodrough, Dist. J.) to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating the Antinarcotic Act. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Sanborn and Carland, Circuit Judges, and Lewis, District Judge.

Messrs. John H. Hopkins and E. D. O'Sullivan, for plaintiff in error:

No valid and binding prosecution can be had upon a clear case of entrapment, and no conviction can be had upon any evidence secured in any such manner as was that secured by agents of the government, officers, and other persons.

Woo Wai v. United States, 137 C. C. A. 604, 223 Fed. 412; Sam Yick v. United States, 153 C. C. A. 96, 240 Fed. 60; Taylor v. United States, 113 C. C. A. 543, 193 Fed. 968; United States v. Healy, 202 Fed. 349; United States v. Jones, 80 Fed. 513; United States v. Adams, 59 Fed. 674; United

Messrs. T. S. Allen and Frank A. Peterson, for defendant in error:

The crime which the defendant was charged with having committed did not originate in the minds of the agents of the government and other persons and officers.

12 Cyc. 160; United States v. Amo, 261 Fed. 106; Fiunkin v. United States, — C. C. A. —, 265 Fed. 1; Sims v. United States, — C. C. A. —, 263 Fed. 48.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Clarence O. Butts, the defendant below, was indicted, convicted, and sentenced for a violation of the Antinarcotic Act (Comp. Stat. §§ 6287g, 6287h, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 177, 178), in that he, being a person who dealt in, sold, and dispensed narcotic drugs, without registering with the collector of internal revenue or paying the special tax imposed upon such dealers by this act, sold to H. Rudolph three fourths of an ounce of morphine sulphate, of the value of $190, about April 7, 1920.

Counsel for the defendant below have specified many alleged errors in the trial of this cause, one of the most serious of which is that the trial court denied a request of counsel for the defendant to instruct the jury that the defendant claimed that he was entrapped into delivering to Rudolph the morphine in question by the instigation of the government agents; that, had it not been for the importunities and false statements made by Rudolph, pursuant to the directions of the government agents, who started out admittedly for the purpose of entrapping the defendant into the commission of the offense charged against him, he would not have conceived or committed it; and that if the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant was induced by the importunities of Rudolph, acting under the orders and in conjunction with the government agents, to violate the law, and that, through the instigation of these men, the defendant was induced to sell or deliver to Rudolph the morphine, and that he would not otherwise have violated the law, they ought to return a verdict of not guilty. At the close of the trial, when this request was made, these facts had been established by the evidence:

The defendant, during fourteen years prior to April 6, 1920, had suffered eighteen operations for tuberculosis of the bones, and he had been and was addicted to the use of morphine when he was in pain. He had never sold or dealt in the article prior to the transaction of about the 7th of April, 1920, which was the basis of his prosecution in this case. H. Rudolph was addicted to the use of morphine, and these two men were acquainted each with the other, and each knew that the other was addicted to this use. Rudolph had never obtained any morphine from the defendant prior to this transaction. Rudolph had been arrested about two weeks prior to the 2d of April for the violation of this Narcotic Act. Previous to that arrest he had been convicted of a prior violation of the act, and had served a year and a day at Leavenworth. Clyde Lake was a narcotic inspector in the Internal Revenue Service of the United States. He had arrested Rudolph about two weeks before April 7, 1920. Rudolph testified that while he was thus under arrest Mr. Lake sent for him to meet him at Green Davenport's house; that they met there; that Lake told him that he would let him go if he would help him catch some of the law violators; that after they had talked this proposition over, and made an agreement between him and Lake and other officers of the government to catch Butts, he called the latter up on the telephone, told him he wanted some morphine, and Butts answered that he had none, and then Rudolph asked him if he could get an ounce, and how much it would be, and the defendant told him to call him the next day. He testified that he did not intend to use this ounce of morphine, but intended to get it so that the officers could arrest Butts, and he could be a friend of the officers; that the next day he called Butts again, and Butts told him he could get the morphine for $190; that Lake furnished Rudolph with the $190, and sent him to get the morphine, and as it was delivered by Butts to Rudolph the officers arrested Butts. Lake testified that the telephone calls and conversations of Rudolph with Butts were had when he was present with Rudolph; that he furnished the $190 and directed all the proceedings in which Rudolph took part. Butts testified that Rudolph called him on the telephone and asked him if he could get him some morphine; that Rudolph told him that he was sick and that his wife was sick (Rudolph denied that he told Butts of this sickness); and he (Butts) told Rudolph he could not get any, and he did not have any himself, and Rudolph replied that he would call again the next day; that Rudolph called him again the next day, and he told him he had no morphine; that Rudolph then asked him if he could not get him some off of somebody, and thereupon he did get a box of it of Joe Green, and arranged to meet Rudolph and deliver it to him; that he did not buy the morphine from Green, but was to give to Green just what he got from Rudolph for it. There was some other evidence in the case, but it was not material to the question under consideration.

When the entire evidence in this record is considered, it conclusively proved (1) that the defendant was not and never had been engaged in dealing in morphine, and that he never sold any of it to anyone before the transaction here in issue; and (2) that the conception of and the intention to do the acts which the defendant did in this matter did not originate in his mind or with him, but were the products of the fertile brains of the officers of the government, which they instilled into the mind of the defendant, and, by deceitful representations and importunities, lured him to put into effect.

It is not denied that, in cases where the criminal intent originates in the mind of the defendant, the fact that the officers of the government used decoys or truthful statements to furnish opportunity for or to aid the accused in the commission of a crime, in order successfully to prosecute him therefor, constitutes

But when the accused has never committed such an offense as that charged against him prior to the time when he is charged with the offense prosecuted, and never conceived any intention of committing the offense prosecuted, or any such offense, and had not the means to do so, the fact that the officers of the government incited and by persuasion and representation lured him to commit the offense charged, in order to entrap, arrest, and prosecute him therefor, is and ought to be fatal to the prosecution, and to entitle the accused to a verdict of not guilty. Peterson v. United States, 166 C. C. A. 509, 255 Fed. 433; United States v. Echols (D. C.) 253 Fed. 862; Sam Yick v. United States, 153 C. C. A. 96, 240 Fed. 65; Voves v. United States, 161 C. C. A. 227, 249 Fed. 192; Peoples v. McCord, 76 Mich. 200, 42 N. W. 1108, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 117; Woo Wai v. United States, 137 C. C. A. 604, 223 Fed. 414. There was ample, if not conclusive, evidence in this case to sustain a finding of the jury that this case fell under the latter rule. The defendant had never committed any such offense as the officers of the government arrested and prosecuted him for, prior to the time when they induced him to do the acts disclosed by this testimony. There is no evidence that he had ever contemplated, much less intended, to sell any morphine. He had never done so,—he had none to sell. The officers, through their agent, Rudolph, incited, lured, and persuaded him by false representations to go to a third person and get the morphine for his acquaintance, the officer's agent, and to consent either to sell it or to act as the agent of the party from whom he received it in the sale the officers betrayed him into.

The first duties of the officers of the law are to prevent, not to punish, crime. It is not their duty to incite to and create crime for the sole purpose of prosecuting and punishing it. Here the evidence strongly tends to prove, if it does not conclusively do so, that their first and chief endeavor was to cause, to create, crime in order to punish it, and it is unconscionable, contrary to public policy, and to the established law of the land, to punish a man for the commission of an offense of the like of which he had never been guilty, either in thought or in deed, and evidently never would have been guilty of if the officers of the law had not inspired, incited, persuaded, and lured him to attempt to commit it. It was fatal error to refuse to instruct the jury as requested, and it is unnecessary to discuss the other alleged errors at the trial, because, if they existed, they will probably not be committed again.

Let the judgment below be reversed, and let the case be remanded to the court below, with directions to grant a new trial.

is a crime regardless of the consent of anyone, the courts are agreed that if the criminal intent originates in the mind of the accused, and the criminal offense is completed, the fact that an opportunity is furnished, or that the accused is aided in the commission of the crime in order to secure the evidence necessary to prosecute him therefor, constitutes no defense. To the argument that the act is done at the instigation or solicitation of an agent of the government, the courts have responded that the purpose of the detective is not to solicit the commission of the offense, but to ascertain if the defendant is engaged in an unlawful business. Grimm v. United States (1895) 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470 (sending obscene matter through mails); Goode v. United States (1895) 159 U. S. 663, 40 L. ed. 297, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136 (stealing matter from mails).

Likewise it has been held to be no defense that detectives pretended to co-operate with the accused. People v. Ritchie (1895) 12 Utah 180, 42 Pac. 209 (criminal libel). See also Re Wellcome (1899) 23 Mont. 450, 59 Pac. 445 (bribery). So it is no defense that a person, acting as a decoy, furnished an opportunity for the commission of the offense.

Such conduct is held not to procure the offense to be committed, the theory being that the offender acts of his own volition, and is simply caught in his own devices. State v. Salisbury Ice & Fuel Co. (1914) 166 N. C. 366, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 216, 81 S. E. 737, Ann.

Cas. 1916C, 456, affirmed on rehearing in (1914) 166 N. C. 403, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 219, 81 S. E. 956, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 728 (false pretenses).

It has been said that where a person, acting as a decoy, merely furnishes an opportunity for the commission of the crime, and in no way procures its commission, the accused is not a passive instrument in the hands of the entrapping parties, but commits the crime voluntarily, with full knowledge of the subject and the consequences that flow therefrom. People v. Conrad (1905) 102 App. Div. 566, 92 N. Y. Supp. 606, affirmed in (1905) 182 N. Y. 529, 74 N. E. 1122 (abortion).

2. Criminal intent originating in mind of entrapping person.

Where the criminal intent originates in the mind of the entrapping person, and the accused is lured into the commission of the offense charged in order to prosecute him therefor, it is the general rule that no conviction may be had, though the criminality of the act is not affected by any question of consent.

Philippine Islands.—United States v. Phelps (1910) 16 Philippine, 440 (Narcotic Act violation).

In United States v. Echols (1918) 253 Fed. 862, the court said: "It is clearly the law that, while it may be true that the mere aiding of one in the commission of a criminal act by a government officer or agent does not preclude the conviction of the party committing the crime, yet, where the officers of the law have incited or induced the commitment of the crime, and lured the defendant on to its commission, the law will not authorize a verdict of guilty. . . . This rule does not proceed from or rest on any limitation of the right of the officers of the law to obtain evidence of crime in any manner possible, nor is it a defense to a prosecution that the officer participated in the commission of a crime, if the genesis of the idea, or the real origin of the criminal act, sprang from the defendant, and not from the officer. . . . But this statement in no manner authorizes government officers, employed to prevent crime and apprehend criminals, to thus conceive and set on foot the commission of an offense merely in order to make an arrest."

b. Where criminality of act is affected by question of consent.

In the case of those crimes into which enters as an essential element the violation of individual rights of persons, the situation is somewhat different. Here, it will be seen, the entrapment must not be under such circumstances as will amount to the consent of the person affected, or a necessary ingredient of legal guilt, the want of such consent, will be wanting, and the crime will not have been committed. The line of distinction seems to be whether there has been an active, as distinguished from a passive, inducement to the taking on the part of the person affected or his duly authorized agent; and where such active inducement can be shown, no conviction can be had.

Likewise, where the criminal design originates in the mind of the accused, it is no defense that the agent of the owner pretends to co-operate with the accused. *People v. Nor is it a defense that detectives pretend to co-operate in the execution of the criminal design, provided no act is done which, in law, amounts to the owner's consent to the taking. *People v. II. Particular crimes.

a. Abortion.

In a prosecution for an attempt to commit an abortion, it is no defense that the woman on whom the abortion was attempted deliberately entrapped the defendant into attempting to perform it, and caused his arrest while so engaged. People v. Conrad (1905) 102 App. Div. 566, 92 N. Y. Supp. 606, affirmed in (1905) 182 N. Y. 529, 74 N. E. 1122. In that case it appeared that a woman acting under the direction of the officers of a county medical society went to the defendant, a physician, and asked him to commit an abortion on her. The defendant agreed to do so and arrangements were made for the commission of the offense. Just as the defendant had prepared his instruments and placed the woman in a position convenient for their use, by a prearranged signal given by the woman, detectives entered and arrested him. The court, holding that the entrapment was no defense, said: "The conviction of the defendant was brought about by means of a trap arranged by the officers of the County Medical Society. It is claimed that, as the defendant was lured into the commission of the claimed overt acts, he cannot be punished therefor. This contention has recently been the subject of examination by this court and by the court of appeals, and decided adversely to the contention of the defendant. He was not a passive instrument in the hands of the entrapping parties. He did the act with which he was charged voluntarily, with full knowledge of the subject, and of the consequences which would flow therefrom. Under such circumstances, setting a trap by which he was caught is not a defense."

b. Bribery or offer to bribe.

Where the criminal intent originates with the accused, and he suggests or asks for a bribe, the fact that his request is acceded to for the sole purpose of obtaining the necessary evidence for his prosecution is no defense. People v. Bunkers (1905) 2 Cal. App. 197, 84 Pac. 364, 370; State v. Dudoussat (1895) 47 La. Ann. 977, 17 So. 585; Hummelshime v. State (1915) 125 Md. 563, 93 Atl. 990, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 1072 (conspiracy to demand bribe); People v. Liphardt (1895) 105 Mich. 80, 62 N. W. 1022. See also Re Wellcome (1899) 23 Mont. 450, 59 Pac. 445.

Thus, in People v. Liphardt (1895) 105 Mich. 80, 62 N. W. 1022, supra, wherein it appeared that the suggestion of willingness to take money was first made by the defendant, a member of the board of education, it was held to be no defense that the prosecuting witness encouraged another member of the board to advise the defendant that the witness would accept a proposition from the defendant to sell his vote, and that the witness informed the mayor of this, and they, with the police, made plans to entrap and detect the defendant in receiving a bribe paid by the witness for the sole purpose of so detecting the defendant. The court said: "We know of no case that holds that one who has committed a criminal act should be acquitted because induced to do so by another. It is merely when the criminality of the act is shown to be absent by the fact of the inducement that such proof justifies acquittal. . . . If the facts were shown as stated, the defendant cannot excuse the receipt of money as a consideration for promised official action, merely because he was solicited by Atcherson, even if it were done at the instigation of the officers of the city, who have no right to compromise public justice in any such way."

So, on the prosecution of a state senator for asking and receiving a bribe, the fact that, after the accused had offered to receive the bribe, a plot was formed to entrap him and other senators, has been held not to render inadmissible against the accused the testimony of those implicated in the entrapment. People v. Bunkers (Cal.) supra, wherein the court said: "The defendant stands convicted of one of the most dangerous crimes catalogued in the Penal Code. The murderer deprives an individual of life. The thief despoils a single citizen of property. The judge who forgets the sacred responsibility resting upon him can injure comparatively few by bartering his honor and violating his oath. But the venal legislator is a menace to the impartiality and probity of that system of law which is the palladium of all rights pertaining to citizenship, and the foundation stone of public safety and security. This crime is secret in its nature, and as baneful as it is insidious in its effects. The social fabric could not long survive if its frequent commission was tolerated, and hence the preservation of our institutions, and the integrity of our system of government, demand that any tendency in that direction be sternly and effectually checked. The offer to receive a bribe, if satisfied, must lead to consequences as serious as they are evident; while a rebuff to the bribe seeker gives rise to dangers born of resentment, which are scarcely capable of estimation. It is, therefore, highly important that a crime fraught with so much danger to the state, as well as to individuals, should be detected and punished. Recognizing the secrecy which usually attends its commission, the age and probable intelligence of those in a position to commit it, and the consequent difficulty of obtaining proof to bring the perpetrator to just punishment, it seems clear to us that a wise public policy must lend sanction to evidence obtained in the manner here assailed. No danger to the honest or innocent lurks in a rule upholding its competency under the circumstances here described. Honest lawgivers do not wait for or seek temptation, nor do they withhold proper official action until interested parties can be seen. True, neither the gravity of the crime nor considerations of public policy will warrant a departure from well-settled rules of evidence, but in this, as in most cases, public policy is seconded and sustained by law, for we believe this testimony was admissible under a rule of evidence long sanctioned by our highest court. The appellant was guilty of a crime when he asked for or offered to receive the bribe, and his acceptance of it neither added to his guilt nor to the penalty already entailed. Hence, the plan to 'entrap' him amounted to nothing more than procuring corroborative evidence essential to conviction. Such methods, under these circumstances, are not within the rule against encouraging crime, merely to procure its commission, to the end that those willing to become offenders may be punished. They fall within that other rule which justifies dissemblance in order to pro-

In State v. Dudoussat (1895) 47 La. Ann. 977, 17 So. 685, it was held to be no defense to the prosecution of a city councilman for receiving a bribe, that, after he had made a proposal to the prosecuting witness that, for $100, he would, in his official capacity as a councilman, procure him a permit to conduct a barroom, the witness and others arranged and carried out a plan to entrap the defendant by giving him marked money to the amount required, in the presence of other persons secreted as witnesses. The court said, however, that if the "trap" prepared and arranged to procure evidence had been an inducement offered and a temptation presented to commit the crime, the defendant should have been found not guilty.

The defense of entrapment is not available in a prosecution of public officials for a conspiracy to demand a bribe for their official action, the commission of the crime of bribery not being dependent on the want of consent of anyone. Hummelshime v. State (1915) 125 Md. 563, 93 Atl. 990, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 1072.

Similarly, where a public official is suspected of having received bribes, it has been held that an inducement to accept a bribe offered by a person seeking to entrap the accused, with a view to a prosecution, is no defense to a prosecution based on the acceptance of the offer. State v. Dougherty (1915) 86 N. J. L. 525, 93 Atl. 98, reversed on other grounds (as to which, see subdivision II. d, infra) in (1915) 88 N. J. L. 209, L.R.A.1916C, 991, 96 Atl. 56, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 950; State v. Diegle (1911) 21 Ohio Dec. 557, affirmed in (1912) 86 Ohio St. 310, 99 N. E. 1125; Com. v. Wasson (1910) 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 38.

"The principle evolved from the cases appears to be that, in a prosecution for an offense against the public welfare, such as accepting a bribe, the defense of entrapment cannot be successfully interposed; and this is so, when it appears that there was ground of suspicion or belief of the existence of official graft and a conspiracy by officials to obtain bribes, in which the persons caught were not the passive tools of the entrapping party, but knowingly received the bribe, especially since the persons entrapping them had no intention to participate in the wrong." State v. Dougherty (N. J.) supra.

To the same effect, see State v. Diegle (1911) 21 Ohio Dec. 557, affirmed in (1912) 86 Ohio St. 310, 99 N. E. 1125, wherein the court said: "It is a conceded doctrine in the philosophy of law that legislation involves pure ethics; that the exercise of the legislative duty is concededly of a purer type than even the judicial act. Though that is the sanctioned doctrine among the philosophers of the law, there are many of us who cannot acquiesce in its full statement. But, as the science of law places the legislative duty on such a high plane, it follows that the duty imposed upon the legislator cannot be considered obligatory primarily for individual benefit, as in property rights, but is solely and entirely for the benefit of the state and the whole people. There is but a very limited class of public officials who owe duties of a private and proprietary character. It is sufficient to state in this connection that the duty of the legislator is never private or proprietary, but always public, for the benefit of all the people. No persons or class of persons, nor any public official, can do any act towards compromising the public duty, or in any wise estopping the enforcement of the penalty of the law for the violation of such duty. There cannot be anything stronger than the unreported decision of Fox v. State, 53 Bull. 28, where the entrapment was at the direct instance and conduct of the prosecuting attorney, and the court, by refusing to entertain that case, where the error complained of was a charge that the entrapment was a defense, is a direct authority which this court is bound to follow. I confidently assert that the rules of law which have been announced by the various judicial pronouncements which constitute entrapment into crime a defense to its prosecution are limited to that class where individual right is primarily involved, and the penalty of the law imposed as a deterrent to crime."

In Com. v. Wasson (Pa.) supra, wherein it appeared that the defendant had been suspected of accepting bribes prior to his entrapment by a detective, the court said: "If there is any ground upon which the facts as to the part the detectives took in the formation of the conspiracy can be held to be a defense, it is upon the ground of public policy; and it is strenuously contended that an acquittal should have been directed for that reason. In general, one who has committed a criminal act is not entitled to be shielded from its consequence merely because he was induced to do so by another. There has been much discussion in the courts of this country and by the text-writers as to the relation of detectives to crime, and many of their methods have been severely denounced. A few exceptional cases can be found where, upon grounds of public policy, the courts have refused to sustain convictions because of the abhorrent methods adopted to lure the accused into crime. Upon the other hand, there are many cases wherein the courts, while in some instances condemning the methods employed by the detectives, have sustained the convictions, although the particular crime charged would not have been committed had it not been for the deceptions or subterfuges or the suppression of the truth resorted to by the detective. . . . Again, in considering the question of public policy, the clear distinction, founded on principle as well as authority, is to be observed between measures used to entrap a person into crime in order, by making him a criminal, to aid the instigator in the accomplishment of some corrupt private purpose of his own, and artifice used to detect persons suspected of being engaged in criminal practices; particularly if such criminal practices vitally affect the public welfare rather than individuals. Without declaring that, under no circumstances, ought the courts to direct an acquittal of a crime clearly proved, upon the ground that the accused was entrapped into it by immoral and illegal detective methods, we are quite clear that there is enough evidence that the purpose was to secure the conviction and punishment of those suspected to be engaged in criminal practices to bring this case within the second class above mentioned, and that the court did not err in refusing to direct an acquittal upon the ground of public policy."

Likewise, it is no defense to a prosecution for offering a bribe to a public officer, that the officer accepted the bribe for the sole purpose of prosecuting the defendant. Rath v. State (1895) 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 142, 33 S. W. 229; Davis v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 524, 158 S. W. 288, overruling O'Brien v. State (1879) 6 Tex. App. 665.

In Davis v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 524, 158 S. W. 288, supra, the court pointed out that the lack of any criminal intent on the part of the public official sought to be bribed could in no manner inure to the benefit of the accused, for the reason that the intent to bribe was complete, regardless of the motive of the officer in accepting the bribe. It was said: "The offer to bribe a public official is a transgression of a public right, and the consent or nonconsent of the officer cannot affect the criminality of the act of the person who makes the offer; and even though Mr. Wilson, by his words, acts, and conduct, may have been the inducing cause of the offer to bribe, yet, if appellant did, in fact, tender money to the officer with the intention and for the purpose of influencing his action as such officer, he would be guilty under our statute. It would not be an offense against Mr. Wilson, so much as an offense against the public welfare; and one which no officer would have the authority nor power to give his consent to. Therefore, we are of the opinion that the court erred in holding that, if Mr. Wilson induced appellant, by his words, acts, and conduct, to make a proposition to pay him so much money to influence his action as an official, and appellant did make the proposition under such circumstances, he would be guilty of no offense. However, under such circumstances, Mr. Wilson would, under the rules of evidence, be held to be an accomplice, and appellant could not be convicted upon his testimony alone, and the court should have instructed the jury that, if Mr. Wilson made the first proposition and induced appellant to make the tender, he would be an accomplice, even though he did not intend to accept the bribe, and by his acts was but seeking to entrap or detect appellant in the commission of an offense; and, under such circumstances, he must be corroborated in those facts which connected defendant with the commission of the offense, if an offense had been committed."

In People v. Bock (1910) 69 Misc. 543, 125 N. Y. Supp. 301, affirmed without opinion in (1911) 148 App. Div. 899, 132 N. Y. Supp. 1141, it was held to be no defense to a prosecution for the statutory crime of bribery of a representative of a labor organization, that the latter lied to and "bluffed" the defendants for the purpose of entrapping them. The court said that though the representative went further than laying a trap, and actually solicited the defendants to commit the crime, it would furnish no defense to them, since he was not a prosecuting officer, or other public official of any kind.

c. Burglary.

As to the defense of entrapment in the prosecution of other crimes, where the want of consent of the person affected is an essential element, see infra, II. n, v, w, y.

If a person committing a burglary is induced to do so by the person who will be affected by the act, or his duly authorized agent, to the end that he may be entrapped and apprehended, the entrapment is a defense to a prosecution for the burglary.

In Love v. People (1896) 160 Ill. 501, 32 L.R.A. 139, 43 N. E. 710, the court said: "Strong men are sometimes unprepared to cope with temptation and resist encouragement to evil when financially embarrassed and impoverished. A contemplated crime may never be developed into a consummated act. To stimulate unlawful intentions for the purpose and with the motive of bringing them to maturity, so the consequent crime may be punished, is a dangerous practice. It is safer law and sounder morals to hold, where one arranges to have a crime committed against his property or himself, and knows that an attempt is to be made to encourage others to commit the act by one acting in concert with such owner, that no crime is thus committed. The owner and his agent may wait passively for the would-be criminal to perpetrate the offense, and each and every part of it, for himself, but they must not aid, encourage, or solicit him, that they may seek to punish."

The rule heretofore stated is based on the reasoning that the owner of the premises, by his conduct, consents to the breaking and entering by the alleged burglar, whereas it is essential to the crime of burglary that the breaking and entering should be against the consent of the owner. Allen v. State (1867) 40 Ala. 334, 91

Am. Dec. 477; People v. McCord (1889) 76 Mich. 200, 42 N. W. 1106, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 117; State v. Goffney (N. C.); Speiden v. State; and Bird v. State (Tex.) supra.

In People v. McCord (1889) 76 Mich. 200, 42 N. W. 1106, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 117, the court said: "It would be a disgrace to the law if a person who had taken active measures to persuade another to enter his premises and take his property can treat the taking as a crime, or qualify any of the acts done by invitation as criminal. What is authorized to be done is no wrong in law to the instigator."

For the same reason, there can be no conviction for a conspiracy to commit a burglary between a person contemplating the crime and the owner of the building to be burglarized, or one who has undertaken to entrap him, and enters into the plan for that purpose. Woodworth v. State (1886) 20 Tex. App. 375.

So, it has been held that there was no burglary where the entry was instigated and participated in by one who acted with the knowledge and assent of the occupant of the building, as a decoy, for the purpose of apprehending the defendant, and the defendant relied on the other's statement that he was authorized to enter. Roberts v. Territory (Okla.) supra.

Nor can there be any burglary where the owner is connected with the original design to have his house broken for the purpose of having the defendant prosecuted therefor, and leaves the key of the house at a point agreed on with another, for the purpose of enabling him and the defendant to go into the house and unlock the door, the entry being with the owner's consent. Bird v. State (Tex.) supra.

In State v. Goffney (N. C.) supra, it appeared that the owner of a building, through a servant, induced the defendant to break into his store, and that the servant and the defendant entered the store together. It was held that the crime of breaking and entering was not committed, because of the proprietor's consent.

But in Johnson v. State (Tex.) supra, it was held that the subsequent consent of the owner to a burglary was no defense to a prosecution for a conspiracy to commit burglary. The fact of the conspiracy once being established, the subsequent consent of the owner, or his duly authorized agent, that the conspirators might enter the building, would not affect their guilt in the least, unless the evidence showed that the owner or his agent suggested the offense, or in some way created the original intent or agreement to commit the offense as charged.

Where the owner of a building, on being advised of the intended burglary, makes no effort to prevent it, but remains passive, and provides a force to secure the apprehension of the burglars, a conviction may be had.

Texas.—Robinson v. State (1895) 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 71, 53 Am. St. Rep. 701, 29 S. W. 40.

England.—Rex v. Chandler [1913] 1 K. B. 125, 82 L. J. K. B. N. S. 106, 108 L. T. N. S. 353, 77 J. P. 80, 29 Times L. R. 83, 57 Sol. Jo. 160, 23 Cox, C. C. 330.

Ireland.—Rex v. Bigley, 1 Craw. & D. C. C. 202.

In such a case, whether the facilitation of the offense amounts to a consent is a question for the jury. Thus, in State v. Jansen (1879) 22 Kan. 498, wherein it appeared that the owner knew of the intended burglary, and unlocked the door at 2 o'clock in the morning, but left it closed, the court upheld the refusal of the trial judge to instruct that the owner consented to the entry.

So, where the offense of burglary is instigated by a police officer, and the owner of the premises offers no active inducement to the burglary, the offense is not excused, as the owner does not consent thereto. State v. Abley (Iowa) supra.

Where the criminal intent to commit a burglary originates in the mind of the defendant, and he proposes to a third person to assist in it, and that person, seeking to entrap the defendant and secure his conviction, assents to the scheme and carries it out, the defendant cannot be convicted unless he participates in all the acts necessary to constitute the crime. People v. Collins (1878) 53 Cal. 185; State v. Hayes (1891) 105 Mo. 76, 24 Am. St. Rep. 360, 16 S. W. 514, overruled on another point in State v. Barton (1897) 142 Mo. 450, 44 S. W. 239; Reg. v. Johnson (1841) Car. & M. (Eng.) 218. Thus, in the case last cited, wherein it appeared that a servant opened the door to the defendants, it was held there was no burglary. And in State v. Hayes (1891) 105 Mo. 76, 24 Am. St. Rep. 360, 16 S. W. 514, supra, wherein it appeared that the defendant did not enter the building, the court said: "We find that defendant did not commit every overt act that went to make up the crime. He did not enter the warehouse, either actually or constructively; and hence he did not commit the crime of burglary, no matter what his intent was, it clearly appearing that Hill was guilty of no crime. To make defendant responsible for the acts of Hill, they must have had a common motive and common design. The design and the motives of the two men were not only distinct, but dissimilar; even antagonistic."

But where the defendant participates in all the acts necessary to constitute the offense, entrapment is no defense. Thus, in Rex v. Chandler (Eng.) supra, it appeared that the defendant suggested to the employee of a pawnbroker a plan by which the defendant might burglarize the shop, and the employee pretended to agree to the proposed scheme, but in fact informed the police authorities and his employer. Thereafter, acting under the instructions of the police, with the pretended object of assisting the defendant to carry out his scheme, the employee lent him the keys of the shop, of which the defendant made duplicates, and the defendant unlocked a padlock securing the outer door, and entered the shop, where he was arrested by police officers, who were keeping watch near by. It was held that there was no such assent on the part of the shop owner to the entry as would prevent the conviction of defendant of the offense of shop breaking. The court said: "In our opinion, although the prosecutrix may have been fully aware of what was going to be done, she did not assent to the breaking and entering of her premises by the prisoner for the purpose of stealing. The keys were only supplied to the prisoner by the servant of the prosecutrix in order that he might be detected in the commission of the offense; that did not make the servant an accomplice of the prisoner, nor make the breaking and entering lawful."

d. Conspiracy.

The cases involving the defense of entrapment as applied to a prosecution for conspiracy to commit a particular crime are collated in the subdivision dealing with that crime. See supra, II. b and c; also infra, II. p and w. They are here considered with reference to their bearing on the crime of conspiracy.

The decisions appear to warrant the generalization that, where the conspiracy charged is with the person who was acting for the purpose of entrapping the defendant, the defendant cannot properly be convicted of the offense of conspiracy (State v. Dougherty (1915) 88 N. J. L. 209, L.R.A.1916C, 991, 96 Atl. 56, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 950; Woodworth v. State (1886) 20 Tex. App. 375); but that where the conspiracy charged is with others, the fact that one entered into such conspiracy for the purpose of entrapping the conspirators (as in Johnson v. State (1878) 3 Tex. App. 593; Com. v. Wasson (1910) 42 Pa. Super. Ct. Rep. 38; Jung Quey v. United States (1915) 138 C. C. A. 314, 222 Fed. 766) does not preclude a conviction. But persons cannot be convicted of conspiracy if they merely adopt a scheme which is suggested to them by a detective, and which has received the approval of the owner of the property. Connor v. People (1893) 18 Colo. 373, 25 L.R.A. 341, 36 Am. St. Rep. 295, 33 Pac. 159.

In discussing the point, it was said in State v. Dougherty (N. J.) supra: "We think it is unnecessary to consider the very interesting and important question so ably discussed by counsel, whether it is a good defense to an indictment that the defendants were entrapped into the alleged criminal conduct by representatives of the state. Cases may be found where this defense was rejected, and others where it was held good. We limit our decision to the particular facts of this case. The charge is that there was a conspiracy to pervert the due administration of the laws relating to the municipal government of Atlantic City by corruptly passing an ordinance for bribes to be paid by Harris, a person interested in securing its passage. The indictment is not for bribery, but for conspiracy; and not for conspiracy among the defendants alone to sell their votes or to force 'Harris' to pay money. The charge is that the conspiracy was with 'Harris;' that he was to pay and did pay money. The conspiracy with 'Harris' as the prime mover and an essential party is not only the conspiracy charged in the indictment, but the conspiracy on which the state, in fact, relied at the trial. It was only that alleged conspiracy that made admissible, so far as it was admissible, the testimony as to interviews between 'Harris' and Phoebus on December 5, 1911, at which the two planned for the corruption of the other defendants. It was this conspiracy between 'Harris' and Phoebus into which the defendants are said to have come subsequently. The nature of the charge in the indictment relieves us from the necessity of considering the effect of entrapment by the state, which would confront us if the indictment were for a conspiracy by the defendants alone to sell their votes or to extort money as the condition of passing an ordinance introduced in good faith and meant to become effective legislation of the city. The question is the much simpler one, whether a conspiracy originated by 'Harris,' under employment of the law officers of the state, with Phoebus as either stool pigeon or go-between, for the well-meant purpose of testing the virtue of public officials and preventing injury to the public by exposing and bringing them to punishment if they proved corrupt, was a conspiracy to pervert the due administration of the laws relating to the municipal government of Atlantic City. If it was not, the defendants are not guilty as charged, however reprehensible their conduct and character may have been. Since the indictment charges but one conspiracy, and 'Harris' was a necessary party to the conspiracy proved, the prime mover therein, and the man who was to and did furnish the money, and since the conspiracy had no existence without him, the only conspiracy for which the defendants could be convicted is that organized by 'Harris.' Unless that conspiracy is criminal, the defendants are not guilty as charged. If it is criminal, 'Harris' is also guilty. To so hold, it would be necessary to hold that 'Harris's' act was a perversion of the due administration of the law. To avoid that absurdity, it is necessary to hold that the conspiracy was not a conspiracy to pervert the due administration of the law, as charged in the indictment. It was, in fact, an arrangement to secure the due administration of the law by demonstrating the readiness of the councilmen to be corrupted, in a made-up plan not meant to be executed, in order to prevent, by exposure, similar corruption in the genuine legislation of the city. Without the complicity of 'Harris' the conspiracy is not proved; with him it ceases to be a conspiracy to pervert the due administration of the laws, and is no crime. We are less reluctant to reach this result than we could otherwise be, for the reason that the state sought, by indicting the defendants for conspiracy, to make available statements made by 'Harris' and Phoebus in the absence of the other defendants, even before they had come into the conspiracy, and by Phoebus after the object of the conspiracy had been obtained. The state, having sought and obtained the advantage of an indictment for conspiracy, must in fairness be subjected to its disadvantages. It cannot be permitted, by splitting the single conspiracy in two, to say one was criminal and the other meritorious; that in one the councilmen alone were involved in the other 'Harris' was also a party, when the fact is that 'Harris' was a necessary party throughout. As the Supreme Court of the United States has recently said: 'The character and effect of a conspiracy are not to be judged by dismembering it and viewing its separate parts, but only by looking at it as a whole.' United States v. Patten (1913) 226 U. S. 525, 544, 57 L. ed. 333, 342, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 325, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141, 145. The case is analogous to the old case where a man arranged through a third party for a highway robbery to be committed upon himself, with a view to receiving a reward offered for the apprehension of highway robbers. It was held that the defendant could not be convicted, since the force requisite to constitute a highway robbery had not been used, the alleged victim having himself authorized it. M'Daniel's Case (1755) Fost. C. L. (Eng.) 121; Rex v. Fuller (1820) Russ. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 408. On an indictment for burglary, the entry was held not burglarious because made with assent of detectives, who were in the occupancy and control of a bank with the consent of the owners. 'This cannot be burglary,' said the court, 'in contemplation of law, however much the defendant was guilty in purpose and intent. Speiden v. State (1877) 3 Tex. App. 156, 30 Am. Rep. 126; Rex v. Johnson (1841) Car. & M. (Eng.) 218. On an indictment for bribery, where an officer first suggested his willingness to accept a bribe, and apparently joined the defendant in a criminal act suggested by the officer merely to entrap the defendant, the case was held not within the spirit of the Criminal Code.

O'Brien v. State (1879) 6 Tex. App. 665. In larceny, where the entrapment is by the owner or a detective, or by his agent, their participation takes away the essential element of a conversion against the will of the owner. Whart. Crim. Law, § 917. These cases were decided upon the ground that an essential element of the crime was absent. We do not approve the distinction attempted in the Ohio case of State v. Diegle (1911) 21 Ohio Dec. 557, a report of which was furnished by the prosecution, between an injury to a private citizen, as in the case of highway robbery, burglary, or larceny, and an injury to the public, as in the case of bribery. All crimes alike, under our modern legal theories, are crimes against the public, and all are classified as public wrongs by Blackstone."

In Woodworth v. State (1886) 20 Tex. App. 375, it was held that there could be no conviction for a conspiracy to commit a burglary between a person contemplating the commission of a burglary and one who had undertaken to entrap him, and had entered into the plan for that purpose.

In Com. v. Wasson (1910) 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 38, supra, it was held that members of the common council of a city were properly convicted of a conspiracy to cheat and defraud the city and to do other dishonest, malicious, and unlawful acts, to the prejudice of the city, and to do certain acts involving bribery of members of the council relative to the paving of the streets of the city, although it appeared that the conspiracy was formed in consequence of the representations of detectives that they were representatives of a lumber company, and desired to have streets designated for paving with wood blocks, in order to secure a market.

In Johnson v. State (1878) 3 Tex. App. 593, supra, it was held that the subsequent consent of the owner, or his duly authorized agent, that the conspirators might enter the building, was no defense to a prosecution for a conspiracy to commit burglary.

It is no defense to a prosecution for counterfeiting trademark labels that the offense was committed at the instance of the owners of the labels, and paid for with their money, where it was the purpose of the owners to ascertain if the accused was engaged in the business of counterfeiting their labels, and the accused was not employed to print the labels for the owners, but for the use of one apparently designing to perpetrate a fraud. People v. Krivitzky (1901) 168 N. Y. 182, 61 N. E. 175.

In Reg. v. Bannen (1844) 1 Car. & K. (Eng.) 295, 2 Moody, C. C. 309, wherein it appeared that, after an order had been given for the construction of dies from which shillings could be struck, the manufacturer receiving the order communicated the fact to the officers of the mint, who told him to proceed with the order, which was done, it was held that the entrapment was no defense.

As to the defense of entrapment in a prosecution for selling goods bearing counterfeit labels, see infra, II. k.

f. Criminal libel.

On a prosecution for criminal libel, it has been held to be no defense that the person libeled, having been informed and believing that the defendant designed to publish a libel, employed a detective to watch him and take every step to detect him if he committed the offense, and even to cooperate with him for that purpose, and to allow the crime to be committed, for the purpose of detecting and prosecuting the defendant, where the latter was not solicited to commit the crime. People v. Ritchie (1895) 12 Utah, 180, 42 Pac. 209.

g. Embezzlement.

The cases dealing with the crime of embezzlement are collated infra, II. n.

h. Espionage Act violation.

In Partan v. United States (1919) 261 Fed. 515, certiorari denied in (1920) 251 U. S. 561, 64 L. ed. 415, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 220, the defendants were convicted under one of several counts of an indictment which charged them with violation of § 3 of the Espionage Act (Act of June 15, 1917, 40 Stat. at

L. 219, chap. 30, as amended by Act of Congress of May 16, 1918, chap. 75, § 1, 40 Stat. at L. 553, Comp. Stat. § 10, 212c, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 122), providing, in part, as follows: "Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language about . . . the military or naval forces of the United States, . . . intended to bring . . . the military or naval forces of the United States . . . into contempt, scorn, contumely, or disrepute." The substance of the charge was that the defendants, with intent to violate the statute, gave away, sold, and distributed among certain persons, a book containing matter prohibited by the statute. It appeared that government agents purchased the books for the sole purpose of prosecuting the defendants, and the entrapment was alleged as a defense thereto. The court said: "It is true that the employees of the United States did inquire at the bookstore of the publishing company whether the book could be bought, and said they wanted to buy it; but there is evidence tending to show that the sales were made voluntarily by the clerks at the bookstore, and by the authority of defendants, and with their knowledge. We have had occasion before now to say that, if an officer of the law has reason to believe that a crime is being committed, he may proceed to ascertain whether those charged with the commission of the crime are actually committing it, or are otherwise criminally implicated. The detection of a crime in its commission is far from inducing the wrongdoer to commit the crime detected. The district court, in its charge to the jury, was very careful to protect the rights of the defendants by pointing out this distinction."

4. Extortion.

It is no defense to a prosecution for an attempt to commit the crime of extortion, that the person from whom the defendant sought to obtain money by threats, and who paid the money to the defendant, was, at the time, acting as a decoy of the police, and trying to induce the defendant to receive money from him under such circumstances as to render the defendant guilty of the crime, and enable the police to arrest and convict him of it. People v. Gardner (1894) 144 N. Y. 119, 28 L.R.A. 699, 43 Am. St. Rep. 741, 38 N. E. 1003, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 82.

5. False pretenses.

As to the defense of entrapment in a prosecution for using the mails to defraud, see infra, II. r.

It was held in State v. Salisbury Ice & Fuel Co. (1914) 166 N. C. 366, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 216, 81 S. E. 737, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 456, affirmed on rehearing in (1914) 166 N. C. 403, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 219, 81 S. E. 956, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 728, that a coal dealer who knowingly sold and delivered 1,750 lbs. of coke as a ton, and charged and received therefor the price of a ton, was guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses, notwithstanding the purchaser had a strong suspicion that the dealer was selling by short weight, and made the purchase for the sole purpose of entrapping the defendant, with a view to his prosecution, it being said that the purchaser merely furnished the opportunity for the commission of the crime.

In Rex v. Ady (1835) 7 Car. & P. (Eng.) 140, it was held to be no defense to an indictment for obtaining money under false pretenses that the one from whom it was obtained had laid a plan to entrap the defendant into committing the offense. In that case a clergyman, having received a letter purporting to have come from James Laurie, which promised valuable information for certain compensation, took the letter to the accused, who falsely represented himself to be the partner of Laurie and to be entitled to receive the money. The money was given him, and the information proved valueless. The trap seems to have consisted in showing the letter to the defendant, in order to give him an opportunity to claim the compensation, but in this respect the report of the case is not clear.

It is no defense to a prosecution for selling goods bearing counterfeit labels, that the purchaser, acting with a special agent of the owners of the labels counterfeited, knew that the labels on the goods purchased were counterfeits, and made the purchase for the purpose of proving the fact of sale by the defendant, and having him prosecuted. People v. Hilfman (1901) 61 App. Div. 541, 70 N. Y. Supp. 621.

As to the defense of entrapment in a prosecution for counterfeiting, see supra, II. e.

As to the defense of entrapment in a prosecution for selling liquor to a slave, see infra, II. y.

The great weight of authority supports the view that a person making an unlawful sale of liquor is not excused from criminality by the fact that the sale is induced for the sole purpose of prosecuting the seller.

Utah.—Salt Lake City v. Robinson (1912) 40 Utah, 448, 125 Pac. 657.

England.—Rex v. Titley (1881) London Law Times, July 30, 1881 (explained in note to Bates v. United States (1881) 10 Fed. 92).

As was said in Duff v. State (Ariz.) supra: "There is no law forbidding the employment of detectives to aid in the discovery and suppression of crime. Such a method is not inherently bad. Its credibility and weight are therefore for the consideration of the jury."

So, in Borck v. State (Ala.) supra, it was said: "The fact that Plunkett was an officer of the law can make no difference, since an officer could not, by giving his consent to the sale, any more justify the act on the part of the defendant than would be the consent of any private person."

Similarly, in Farley v. United States (Fed.) supra, wherein it appeared that all the officers did was to go to the tavern, and, while at their meals, order the waiter to serve them with some cough syrup, which was understood to be whisky, the court said: "The officers had nothing to do with furnishing the whisky, their only purpose being to ascertain whether or not the defendant was dealing in or dispensing drinks of the kind to his customers. That such deportment on the part of the officers does not constitute an entrapment that relieves the defendant from guilt has been recently decided by this court."

To the same effect, see Saucedo v. United States (1920) 268 Fed. 830, wherein the court said that the circumstance that the purchaser was a government agent did not preclude a conviction.

In Strother v. State (1916) 15 Ala. App. 106, 72 So. 566, the appellate court sustained the refusal of the trial judge to instruct that "if the jury believe from the evidence that the witness for the state sought to entrap the defendant into violating the law, they must acquit," saying: "It does not assert a correct principle of law. The mere fact that defendant yielded to the temptation and solicitation of a witness for the state is no justification for the commission of a crime. This is self-evident, and needs no recitation of authority."

In Salt Lake City v. Robinson (1912) 40 Utah, 448, 125 Pac. 657, it was held to be no bar to a prosecution for the illegal sale of liquor without a license that the sale was made to two police officers of the prosecuting city, who went to the defendant's store and asked to purchase the liquor, for the express purpose of obtaining the necessary evidence to prosecute the defendant. The court said: "While it may be conceded that the particular sale in question here would not have been made if the two officers had not asked to purchase the liquor, yet, in view of the facts and circumstances, the appellant was no more induced to make this sale than he would be induced to make any sale in his place of business. Moreover, the sale in question was seemingly only one of many that appellant was prepared to make. When the intoxicating liquor was called for by the officers, appellant seemed to have a stock of it on hand from which he could supply any reasonable demand. In case the officers had called for intoxicating liquor, and had been informed by appellant that he did not have it for sale, or that he did not keep it in stock, and in such event they had induced him to obtain some for them from someone else, which he did, and after it was so procured upon their solicitation he had sold them what he had procured, the case would be different. Here, however, the sale was freely and voluntarily made from a supply which apparently was on hand in appellant's store, and which could have been kept on hand only for the purpose of making sales to those who desired to purchase. While it is true that one sale constitutes the offense, yet it is clear that it was not the purpose of the officers to induce the appellant to make a sale for the sole purpose of convicting him of making that sale, but it seems their object was to obtain evidence from which it was made manifest that appellant was engaged in the illegal traffic of intoxicating liquors, and that they desired to break up such traffic. As public officers, who, under their oaths, were required to enforce the ordinances of the city, we cannot see wherein they offended against public policy or against good morals in seeking to obtain evidence against a willing offender against the law for the purposes aforesaid."

In State v. See (Iowa) supra, the court said: "The contention of defendant is that, even though the jury should find that defendant sold liquor to either of the state agents, that it was procured at their instance and request, and the fact that they were agents for the state, buying the liquor with money furnished or repaid by the state, then the state could claim no liability on the part of the defendant, because the crime of which defendant was charged was committed at the solicitation of and instigated by the state. The statutes referred to are, substantially, that the duty of such state agents is to aid in the capture, detention, arrest, and prosecution of persons committing crime or violating the laws of the state. We think there is no merit in this claim, because there is no evidence to show that the agents at the time in question improperly solicited the defendant to commit the acts. The transaction appears to have been the ordinary one of a person calling for a certain article and purchasing it. The purpose was to ascertain whether defendant was violating the law, and the acts of such agents in procuring testimony in this matter are no different from the act of a detective in procuring evidence. The holdings are that it is not a defense to a prosecution for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors to show that the purchase was made by a detective or hired informer. There is a clear distinction between inducing a person to do an unlawful act for the purpose of prosecuting him, and catching him in the execution of a criminal design of his own conception."

Likewise it is no defense that a decoy purchased the liquor at the instigation of the police. Stack v. State (1910) 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 1, 109 Pac. 126.

So it is no defense that the prosecuting witness had been given money by the sheriff with instructions to purchase liquor from the defendant, Simmons v. People (1921) — Colo. —, 199 Pac. 416.

In Excise Comrs. v. Backus (1864) 29 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 33, which was an action to recover a penalty for an unlawful sale of liquor, the court said: "The plaintiffs are in effect a corporation, and they represent in their action in this case the sovereign power of the state engaged in administering and enforcing its penal laws. The defendant is an alleged violator of the laws, whose detection and punishment it is for the public interest to secure. The mode the plaintiffs adopt to compass this is precisely that which the state or any of its functionaries, or any municipal body, resorts to when it offers a reward for the detection of crime, promises indemnity to a co-adjutor or co-conspirator, or presents pecuniary inducements to informers to testify, by agreeing to share with them the spoils of victory obtained through their aid. This has never been dreamed of as a good plea in bar to the maintenance of an indictment, or any action whatever, brought in behalf of the public authorities to punish crime or collect penalties imposed by law. . . . The mode adopted by the plaintiffs to bring to light the malfeasance of the defendant had no necessary connection with his violation of law. He exercised his own volition, independent of all outside influence or control. Even if inducements to commit crime could be assumed to exist in this case, the allegation of the defendant would be but the repetition of the plea as ancient as the world, and first interposed in Paradise: "The serpent beguiled me and I did eat." That defense was overruled by the great Lawgiver, and whatever estimate we may form or whatever judgment pass upon the character or conduct of the tempter, this plea has never since availed to shield crime or give indemnity to the culprit, and it is safe to say that, under any code of civilized, not to say Christian, ethics, it never will." See, to the same effect, Tripp v. Flanigan (1871) 10 R. I. 128.

But where the accused is lured into an unlawful sale of liquor by government officials, and is a mere passive instrument in their hands, the entrapment bars a prosecution, Peterson v. United States (1919) 166 C. C. A. 509, 255 Fed. 433; Smith v. State (1911) 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 328, 135 S. W. 154; Scott v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 57, 153 S. W. 871. See also United States v. Echols (1918) 253 Fed. 862; People v. Barkdoll (1918) 86 Cal. App. 25, 171 Pac. 440; State v. Feldman (1910) 150 Mo. App. 120, 129 S. W. 998.

In Scott v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 57, 153 S. W. 871, supra, wherein it was maintained that an inducement by an officer to effect an unlawful sale of liquor was unjustifiable, the court said: "The writer has had occasion heretofore to criticize the character and manner of inducing men to commit crime, as is evidenced by this record. This witness testifies, and is not uncontroverted or contradicted, that the sheriff agreed to give him $10 for each case he would 'turn in,' and additional money or compensation if a conviction should occur. The officers are not justified in inducing men to commit crime, or in employing others to induce them to commit crime, in order that prosecutions may be instituted. It is his duty as an officer, where he understands that parties are engaged in crime, to use every effort legitimate and permissible by law to detect and ferret out crimes and bring criminals to trial and justice. But this does not justify him in employing parties to go out and induce the citizens to commit crime that prosecutions may be instituted and carried on. We here call the attention of the legislature to such matters, and would suggest that appropriate legislation be enacted to prevent matters of this sort occurring."

And in Smith v. State (1911) 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 328, 135 S. W. 154, supra, the investigation of offenses against the liquor law was severely criticized, the court saying: "While it is entirely proper that officers should be diligent in ferreting out crime and violations of the law, yet it does not occur to us that the theory of our law is predicated upon the idea that parties should be induced to violate the law in order that a prosecution may be brought about. The machinery of the state should be put into operation to detect and punish crime, but not to organize and institute it. The prevention of crime

In State v. Feldman (Mo.) supra, the court said: "I hold that this defendant had no thought whatever of violating any law, had refused to do so, although solicited by the detective; and while the act of a sale to a minor is a violation and an offense, irrespective of any intent on the part of the seller, or knowledge on his part of the age of the ostensible buyer, the sale here made was the direct result of the act of these detectives, in laying a trap for the defendant, into which he fell, in appearance only violating the law. The principal witness for the prosecution, young Wein, testified: 'I have been engaged for two years in trying to get people to violate the law.' A person so acting is 'particeps criminis.' One entrapped by such means should not be held guilty. In brief, I do not think the sale, even if made to the minor, was, under the facts of the case, in violation of the law."

In People v. Barkdoll (1918) 36 Cal. App. 25, 171 Pac. 440, the court said: "Where a person is innocent of any intention to commit a crime, and is inveigled into its commission by an officer of the law for the purpose of advancing his standing for efficiency, or to obtain revenue by fine for the municipality, it might be said to uphold such practices would be repugnant to any just conception of good morals, and violative of sound public policy. But we have no such case here."

It was held in State v. Feldman (Mo.) supra, that the act of a father in sending his son into a saloon to purchase beer, not for beverage purposes, but solely for the purpose of securing evidence against the accused, was a defense to the crime of selling liquor to a minor, where it appeared that the father gave the money for the purchase to the son, who paid for the liquor in the saloon, and the saloon keeper put the beer in the rear of the witness's buggy, the theory being that the sale was made to the father, and not to the son. The court said: "The only debatable point is whether the son was a copurchaser,—whether the sale was to both of them, and hence to a minor as well as to a man of full age. Scrutinizing the testimony of the two Weins closely, without taking account of what defendant testified, it is apparent the father was the directing and ruling spirit in the transaction, and the boy was used as a decoy. He had the right to control his son, and there is no proof he had emancipated the boy, or given the latter his wages, which presumably went to the father. . . . The son was a lad not eighteen years old; the father had received money to use in their occupation of detectives for the Anti-saloon League, and had turned over part of it to his son; the father accounted for the beer bought of defendant in his report of expenses. He testified that when they arrived at St. Clements, he told his son to go in and get the beer; not as a beverage, but as evidence of selling to minors; told his son to get the defendant to sell to him (his son), as that would be selling to a minor, and if he did, that it would be a violation of the law. He testified further that he talked with his son when the two left defendant's store after the first visit, and they concluded to go back to St. Clements and try Feldman again. Young Wein testified he and his father agreed that he (the son) 'was the one to be pushed to the front to get him (defendant) to violate the law; and we had that agreement and that understanding between my father and myself.' We hold, on the evidence of the state, the beer was sold to the father, and not to the minor, within the meaning of the statute on which the information is founded, which, in our opinion, was not intended to create an offense on such facts as we have here. The facts show no violation of the statute, considering its spirit and purpose and the offense it was enacted to prevent; hence the judgment will be reversed and the defendant discharged."

In Colorado it is the rule that a city cannot recover a penalty for the unlawful sale of liquor where the violation was induced by the town or city, through one of its officers. Ford v. Denver (1898) 10 Colo. App. 500, 51 Pac. 1015; People v. Braisted (1899) 13 Colo. App. 532, 58 Pac. 796; Walton v. Canon City (1900) 14 Colo. App. 352, 59 Pac. 840; Wilcox v. People (1902) 17 Colo. App. 109, 67 Pac. 343. Compare People ex rel. Sterling v. Chipman (1903) 31 Colo. 95, 71 Pac. 1108; Plue v. People (1920) 69 Colo. 250, 193 Pac. 496.

In People v. Braisted (1899) 13 Colo. App. 532, 58 Pac. 796, supra, the court said: "It [the county court] simply held that the town could not recover a penalty for a violation of its ordinance, instigated and procured by its officer. It is entirely clear that the liquor, if it was purchased at all, was not purchased for the private use of any person. It was purchased to involve the seller in a violation of the ordinance, in order that the town attorney might be enabled to pursue him for a penalty. It was peculiarly the duty of Mr. Fairlamb [the town attorney], in view of the office which he filled, to uphold the ordinances of the town, and to discountenance their violation. But in this case we find him actively engaged in procuring the violation of an ordinance, even expending his own money for the purpose. So far as we can see, his only motive was to compel the victim to pay his money into the town treasury. It would be contrary to good morals to allow the plan to succeed. Public policy will not permit a municipality to derive profit from unlawful acts which are deliberately instigated and contrived by its officers. . . . To sustain this prosecution would be, in effect, to say that such officers have a license to inveigle citizens into the commission of offenses, to the end that money may be extorted from them."

So, in Ford v. Denver (Colo.) supra, wherein it appeared that the city was instrumental in procuring the sale of liquor, the court said: "It appears that the city was instrumental in procuring the sale of the liquor.

Its purpose was to lay the foundation for a suit in which a judicial opinion as to what would constitute a violation of the ordinance might be procured. Apparently this purpose was unknown to the defendant's clerk when he made the sale, and technically, at least, his act was contrary to the ordinance. But the city is in no position to say that its ordinance was violated. It was as much responsible for the sale of the liquor as the defendant, and it will not be permitted to replenish its treasury from penalties incurred at its instigation. It cannot be heard to complain of an act the doing of which is solicited. It is entitled, in a proper case, to have its ordinance construed, and questions concerning it determined, but it cannot manufacture a case for the purpose, or obtain the information it desires at the expense of a party for whose infraction of its ordinance it is responsible."

But in People ex rel. Sterling v. Chipman (1903) 31 Colo. 95, 71 Pac. 1108, wherein it appeared that a town attorney merely employed a detective to ascertain whether liquor was being sold in the town without a permit, and agreed to pay his expenses and certain sums for his services, and the detective thereupon gave to another person money with which the latter purchased the liquor on the sale of which a prosecution for a penalty was based, it was held that the town had not procured the violation of its ordinance so as to be estopped from asserting it. The court said: "A detective was employed by the town attorney of Sterling to ascertain if the said ordinance was being violated. The detective gave to the witness Peyton the sum of $1. With the money so given him by the detective, the witness bought the whisky. Three cases of the courts of appeals, namely, Ford v. Denver (Colo.) supra; People v. Braisted (1899) 13 Colo. App. 532, 58 Pac. 796; and Walton v. Canon City (1900) 14 Colo. App. 352, 59 Pac. 840, are cited by the defendant as sustaining the position. We do not regard the case of Ford v. Denver as applicable to the one at bar. The other two cases are more nearly in point. In these cases, witnesses were furnished money by the officers of the town, with instructions to buy liquor from the defendants, and the court held that the town treasury could not be replenished by fines from defendants who were induced to violate ordinances by persons who bought liquor with money furnished by the officers of the town. In the case here, the detective was employed by the town attorney for the purpose of ascertaining if the ordinances were being violated. The detective, and not the town attorney, procured the witness to buy the liquor, and it was the detective's money that was used for the purpose of buying liquor. Nor does the testimony show that any part of the money advanced the detective was to be used in the purchase of liquor, nor were instructions or directions given by the town attorney to the detective as to the purchase of liquor. The court found that, in employing the detective, the town attorney did not act in his official capacity, and in this case, at least, there appears to have been a legitimate effort to ascertain whether the ordinances were being violated, and not an attempt on the part of a town official to induce a violation of the ordinance for the purpose of replenishing the town treasury. We do not understand that the court of appeals has gone to the extent of saying that a municipal officer cannot employ persons to ascertain whether the ordinances are being violated, and that prosecutions cannot be supported by testimony procured in the way shown in this case; although, if carried to its logical conclusion, the doctrine announced in the two cases referred to might include this case. However, we are not prepared to announce as a doctrine that town attorneys are to be so handicapped in the performance of their duties that prosecutions may not be sustained by the testimony obtained in the manner the testimony in this case was obtained."

In Plue v. People (1920) 69 Colo. 250, 193 Pac. 496, it appeared that Klein, a police officer, arranged with one Woods "to get someone to bring" intoxicating liquor to the residence of J. W. Noon. Woods then went to Noon and asked him to procure some whisky for his (Woods's) friends. Thereafter Noon requested the defendant to bring liquor to his home. The defendant complied with this request, bringing to Noon's house two packages, each containing 12 pints of whisky. Klein and Schneider, another police officer, appeared at Noon's home as the friends for whom Woods acted. They were there when the defendant arrived with the liquor, and arrested him when he delivered the whisky to Noon. Holding there was no such entrapment or instigation as to prevent the defendant's acts from being criminal, the court said: "Noon never had any intention of entrapping the defendant. He was acquainted with him, and merely intended to buy the whisky for others, whom he did not suppose desired to entrap the defendant. There is no evidence that Noon or anyone else induced, or even encouraged, the defendant to violate the law. None of the witnesses for the state, so far as the record shows, had anything to do with the willingness of the defendant to sell, or to have in his possession for sale, intoxicating liquor. In addition to the whisky which he delivered to Noon, for which he expected to receive $45, the defendant had four more packages of liquor in the automobile in which he arrived at Noon's home. This was a circumstance, in addition to other facts herein mentioned, showing that the defendant was not incited, induced, or even encouraged to violate the law by reason of anything done by any officer or witness for the state."

Cases dealing with the illegal sale of liquor to Indians are grouped separately for the reason that the defense of entrapment, in this particular instance, is governed by a different principle. Many Indians are not distinguishable from Caucasians, and where the decoy purchaser cannot be so distinguished, the accused, assuming the sale to be otherwise valid, does not knowingly commit the act, the sale being innocent except for the status of the decoy. The case is unlike that of a person who knowingly sells intoxicating liquor where its sale to anyone is prohibited, for in such case the act is criminal regardless of the status of the buyer, and the decoy does not neutralize the criminal quality of the act. The rule, therefore, is well settled that where the decoy is one of concealed disability, the entrapment is a defense to the prosecution. United States v. Healy (1913) 202 Fed. 349; Voves v. United States (1918) 161 C. C. A. 227, 249 Fed. 191.

In United States v. Healy (Fed.) supra, the court said: "Decoys are permissible to entrap criminals, but not to create them; to present opportunity to those having intent to or willing to commit crime, but not to ensnare the law-abiding in unconscious offending. Where a statute, as here, makes an act a crime regardless of the actor's intent or knowledge, ignorance of fact is no excuse if the act be done voluntarily; but when done upon solicitation by the government's instrument to that end, ignorance of fact stamps the act as involuntary, and excuses, or at least estops the government from a conviction. In the former case the actor is bound to know the facts, and acts at his peril. In the latter case he is relieved of the obligation by the government's invitation, which is of the nature of fraudulent concealment and deceit, and, if not consent, yet doth work an estoppel. Though the seller has violated the statute, he was the passive instrument of the government, and his is a blameless wrong for which he cannot be justly convicted. . . . In the case at bar the act is innocent but for the status of the solicitor, and because he is a decoy of concealed disability, the act is blameless, and there is estoppel against conviction. Were it otherwise, honest men could easily be made felons. Many of the government's Indian wards are not distinguishable from Caucasians. Any purveyor of liquors, and anyone moved by hospitality to share thereof with guests, ignorant of their status, would unhesitatingly sell or give to them. As decoys in the service of government officers, what instruments of oppression they might be to men devoted to law, but ignorant of their disability! That the seller is suspected of voluntary like sales does not justify entrapping as here; for thereby a law-abiding person may as easily be ensnared. And the result proves nothing but overzeal, to put it mildly, of government officers. The practice cannot be tolerated, and a conviction for an offense so procured cannot stand."

To the same effect, see Voves v. United States (1918) 161 C. C. A. 227, 249 Fed. 191, wherein the court said: "Grant that the government may use a decoy to discover evidence of a committed crime of whatever nature; that, where one has the intent to commit a malum in se, or the willingness to do a malum prohibitum, a decoy may accompany the wrongdoer and even participate in the offense; that a liquor seller is guilty, despite his honest and reasonable belief respecting the age or race of the purchaser; and even that he must take his chance that a purchaser, who is not a government decoy, may wilfully deceive him by camouflage,—still the question remains: May the government maintain an indictment against a person for doing a malum prohibitum when the government's conduct has misled the person into believing that the prohibited act was a lawful act? In a civil transaction between citizens such conduct as the jury might have found in this case would create an estoppel which would preclude a suit based upon the suppressed truth. Is our government of the superman type that releases the ruler from the obligations of honesty and fairness that are imposed upon the citizens? Is one's liberty or reputation as a law-abider to have less protection than his property? We are strongly of the view that sound public policy estops the government from asserting that an act which involves no criminal intent was voluntarily done when it originated in and was caused by the government agents' deception."

"If, however, the decoy is one whose appearance, or otherwise, conveys knowledge of his disability, or is sufficient to put the seller on inquiry, any sale made is voluntary, establishes guilt, and warrants conviction. For in such case the seller is either of guilty intent, or negligent ignorance or recklessness, which relieves the government's participation of any taint of fraudulent concealment or deceit." See United States v. Healy (Fed.) supra.

So, in United States v. Amo (1919) 261 Fed. 106, wherein it appeared that two full-blooded Indians—strong, stalwart specimens of the race—were hired by government agents to purchase some liquor from the defendants, the entrapment was held to be no defense, the court saying: "In the present case, Indians visit a saloon and buy liquor from a person who is entirely ready and willing to sell to them, without any deceit or persuasion whatever. They simply approach the bar and say 'Whisky?' which may be the only English word they know (and, as one of the Indians said, that is enough to know). They merely gave defendant the opportunity to violate the law, without any persuasion to or deception of a willing lawbreaker, who knowingly and promptly furnishes the liquor, well knowing that whisky is the cause of most of the evils which beset the Indian, most of the crimes on Indian reservations, and that the government has sought in every possible way to keep the poison away from them."

3. Lottery tickets.

In People v. Noelke (1883) 94 N. Y. 137, 46 Am. Rep. 128, it appeared that a person bought a lottery ticket for the purpose of securing the conviction of the seller. The defendant did not rely on the entrapment as a defense, but did contend that the person who bought the ticket was an accomplice, on whose uncorroborated testimony a conviction could not be had. The court affirmed a verdict of guilty.

4. Narcotics.

This subdivision includes only cases of the unlawful sale of narcotics. Cases dealing with other violations of the Narcotic Act are collated infra, II. p.

It has been held that a physician or druggist who, at the solicitation of a person intending to commence a criminal prosecution, has sold or prescribed a narcotic, in violation of a statute, cannot set up as a defense the fact that he was induced to violate the law for the purpose of prosecution. Niswonger v. State (1913) 179 Ind. 653, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, 102 N. E. 135.

So, in Hyde v. State (1914) 131 Tenn. 208, 174 S. W. 1127, wherein it appeared that a physician, at the solicitation of a government officer, gave a prescription for morphine, in violation of a statute, the defense that the crime was induced by the government agent was declared to be unavailing. To the same effect, see Fiunkin v. United States (1920) 265 Fed. 1; Rothman v. United States (1920) 270 Fed. 31.

In the case last cited, the rule was stated to be that "when a government detective, suspecting that a person is engaged in an unlawful business, seeks information under an assumed name directly from him, and that person responds thereto, violating a law of the United States, he cannot, when indicted for the offense, set up that he would not have violated the law if the inquiry had not been made of him by the government official."

In Fiunkin v. United States (Fed.) supra, the court said: "The question presented for decision is whether the court erred in not directing a verdict for defendant, upon the ground and for the reason that the government officers lured and incited the defendant to commit the offenses with which he was charged. It is argued that the defendant was induced, through the machinations and instigation of the government officers, to commit the offense; or, in other words, that he was entrapped by such contrivance of the officers to do the thing which the law condemns. The evidence fails to show, however, that such was the case. The officers had nothing to do with the defendant's having the drugs in his possession. They had nothing to do with his willingness to sell the same for a consideration. They had nothing whatever to do with the conditions that prevailed prior to the time they sent the addict to the store to make the purchase, nor with the defendant's state of mind or purpose of action, should opportunity present itself, of dealing with the drug as a commodity for sale to those who were willing to buy. Nor did they offer any inducement to the defendant to sell, except that they did, through Collins, offer to buy, and proffered the amount of money that defendant fixed as the price he was willing to take. Nothing beyond this appears in the testimony. It is true that the defendant was entrapped by what was done to sell the drug to the government officers, and to put himself in a position of yielding up evidence of his commission of the offense. But this does not signify that the government officers lured him, or incited or induced him, to do what he would otherwise have done if any other addict had applied to him to purchase the drug. The case is not different from those where decoy letters have been sent through the mails to ascertain whether parties are indulging in unlawful practices."

In Chicago v. Brendecke (1912) 170 Ill. App. 25, a civil action by a city against a druggist to recover a penalty for a violation of the municipal code, prohibiting the sale of morphine, it was held that no such entrapment of the defendant by the police officers to make the sale in question as would prevent a recovery was shown by evidence that the purchaser had notified a police inspector that she could get morphine from the defendant, and the inspector told an officer to see if the witness could do it, whereupon the officer took the witness to the defendant's store, gave her money with which to make the purchase in question, and waited outside the store for her while she made the purchase, and received from her the envelop containing the morphine tablets purchased. The court said: "The police officers had no communication whatever with plaintiff in error prior to the sale of the morphine by him. They merely afforded him an opportunity to voluntarily and deliberately do what they had reason to believe he would so do, if opportunity offered."

But no conviction can be had where the accused is procured to make an unlawful sale of narcotics for the sole purpose of prosecuting him therefor. See the reported case (BUTTS v. UNITED STATES, ante, 143).

5. Obscene matter.

It is no defense to a prosecution for selling obscene printed matter that the purchase which formed the basis of the prosecution was made by a person in the employ of a society for the suppression of vice, for the express purpose of prosecution. Reg. v. Carlile (1845) 1 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 229.

1. Immigration law violation.

In Woo Wai v. United States (1915) 137 C. C. A. 604, 223 Fed. 412, it appeared that certain government officers persuaded and induced the defendant to commit the crime of bringing Chinamen across the Mexican border, not for the purpose of punishing the defendant for the crime, but for the purpose of forcing the defendant to reveal certain information concerning other violations of the immigration laws. The entrapment was held to be a good defense, the court saying: "We are of the opinion that it is against public policy to sustain a conviction obtained in the manner which is disclosed by the evidence in this case, taking the testimony of the defendants to be true, and that a sound public policy can be upheld only by denying the criminality of those who are thus induced to commit acts which infringe the letter of the criminal statutes. Some of the courts have gone far in sustaining convictions of crimes induced by detectives and by state officers. This is notably so of the decision in People v. Mills (1904) 178 N. Y. 274, 67 L.R.A. 131, 70 N. E. 786. But it is to be said, by way of distinguishing such cases from the case at bar, that in all of those cases the criminal intention to commit the offense had its origin in the mind of the defendant. Thus, in People v. Mills, it was the defendant who made the first suggestion looking toward the commission of the criminal act, and for the commission of that act the district attorney furnished him opportunity and lent him aid. In the case at bar, the suggestion of the criminal act came from the officers of the government. The whole scheme originated with them." To the same effect, see Sam Yick v. United States (1917) 153 C. C. A. 96, 240 Fed. 60.

It has been held to be no defense to a prosecution for sending obscene matter in interstate commerce that the purchase which formed the basis of the prosecution was made by a person for the express purpose of prosecution. Hanish v. United States (1915) 142 C. C. A. 216, 227 Fed. 584, writ of certiorari denied in (1915) 239 U. S. 645, 60 L. ed. 484, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 167. In that case it appeared that the defendant, in response to decoy letters sent by a government inspector, shipped certain obscene books, in violation of the Interstate Commerce Act. The court said: "The system of detecting crime by the use of decoy letters or decoy witnesses is necessary to the proper administration of criminal justice, and is in quite general use. It does not, of itself, excuse the offender, unless a constituent element of the crime be thereby removed. In cases of larceny, if the owner of the property, through a decoy, consents to the taking of the property by the accused, the element of trespass or tortious taking, essential to the offense of larceny, is absent, as explained in Love v. People (1896) 160 Ill. 501, 32 L.R.A. 139, 43 N. E. 710, and Topolewski v. State (1906) 130 Wis. 253, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 756, 118 Am. St. Rep. 1019, 109 N. W. 1037, 10 Ann. Cas. 627. In the case at bar, however, although defendant sent the books pursuant to the decoy letters, and sent them to a fictitious person, yet the gist of the offense still remained, which was the abuse of interstate commerce facilities to carry his obscene books."

As to the defense of entrapment in the prosecution of other crimes where the want of consent of the person affected is an essential element in the crime, see supra, II. c, and infra, II. v, w, and y.

Passive inducement to taking.

It is well established that where the criminal design originates with the accused, and the owner does not, in person or by an agent or servant, suggest the design or actively urge the accused on to the commission of the crime, the mere fact that the owner, suspecting that the accused intends to steal his property, in person or through a servant or agent, exposes the property, or neglects to protect it, or furnishes facilities for the execution of the criminal design, under the expectation that the accused will take the property, or avail himself of the facilities furnished, will not amount to a consent in law, even though the agent or servant of the owner, by his instructions, appears to co-operate in the execution of the crime; and the defense of entrapment is inapplicable.

In People v. Hanselman (Cal.) supra, the court said: "It is no doubt true, as a general proposition, that larceny is not committed when the property is taken with the consent of its owner; but it is difficult, in some instances, to determine whether certain acts constitute, in law, such 'consent.' And, under the authorities, we do not think that there is such consent where there is mere passive submission on the part of the owner of the goods taken, and no indication that he wishes them taken, and no knowledge by the taker that the owner wishes them taken, and no mutual understanding between the two, and no active measures of inducement employed for the purpose of leading into temptation, and no preconcert whatever between the thief and the owner. And some of the circumstances were present in all the cases cited by counsel for appellant." In that case it appeared that the town constable, for the purpose of detecting thieves, disguised himself and feigned drunkenness, and, at the time of the alleged larceny, was conscious and made no resistance thereto. It also appeared that the constable had no previous suspicion of the accused, and was surprised at his participation in the act.

So, in Sanders v. State (Tenn.) supra, it was held to be no defense to a prosecution for larceny that the owner made it known to the accused that he and his family would not be at home at a particular time.

Likewise, in Crowder v. State (Tex.) supra, it was held to be no defense to a prosecution for the theft of mules that the owner had employed a detective in order to catch the defendant, who, he believed, had been stealing his stock, and that the detective, by the direction of the owner, apparently encouraged the defendant's design and led him on, provided neither the owner nor the detective induced the original intent on the part of the thief,—though, if the intent and purpose to steal originated with, and were suggested by, the detective, it would be a taking with the consent of the owner, and the defendant would not be guilty.

In a prosecution for larceny it has been held not to be error to instruct the jury as follows: "If one person agree with another that the latter, with a third person, shall steal his, the former's property, this would not be larceny, for larceny cannot be predicated of a taking when a person consents to or agrees that his property shall be taken. But if, on the other hand, the original design or intent to steal is formed, and the prosecutor should find this out, and agree with another to so arrange matters as that the person who had formed such design to steal should be detected, then, if the design to steal, thus formed, be carried out, it would be larceny, although it might be the prosecutor's property that was taken." McAdams v. State (Tenn.) supra.

So, "where the owner has been notified of a design formed to steal his goods, which intent he did not originate or suggest, he may, in order to detect the thief, direct his servant or agent to encourage the design, and afford facilities for the completion of the crime; and . . . the facilities afforded under such circumstances will not affect the criminality of the thief." State v. Duncan (1844) 8 Rob. (La.) 562.

Where it appeared that the accused, in preparing to steal cotton from the prosecutor, applied to a third person for the use of a wagon; that the third person informed the owner, who told him to permit the accused to use the wagon, and to go with him, and to inform him (the owner), so that he could detect the accused in the commission of the crime; and that the accused drove to the owner's gin house, and went up to and placed his hands on the cotton, it was held that he was guilty of an attempt to commit larceny. Varner v. State (1884) 72 Ga. 745.

In People v. Smith (1911) 251 Ill. 185, 95 N. E. 1041, it was held that a person indicted for the larceny of postage stamps belonging to a corporation was not so encouraged or solicited to take the stamps as to prevent his conviction therefor, where postoffice inspectors, having arrested a person who had been obtaining stamps from the accused, arranged with this person and representatives of the corporation to obtain more stamps from the accused, which were marked and later found in the possession of the accused when arrested. The court said: "The criminal design and intent originated in the mind of [the defendant]. Neither the owner of the stamps nor its agents urged or advised the commission of the crime, but, suspecting the plaintiff in error, it took precautions to ascertain whether he would commit the offense. The law does not prohibit this being done. If it did, it would destroy one of the most effective agencies for the detection of crime."

So, there is no such consent on the part of a gold milling company, through its agents, to the taking of gold amalgam from its mill, as will prevent the taking from constituting larceny, where it appears that an employee, having been approached by conspirators with reference to their obtaining amalgam from the mill, reported this to the company, and, with its knowledge and approval, pretended to act as the accomplice of the thieves, and, in accordance with the arrangement with them, pretended to give one of them a signal when it was safe to take the amalgam, but did not persuade or induce the conspirators to take the property, or himself assist in the actual taking, and merely allowed the amalgam to be taken for the purpose of detecting the thieves. State v. Smith (1910) 83 Nev. 438, 117 Pac. 19.

Likewise, an owner does not consent to the commission of the crime of larceny where he hires a detective, who pretends to co-operate with the accused, for the purpose of detecting him in the commission of the crime. Pigg v. State (1875) 43 Tex. 108.

Nor is the consent of the owner given to the commission of the crime of larceny where he employs a detective to watch and apprehend the offender. Com. v. Nott (1883) 135 Mass. 269.

Active inducement to taking.

Where the owner, in person or by his duly authorized agent, suggests to the accused the criminal design, and actively urges, co-operates with, and assists the accused in the taking of the goods, such conduct amounts to a consent to the taking, and the criminal quality of the act is wanting.

England.—Reg. v. Lawrance (1850) 4 Cox, C. C. 438.

"The reason is obvious, viz.: The taking in such cases is not against the will of the owner, which is the very essence of the offense, and hence no offense, in the eye of the law, has been committed. The offender may be as morally guilty as if the owner had not consented, but a necessary ingredient of legal guilt is wanting." See United States v. Whittier (1878) 5 Dill. 35, Fed. Cas. No. 16,688.

In Topolewski v. State (Wis.) supra, a leading case on this subject, the court said: "We cannot well escape the conclusion that this case falls under the condemnation of the rule that where the owner of property, by himself or his agent, actually or constructively aids in the commission of the offense, as intended by the wrongdoer, by performing or rendering unnecessary some act in the transaction essential to the offense, the would-be criminal is not guilty of all the elements of the offense. Here Mr. Layer, acting for the owner of the property, packed or superintended the packing of the four barrels of meat, as suggested by the owner's agent in the matter, Dolan, and caused the same to be placed on the platform, knowing that the accused would soon arrive to take them, under an arrangement between him and its agent, and directed its platform boss, when he inquired as to the purpose of so placing the barrels, 'Let them go; they are for some man and he will call for them.' He, from the standpoint of such employee, directed the latter to deliver the barrels to the man when he called. . . . He substantially made such delivery, by treating the accused, when he arrived upon the scene, as having a right to take the property. In that the design to trap a criminal went a little too far, at least, in that it included the doing of an act in effect preventing the taking of the property from being characterized by an element of trespass. The logical basis for the doctrine above discussed is that there can be no larceny without a trespass. So, if one procures his property to be taken by another, intending to commit larceny, or delivers his property to such other, the latter purposing to commit such crime, the element of trespass is wanting, and the crime not fully consummated, however plain may be the guilty purpose of the one possessing himself of such property. That does not militate against a person's being free to set a trap to catch one whom he suspects of an intention to commit the crime of larceny, but the setting of such trap must not go further than to afford the would-be thief the amplest opportunity to carry out his purpose, formed without such inducement on the part of the owner of the property as to put him in the position of having consented to the taking. If I induce one to come and take my property, and then place it before him to be taken, and he takes it with criminal intent, or if, knowing that one intends to take my property, I deliver it to him, and he takes it with such intent, the essential element of trespass, involving non-consent requisite to a completed offense of larceny, does not characterize the transaction, regardless of the fact that the moral turpitude involved is no less than it would be if such essential were present. Some writers, in treating this subject, give so much attention to condemning the deception practised to facilitate and encourage the commission of a crime by one supposed to have such a purpose in view, that the condemnation is liable to be viewed as if the deception were sufficient to excuse the would-be criminal, or to preclude his being prosecuted,—that there is a question of good morals involved as to both parties to the transaction, and that the wrongful participation of the owner of the property renders him and the public incapable of being heard to charge the person he has entrapped with the offense of larceny. That is wrong. It is the removal from the completed transaction, which, from the mental attitude of the would-be criminal, may have all the ingredients of larceny, from the standpoint of the owner of the property, of the element of trespass or nonconsent. When such element does not characterize a transaction involving the full offense of larceny, so far as the mental purpose of such would-be criminal is concerned, is often not free from difficulty, and courts of review should incline quite strongly to support the decision of the trial judge in respect to the matter, and not disturb it except in a clear case. It seems that there is such a case before us. If the accused had merely disclosed to Dolan, his ostensible accomplice, a purpose to improve the opportunity, when one should present itself, to steal barrels of meat from the packing company's loading platform, and that had been communicated by Dolan to the company, and it had merely furnished the accused the opportunity he was looking for to carry out such purpose, and he had improved it, the situation would be quite different. The mere fact that the plan for obtaining the property was that of the accused, under the circumstances of this case, is not controlling. Dolan, as an emissary of the packing company, as we have seen, was sent to the accused to arrange, if the latter were so disposed, some sort of a plan for taking some of the company's property with the intention of stealing it. Though the accused proposed the plan, Dolan agreed to it, which involved a promise to assist in carrying it out, ostensibly as an accomplice, but actually as an instrument of the packing company. That came very near, if it did not involve, solicitation by the company, in a secret way, for the accused to take its property as proposed. With the other element added of placing such property on the loading platform, for the accused to take pursuant to the agreement, with directions, in effect, to the person in charge of the platform, to let the accused take it when he came for that purpose, we are unable to see any element of trespass in the taking which followed. . . . When one keeps in mind the plain distinction between merely furnishing opportunity for the execution of a formed design to commit larceny, and negotiations for the purpose of developing a scheme to commit the offense, regardless of who finally proposes the plan jointly adopted, and not facilitating the execution of the plan by placing the property, pursuant to the arrangement, where it can readily be taken, but, in practical effect, at least, delivering the same into the possession of the would-be thief, one can readily see that the element of trespass, involving consent, is present in the first situation mentioned, and not in the last, and that the latter pretty clearly fits the circumstances of this case."

In Connor v. People (Colo.) supra, which was a prosecution for a conspiracy to commit larceny, the court said: "We do not wish to be understood as intimating that the services of a detective cannot be legitimately employed in the discovery of the perpetrators of a crime that has been or is being committed, but we do say that when in their zeal, or under a mistaken sense of duty, detectives suggest the commission of a crime and instigate others to take part in its commission in order to arrest them while in the act, although the purpose may be to capture old offenders, their conduct is not only reprehensible, but criminal, and ought to be rebuked rather than encouraged by the courts."

In Williams v. State (1875) 55 Ga. 391, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 413, wherein it appeared that the agent of the property owner, acting under the owner's direction, actively co-operated with the accused to the extent of depriving the act of its criminality, the court said: "It seems to be settled law that traps may be set to catch the guilty, and the business of trapping has, with the sanction of courts, been carried pretty far. Opportunity to commit crime may, by design, be rendered the most complete, and if the accused embrace it he will still be criminal. Property may be left exposed for the express purpose that a suspected thief may commit himself by stealing it. The owner is not bound to take any measures for security. He may repose upon the law alone, and the law will not inquire into his motive for trusting it. But can the owner directly, through his agent, solicit the suspected party to come forward and commit the criminal act, and then complain of it as a crime, especially where the agent, to whom he has intrusted the conduct of the transaction, puts his own hand into the corpus delicti, and assists the accused to perform one or more of the acts necessary to constitute the offense? Should not the owner and his agent, after making everything ready and easy, wait passively, and let the would-be criminal perpetrate the offense for himself in each and every essential part of it? It would seem to us that this is the safer law, as well as the sounder morality, and we think it accords with the authorities."

Likewise, in McGee v. State (1902) — Tex. —, 66 S. W. 562, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 413, it was held that there was no larceny where a person acting as a detective, in order to catch cattle thieves, and having the consent of the owner to a taking, inaugurated and actively participated with the defendant in the thieving enterprise.

And in State v. Adams (1894) 115 N. C. 775, 20 S. E. 722, it was held to be error to instruct the jury that "if there was a previous intent to steal, the defendant would be guilty, notwithstanding the owner's agent had told a servant to go to the defendant's house and persuade him to come and steal the sack."

In State v. Hull (1898) 33 Or. 56, 72 Am. St. Rep. 694, 54 Pac. 159, the court said: "It appears from the uncontradicted evidence that the animal which they are charged to have stolen was taken, not only by the consent and passive acquiescence of the owner, but by his express direction, and upon the advice and with the active co-operation and assistance of his agent. There was no trespass committed in the taking, and there was no taking without his consent. Prescott, who was acting by his authority and under his direction, with full power to use the animal as he might see proper, was not only present at the time of the taking, but actively assisted in planning the whole affair, and in the perpetration of the acts necessary to constitute the crime. He assisted in rounding up the cattle, and driving them out of the county, by the express consent and authority of the owner. The property having been thus taken with the owner's consent, and by the active assistance of his agent, it makes no difference legally, although it does morally, that the defendants did not know of such direction and consent, and that they supposed and believed they were stealing the property in fact. The case upon this point is no different in principle from what it would have been had the owner, instead of acting through Prescott, acted in person, and himself assisted the defendants in rounding up and taking the animal in question, the defendants not knowing him to be the owner, but believing him to be a thief and a confederate of theirs. In such case it would not be seriously contended that the defendants were guilty of larceny in taking an animal belonging to their supposed confederate, and no more can such a contention be maintained on this record. It follows that, however morally guilty the defendants may have been, their conviction is not justified by the evidence, nor warranted by the law."

Since, in larceny, there must be a criminal taking from the actual or

constructive possession of the owner, the absence of this element constitutes a defense to the crime although the offender may have had the felonious intent to steal. Thus, in People v. Jenkins (1918) 210 Ill. App. 42, a witness for the state testified that, having been called to the house of the prosecuting witness on one or two occasions in regard to missing articles of value, and suspecting the plaintiff in error, he suggested that a dollar bill be placed on the floor of the dining room, in order to ascertain whether she would take it when she swept the floor, which was done, and the dollar disappeared. It was held that the crime of larceny had not been committed. The court said: "Section 167 of chap. 38 of the Criminal Code (Jones & A. ¶ 3792) defines larceny as follows: 'Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking and carrying, leading, riding or driving away the personal goods of another. Larceny shall embrace every theft which deprives another of his money or other personal property. . . . Private stealing from the person of another, and from a house in the daytime, shall be deemed larceny.' In the instant case, even if we assume the extremest claim on the part of the people, the one dollar bill was merely taken by the plaintiff in error from the floor and placed in the box, where it was subsequently found. At no time was it taken from the premises, and, therefore, out of the possession of the owner. Even if felonious intent existed and the purpose of the plaintiff in error was to steal the bill when she left the premises that day, it does not follow that because it was shown that the bill was taken from the floor of the room and put into the box, standing in some other part of the premises, as it was shown, the plaintiff in error was guilty of larceny. There must be a taking from the actual or constructive possession of the owner. . . . We are further of the opinion that the evidence did not show, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the property was taken by the plaintiff in error from the floor and placed in a box, where it was subsequently found, with a felonious intention. As neither taking, within the meaning of the law, nor a felonious intent, was shown, the judgment will be reversed." To the same effect, see Kemp v. State (1850) 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 320.

It seems that the rule that no larceny is committed where the owner or his agent actively assists in the taking is limited to privately owned property, for it has been held that where the property of the state is delivered by anyone under any circumstances, to any person, for the purpose of having him steal it, there is a trespass and the attempt is a crime. People v. Mills (1904) 178 N. Y. 274, 67 L.R.A. 131, 70 N. E. 786, affirming (1904) 91 App. Div. 331, 86 N. Y. Supp. 529, wherein the court said: "We are asked to protect the defendant, not because he is innocent, but because a zealous public officer exceeded his powers and held out a bait. The courts do not look to see who held out the bait, but to see who took it. When it was found that the defendant took into his possession the property of the state with intent to steal it, an offense against public justice was established, and he could not insist as a defense that he would not have committed the crime if he had not been tempted by a public officer whom he thought he had corrupted. He supposed he had bought the assistant district attorney when he handed over the money, but he knew he had not bought the state of New York, and, hence, that the assistant had no right to give him its property for the purpose of enabling him to steal it."

o. Manufacture of explosives.

In Koscak v. State (1915) 160 Wis. 255, 152 N. W. 181, wherein it appeared that the defendant was prosecuted for the violation of a statute regulating the manufacture and use of explosives, it was held that the act of a detective or other person in originating and instigating the commission of the crime constituted a good defense. The court said: "The statement in State v. Currie (1905) 13 N. D. 655, 69 L.R.A. 405, 112 Am. St. Rep. 687, 102 N. W. 875, is a just rule to govern persons engaged in such transactions: 'The authorities almost unanimously hold that a detective may aid in the commission of an offense in conjunction with a criminal, and that the fact will not exonerate the guilty party. Mere deception by the detective will not shield the defendant, if the offense be committed by him free from the influence or instigation of the detective. The detective must not prompt or urge or lead in the commission of the offense.' This rule is approved in the adjudications of different courts as a proper one in the administration of the criminal law. The question was a proper one for the consideration of the jury under the evidentiary facts and circumstances adduced on the trial, and the court's attention was directed thereto by the defendant's requested instruction. True, the court informed the jury that they must be satisfied affirmatively that defendant intended to and did the acts required under the instructions given to constitute guilt, but the jury were not informed that if the detectives prompted, urged, or originated the perpetration of these offenses, or that they intimidated the defendant and thereby became the active parties to instigate and perpetrate the offense charged, and that the defendant, under the facts and circumstances of the case, was only a passive participant in the crime charged, then he was not guilty."

p. Narcotic Act violation.

The unlawful sale of narcotics is treated supra, II, k, 4.

In Jung Quey v. United States (1915) 138 C. C. A. 314, 222 Fed. 766, it was held that where government detectives permitted a person to transport opium for the purpose of ascertaining whether the accused was engaged in its illegal importation, the defense of entrapment was not available. The court upheld the action of the trial judge in refusing an instruction that if "the quartermaster, Matthaei, took any opium prepared for smoking purposes from the steamship China on January 30, 1914, while she was in the port of San Francisco, and that he did so with the permission of the government, through its duly authorized officers, . . . that such opium was not being unlawfully transported after its importation, and the receipt of such opium by any person thereafter, from said quartermaster, was not an unlawful act, and therefore cannot be considered by you as an unlawful act done in pursuance of the conspiracy, as alleged in the indictment, and such testimony cannot be considered by you as establishing in any degree the guilt of any of the defendants of the conspiracy as alleged in the indictment."

In United States v. Phelps (1910) 16 Philippine, 440, reversing a judgment convicting the defendant of having smoked opium on a certain occasion, in violation of the law, which judgment rested solely on the testimony of a single witness, who was secretly acting as an employee of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the court said: "According to the statements made by the witness Smith, he not only suggested the commission of this crime, but he (Smith) also stated that he desired to commit the same offense, and would pay his part of the expense necessary for the commission of the prohibited act. Such conduct on the part of a man who is employed by the government for the purpose of taking such steps as are necessary to prevent the commission of the offense, and which would tend to the elevation and improvement of the defendant, as a would-be criminal, rather than further his debasement, should be rebuked rather than encouraged by the courts; and when such acts as those committed by the witness Smith are placed beside the positive testimony of the defendant, corroborated by the Chinaman and the doctor, the testimony of such witness sinks into insignificance and certainly does not deserve credit. When an employee of the government, as in this case, and according to his own testimony, encourages or induces persons to commit a crime in order to prosecute them, such conduct is most reprehensible. We desire to be understood that we base our conclusions as to the conduct of the witness Smith and the incredibility of his testimony on his own acts, according to his own testimony. We are therefore of the opinion, and so hold, that the appellant is not guilty of this crime. The judgment of the lower court is reversed and the appellant acquitted."

q. Passing forged instrument.

An indictment for disposing of and putting away forged bank notes cannot be defeated by showing that the notes were purchased by persons who knew at the time that the notes were forged, and procured them at their own solicitation, as agents of the bank, for the very purpose of bringing the offenders to justice. Rex v. Holden (1810) 2 Leach, C. L. 1019, Russ. & R. C. C. 154, 2 Taunt. 334, 127 Eng. Reprint, 1107, 11 Revised Rep. 600.

r. Postal Law violation.

1. Sending nonmailable matter.

In a prosecution for using the mails for the purpose of sending nonmailable matter, it is no defense that the mails were so used at the instance of an officer of the government, who acted for the purpose of detecting, and not procuring, the commission of the crime. United States v. Duff (1881) 19 Blatchf. 9, 6 Fed. 45 (information concerning lotteries); Bates v. United States (1881) 11 Biss. 70, 10 Fed. 92 (obscene matter); United States v. Moore (1883) 19 Fed. 39 (information concerning lotteries); United States v. Slenker (1887) 32 Fed. 691 (obscene matter); Grimm v. United States (1895) 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470 (obscene matter); Rosen v. United States (1896) 161 U. S. 29, 40 L. ed. 606, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 434, 480, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 251 (obscene matter); Andrews v. United States (1896) 162 U. S. 420, 40 L. ed. 1023, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 798 (obscene matter); Price v. United States (1897) 165 U. S. 311, 41 L. ed. 727, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 366 (obscene matter); Ackley v. United States (1912) 118 C. C. A. 403, 200 Fed. 217 (information concerning prevention of conception); Kemp v. United States (1914) 41 App. D. C. 539, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 825, writ of certiorari denied in (1914) 234 U. S.

756, 58 L. ed. 1579, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 675 (information concerning abortion). Compare United States v. Whittier (1878) 5 Dill. 35, Fed. Cas. No. 16,688; United States v. Adams (1893) 59 Fed. 674 (information concerning prevention of conception).

In Grimm v. United States (1895) 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470, supra, the court said: "It does not appear that it was the purpose of the postoffice inspector to induce or solicit the commission of a crime, but it was to ascertain whether the defendant was engaged in an unlawful business. The mere facts that the letters were written under an assumed name, and that he was a government official,—a detective, he may be called,—do not of themselves constitute a defense to the crime actually committed. The official, suspecting that the defendant was engaged in a business offensive to good morals, sought information directly from him, and the defendant, responding thereto, violated a law of the United States by using the mails to convey such information, and he cannot plead in defense that he would not have violated the law if inquiry had not been made of him by such government official. . . . The law was actually violated by the defendant; he placed letters in the postoffice which conveyed information as to where obscene matter could be obtained, and he placed them there with a view of giving such information to the person who should actually receive those letters, no matter what his name; and the fact that the person who wrote under these assumed names and received his letters was a government detective in no manner detracts from his guilt."

So, in Andrews v. United States (1896) 162 U. S. 420, 40 L. ed. 1023, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 798, supra, it was held to be no defense that the obscene letters were sent in answer to letters written under an assumed name by a government detective, for the sole purpose of obtaining evidence from the defendant on which to base the prosecution.

And on the authority of the Andrews Case (U. S.) supra, it was held in Price v. United States (1897) 165 U. S. 311, 41 L. ed. 727, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 366, that it was no defense to a prosecution for the mailing of obscene publications that they were sent to the government inspector who instigated the prosecution, in response to decoy letters written by him for the purpose of discovering whether the defendant was engaged in violating the law, and asking the defendant to send the obscene matter through the mails.

In United States v. Duff (1881) 6 Fed. 45, the court denied the contention that the trial judge erred in refusing to direct an acquittal on the ground that the circular in question was incapable of delivery, being addressed to a fictitious name, and therefore not within the scope of the statute creating the offense, saying: "Letters addressed to fictitious names are not incapable of delivery, as this case shows. Moreover, the statute says nothing about delivery. It deals with mailing and sending to be mailed. The words are: 'No letter or circular concerning lotteries . . . shall be carried in the mail. Any person who shall knowingly deposit or send anything to be conveyed by mail in violation of this section shall be punished,' etc. The case shows that a letter containing a circular concerning a lottery was deposited in the mail. The jury found that the defendant deposited the letter with intent to have it conveyed by mail. The finding was justified by the evidence, and it brought the defendant within the scope of the statute. The letter was none the less a letter deposited in the mail for the purpose of being conveyed by mail, because at the place to which it was conveyed it was delivered to a person who was corresponding under a fictitious name. Nor does it make any difference in the act done by the defendant that the person to whom the letter was delivered was an officer of the United States. The refusal to direct an acquittal was therefore correct."

In United States v. Whittier (1878) 5 Dill. 35, Fed. Cas. No. 16,688, it appeared that the defendant deposited a letter in the mail giving information as to where an article designed to prevent conception could be obtained, the letter being in answer to a decoy letter written by a government agent. It was held that the use of a fictitious address by the agent was a complete defense, the letter being incapable of delivery in the due course of the mails, and hence not within the statute. The court said: "The facts in the case now under consideration show that the defendant is as morally guilty as if the letter he was answering had been written by a person seeking the prohibited information, and not by a detective. But I am of the opinion that these facts do not clearly bring the case within the particular clause of the statute on which the indictment is founded. The indictment charges that the defendant knowingly deposited in the mail a letter giving information where, how, and of whom an article or thing designed and intended to prevent conception could be procured. This was in answer to a fictitious letter of inquiry. The letter written and mailed by defendant was addressed to a person who had no existence. On its face it did not show that it was within the prohibited statute. If it had been suffered to go through the mail to the place to which it was addressed, it would not have been called for, but would have been sent to the dead-letter office, and could not have given to any person the prohibited information. The defendant doubtless intended to give the inhibited information, but the statute does not apply to a letter merely intended by the writer to give such information, but to a letter 'actually' giving the information. If a letter of inquiry seeking the prohibited information had been written by an actual person, although under a feigned name, an answer in reply, giving such information, would present a case distinguishable, it would seem, from the one under consideration. I place my judgment in this case upon the simple ground that the sealed letter written by the defendant, addressed to a person who had no existence, and which on its face gave no information of the prohibited character, and which is brought within the statute only by the fictitious letter of inquiry written by a detective, is not the 'giving of information' within the meaning of the statute. At all events, it is not certain that Congress intended to punish such an act; and therefore, upon the principle above mentioned, that criminal statutes are not to be extended by judicial construction to cases not clearly and unmistakably within their terms, my judgment is that this prosecution, on the admitted facts, cannot be sustained. It is a case of clear moral guilt, but not of legal criminality. There is no legal crime committed, although the defendant did not know of the fact which deprived his act of its criminal quality." To the same effect, see United States v. Adams (1894) 59 Fed. 674. The section of the penal law under which the two foregoing cases arose has since been repealed, the change being designed to perfect the law so that its provisions could not be evaded. See 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 791, 792.

It is no defense to a prosecution for stealing or embezzling a letter containing money, that it was addressed to a fictitious person, and mailed for the purpose of detecting a suspected person. United States v. Cottingham (1852) 2 Blatchf. 470, Fed. Cas. No. 14,872; United States v. Foye (1853) 1 Curt. C. C. 364, Fed. Cas. No. 15,157; United States v. Wight (1889) 38 Fed. 106, affirmed in (1890) 134 U. "A decoy letter is not subject to the criticism frequently properly made in regard to other measures sometimes resorted to, that it is placing temptation before a man, and endeavoring to make him commit a crime. There is no temptation by a decoy letter. It is the same as all other letters to outward appearance, and the duty of the carrier who takes it is the same. The fact that it is to a fictitious person is, in all probability, entirely unknown to the carrier, and, even if known, is immaterial. Indeed, if suspected by the carrier, the suspicion would cause him to exercise particular care to insure its safety, under the belief that it was a decoy." Scott v. United States (1899) 172 U. S. 343, 43 L. ed. 471, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209.

"The purpose of the statute is that all mailable matter intrusted to any of the employees, officers, or agents in the postal service shall, without any interference with it, save that required in its necessary transportation, be conveyed from the place where it is delivered to the officers, agents, and employees of the mail service to the point of destination, by the first practicable means; and any unauthorized interference with such mail matter, and its safe and speedy transportation, is a gross breach of trust, if done by any of such employees or agents, and to prevent which was the purpose of Congress in the enactment of the statute. The evidence shows that this package and contents were duly placed in the possession of the postmaster at Greenwood, and by him delivered to defendant, as the postal clerk, to be by him carried in the mail, as other mail matter, to be delivered to the transfer agent in Jackson, just as were other packages of the same kind. This is admitted by the defendant. And the package was so carried and delivered; that is, the package and the letter conveyed in it were so carried and delivered, and not intercepted by the inspectors until after the delivery to the transfer agent at Jackson. As to what was done after this is not embraced in the present inquiry. The uncontroverted facts shown by the proof, in my opinion, establish the fact that the letter and certificate inclosed in the registered envelop were intended to be conveyed in the mail on that route, within the meaning of the statute, and that it is no defense to the defendant that the purpose was to give him an opportunity to rifle its contents, if he saw proper to do so, though this was the only purpose of its being placed in his possession. This position, I am satisfied, is maintained by both authority and reason. The question, in nearly all the cases relied upon by defendant's counsel, was as to whether or not the letters or mail matters were intended to be placed in the mail for transportation, and therefore they do not apply to the facts in this case; and, so believing, I feel constrained to overrule the motion of defendant to peremptorily instruct the jury to return in his favor a verdict of not guilty." United States v. Dorsey (1889) 40 Fed. 752, followed in United States v. Bethea (1891) 44 Fed. 802.

"If the word 'letter' were given the technical construction of a written message or communication from one person to another, it would strike at the whole system of decoy or test letters, none of which contain bona fide communications. This would render it practically impossible to detect thefts and embezzlements by employees, since, in a large majority of cases, the letters and their envelops are thrown away or destroyed for the very purpose of preventing their being identified in case the employee is arrested; and the contents of the letter, which it is ordinarily impossible to identify, only are abstracted. If, however, the contents can be identified, as they always are in test letters, by a private mark put upon them, the discovery of such contents upon the person of the employee affords almost conclusive evidence of the theft of the letter in which they are inclosed. It makes no difference with respect to the duty of the carrier, whether the letter be genuine or a decoy, with a fictitious address. Coming into his possession as such carrier, it is his duty to treat it for what it appears to be on its face,—a genuine communication; to make an effort to deliver it, or, if the address be not upon his route, to hand it to the proper carrier, or put it into the list box. Certainly he has no more right to appropriate it to himself than he would have if it were a genuine letter. For the purposes of these sections a letter is a writing or document, which bears the outward semblance of a genuine communication, and comes into the possession of the employee in the regular course of his official business. His duties in respect to it are not relaxed by the fact or by his knowledge that it is not what it purports to be,—in other words, it is not for him to judge of its genuineness." Goode v. United States (1895) 159 U. S. 663, 40 L. ed. 297, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136.

In Ennis v. United States (1907) 83 C. C. A. 478, 154 Fed. 842, it appeared that a postoffice superintendent discovered a misboxed letter, which had been placed in a "dead" pigeonhole at the top of the case, where the accused, a clerk, was engaged in sorting mail. The letter was removed and handed to a postoffice inspector, who took it to the addressee, and, without delivering it, obtained permission to open it. He then returned to the postoffice, unsealed the letter, and took from it an express order for $2, a statement of account, and a letter from the sender of the money order. After making a copy of the letter, he placed it in the envelop with two marked one-dollar bills, and forwarded the money order and the statement to the addressee. The envelop containing the letter and bills, having been duly sealed, was returned to the dead pigeonhole, and a short time thereafter was embezzled by the defendant. It was held that the letter, at the time it was returned by the inspector to the dead pigeonhole, had not ceased to be mail matter, and that the defendant was therefore properly convicted.

But in United States v. Rapp (1887) 30 Fed. 818, it was held that a letter, prepared by an inspector and delivered to the superintendent of the mailing department, and placed by the superintendent in a "nixes" basket, not with the intention that it should be taken through the postoffice and delivered to any person, but with the intention that in or about the basket where it was so placed it should be torn open by a suspected person, was not "intended to be conveyed by mail," within the meaning of the statute, and that the defendant could not be convicted. The court said: "I do not hold that what is called in the testimony in this case a 'decoy' or 'test' letter, or the contents thereof, might not, when regularly mailed, be the subject of embezzlement, and punishable under these sections. But I think it should get into the mail in some of the ordinary ways provided by the postal authorities, and become fairly and reasonably part of the 'mail matter' under control of the postal authorities."

It is a question for the jury whether a letter is intended to be conveyed by the mail or by the letter carrier, and in a case where a person has been convicted of embezzling a letter and valuable property in a letter passing through the regular course of the mail and the hands of the letter carrier, the court will not inquire into the motives with which the letter was put into the mails, even though the object was to detect or entrap the party in his criminal practices. Re Wight (1890) 134 U. S. 136, 33 L. ed. 865, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 487. See also United States v. Matthews (1888) 1 L.R.A. 104, 35 Fed. 890.

In England, a paper put into the postoffice with a fictitious address is held to be a post letter within the meaning of the postal laws. Reg. v. Young (1846) 2 Car. & K. (Eng.) 466, 1 Den. C. C. 194, 2 Cox, C. C. 142, overruling Reg. v. Gardner (1845) 1 Car. & K. (Eng.) 628.

But where the decoy letter does not come into the defendant's hands in the regular course of the postoffice business, no conviction can be had. Reg. v. Rathbone (1841) Car. & M. (Eng.) 220, 2 Moody, C. C. 242; Reg. v. Shepherd (1856) 2 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 96, Dears. C. C. 606, 25 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 52, 4 Week. Rep. 237.

In the Canadian case of Rex v. Ryan (1905) 9 Ont. L. Rep. 137, 4 Ann. Cas. 875, it appeared that the accused was a letter carrier in the city of Toronto, and that the letter in question was a decoy letter, written by an official in the postoffice, and addressed to a person within the district in which it was the duty of the accused to carry and deliver letters. The letter was postmarked, though not with the stamp of the Toronto office. It did not appear by whom this was done, or whether the duty of stamping was confined to a single official. It was handed by the writer to the superintendent of the letter sorters in that office, with instructions to have it placed among other letters intended to be delivered by the prisoner. It was handed by him to a letter sorter, who, in the performance of his usual duties in sorting and distributing letters to be handled by the letter carriers, placed it in the usual place with others which the prisoner was to take up, carry away, and deliver, and the prisoner, in the course of his duty, took it with the rest, but, instead of delivering it, opened it and stole the money which had been placed therein. Affirming a conviction, the court said: "The first point urged by counsel for the prisoner was that the letter in question was not a 'post letter.' In support of this proposition two English cases were cited: Reg. v. Rathbone and Reg. v. Shepherd (Eng.) supra. There can be no doubt that these cases in several respects closely resemble the present. It is necessary, however, to compare the English Postoffice Act, in force when they were decided, with our own. In the former (1 Vict. chap. 36, § 47) it is enacted that a 'post letter shall mean any letter or packet transmitted by the post under the authority of the Postmaster General, and a letter shall be deemed a post letter from the time of its being delivered to a postoffice to the time of its being delivered to the person to whom it is addressed.' Our act, 1 Edw. VII. chap. 19, § 1, reads: 'The expression "post letter" means any letter transmitted by the post or delivered through the post, or deposited in any postoffice, or in any letter box put up anywhere under the authority of the Postmaster General, whether such letter is addressed to a real or a fictitious person or not, and whether it is intended for transmission by the post or delivery through the post or not; and a letter shall be deemed a post letter from the time of its being so deposited to the time of its being delivered to the person to whom it is addressed, or so long as it remains in the post-office or in any such letter box, or is being carried through the post.' In the Rathbone Case the decoy letter was, in the momentary absence of the prisoner, placed by the writer, an assistant inspector, in a heap of letters which the prisoner was about to sort. The report of the judgment on this point is very meager, being contained wholly in the following words of Baron Parke: 'The objection was that it was not a post letter, or a letter put into the post; and the judges are unanimously of opinion that that objection must prevail, the statute only applying to letters put into the post in the ordinary way.' The judgment is explained by Willes, J., at p. 53 of 25 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S., where he says: 'Reg. v. Rathbone shows that to make a man liable, the letter must have come into his hands in the ordinary course of the postoffice.' In Shepherd's Case the letter was written by one inspector, who gave it to a second inspector, who gave it to a third, who locked it up over night, and in the morning gave it to a fourth person, who surreptitiously mixed it with letters which the prisoner was about to sort. In neither of these cases did the letter in question come into the hands of the prisoner in the regular way, or from any person authorized to deliver it to him, or to handle it at all. In the Shepherd Case, Dears. C. C. at p. 611, Pollock, C. B., says: "The person who first received the letter was not entitled to receive it, and he handed it to a person who was not entitled to take it; in fact, no one received the letter who was authorized so to do." Willes, J., says on the same page: "The letter in this case was not put into the post in the ordinary way, nor does it appear that any person who received it was justified in receiving it." On the other hand, the letter in question in the present case was received by the accused in the ordinary way at his wicket, where it was placed by Humphries, a sorter, in the regular course of his duties. It is unnecessary for us to decide when it became a post letter. If written by Henderson in his own postoffice building, and delivered there to Stoddard, it may be that it did not become a post letter until deposited in the postoffice proper with Humphries. It is sufficient that it became a post letter, at the latest, when it came into the hands of Humphries, and continued to be such until stolen by the accused. It can scarcely be seriously argued that if the inspector or the postmaster, or any other official in the postoffice building, wishes to post a letter, it is necessary that it should be carried outside and thrust through the aperture provided for the general public in order to make it a post letter within the meaning of the act."

3. Using mails to defraud.

As to the defense of entrapment in a prosecution for obtaining money or goods under false pretenses, generally, see supra, II. j.

Where the defendant is suspected of using the mails to defraud, it is no defense that the crime was committed in response to a decoy letter, sent by an agent of the government for the purpose of ascertaining whether the defendant is so engaged. Goldman v. United States (1915) 135 C. C. A. 625, 220 Fed. 57, affirming (1913) 207 Fed. 1002; Freeman v. United States (1917) 156 C. C. A. 133; 248 Fed. 353, Holsman v. United States (1918) 160 C. C. A. 271, 248 Fed. 193, writ of certiorari denied in (1919) 249 U. S. 600, 63 L. ed. 796, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258.

"It is contended that the writing and mailing of the letters which are set out in the indictment were not criminal, and do not constitute crimes, for the reason that the letters were solicited by the United States post-office inspectors in letters written by them and sent through the mails to Dr. Jordan as decoy letters, that the government officers initiated the crime, and that the case is thereby brought within the principle of the decisions of this court in Woo Wai v. United States (1915) 137 C. C. A. 604, 223 Fed. 414, and Sam Yick v. United States (1917) 153 C. C. A. 96, 240 Fed. 60. The ruling in each of the cases so referred to was based upon the ground that the government officers had suggested the crime and induced its commission, and that the offense did not have its origin in the mind of the accused. The distinction between those cases and the case at bar is plain. Here the accused was suspected of being engaged in using the mails in a scheme to defraud. It was to ascertain whether such was the case, and not to suggest the commission of a crime which otherwise would not have been committed, that the decoy letters were written. The case comes clearly within the doctrine of Grimm v. United States (1895) 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470." Freeman v. United States (1917) 156 C. C. A. 133, 248 Fed. 353.

the court said: "The objection urged by counsel in their brief is to the effect that the letters were admitted without showing that they were received at the office of the defendant Freeman, and that certain replies, purporting on their face to come from his office, were received by the postoffice inspectors who caused the decoy letters to be sent. It was stipulated between the government and the defendants Freeman and Holsman that these letters were received, through the postoffice department, at the office of Freeman, and that the replies were transmitted through the mail from said office, and nothing was left for the determination of the court except the competency thereof as evidence fit to go to the jury. That the letters were competent is beyond question. The inspectors in no way became parties to the alleged conspiracy in sending the decoy letters. Their course was adopted simply for the purpose of ascertaining whether the law was being violated by the defendants, which resulted in obtaining pertinent evidence tending to show such violation of the law."

In Goldman v. United States (Fed.) supra, it appeared that a government inspector, in order to detect the defendant, who had been suspected of using the mails to defraud, answered an advertisement by the defendant, and succeeded in getting sufficient evidence to support a prosecution against him. The court sustained the conduct of the inspector, but intimated that, had his conduct been such as to induce rather than to detect a crime already planned, the conduct would not have been justified.

s. Practice of dentistry without license.

On a prosecution for practising dentistry without a license, it is no defense that the prosecuting witness went to the office of the defendant and had him fill a cavity in his tooth, and paid him for the service, with a view to prosecuting him therefor. State v. Littooy (1909) 52 Wash. 87, 100 Pac. 170, 17 Ann. Cas. 292.

Div. 402, 127 N. Y. Supp. 98, affirmed in (1911) 201 N. Y. 570, 95 N. E. 1136, it was held to be no defense to a prosecution for having committed the statutory crime of knowingly receiving money for and on account of procuring and placing women in the custody of another person, for immoral purposes, that a trap was laid for the defendant, and that the principal witness, in whose custody the women were placed, did not intend to, and did not in fact, make use of them for immoral purposes, the defendant having, in fact, knowingly received the money, having knowingly procured the women, and having intended to deliver, and having delivered, them for immoral purposes.

But in State v. Mantis (1920) 32 Idaho, 724, 187 Pac. 268, wherein it appeared that the accused had merely acquiesced in the suggestion of the prosecuting witness, acting at the instance of the district attorney, that the accused cohabit with her illegally, it was held that the criminal design had originated in the mind of the witness, and that the entrapment deprived the act of its criminality. The court said: "Entrapment into the commission of a crime is not a defense in the sense of a justification or excuse for an act which otherwise would be criminal, but it resolves itself into a question of whether the accused committed any crime. If the criminal design originated with him, or if he intentionally committed or carried out his own criminal purpose, whether it originated with him or not, at the suggestion of another person, the fact that someone other than the accused facilitated the execution of the scheme, or that an officer appeared to co-operate with him, will not be a defense. . . . In this case there is no evidence that the appellant originated the criminal design of which he was accused and convicted, or that he wilfully and with criminal intent attempted to carry out the crime of which he was convicted after it was suggested to him. The money was given only after its payment was suggested by the woman, and, after she had stated that she preferred to live with appellant for immoral purposes, the appellant merely acquiescing in her suggestion. The case falls clearly within the rule, and there is no evidence to sustain the verdict."

In State v. McCornish (1921) — Utah, —, 201 Pac. 637, reversing a conviction of pandering, the defendant, who was employed as a bell boy in a hotel, having, according to the state's evidence, at the solicitation of a policeman who had procured a room at the hotel, sent a prostitute to his room, the court said: "If the defendant in this case had been engaged in some unlawful business or enterprise, as was the case in State v. Robinson, 40 Utah, 448, 125 Pac. 657, and an officer had merely, in the course of defendant's business, asked him to deal with such officer as he dealt with others, the case would be entirely different. The defendant in this case, was, however, not carrying on, either directly or indirectly, an unlawful business or enterprise; but he, as we construe the evidence, was by the officer requested and induced to do an act constituting a crime, which he would not have done but for the inducement of the officer. The officer thus induced the defendant to do what he would not have done but for such inducement."

a. Pure Food and Drug Act violation.

In United States v. Morgan (1910) 181 Fed. 587, reversed in (1911) 222 U. S. 274, 56 L. ed. 198, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81, on other grounds, a prosecution for sending a misbranded shipment of water, branded "spring water," in interstate commerce, in violation of the Pure Food and Drug Act, the fact that the defendant was induced to act by a detective intending to prosecute him was declared to be immaterial.

In United States v. Eman Mfg. Co. (1920) 271 Fed. 353, it appeared that the prosecuting witness failed to induce the accused to violate the Pure Food and Drug Act by shipping a misbranded medicinal preparation to a druggist, who ordered it at the instance of a government agent, but that the agent later induced the accused to send him the preparation. It was held that the second attempt was a procurement of the commission of the crime, and that the entrapment was a defense. The court said: "The stipulation does not disclose that the defendant here has ever sent 'Sulfox' in interstate shipment other than the two bottles to Eaton in response to his letter. Eaton's failure to induce the defendant to violate the statute by shipping to the druggist, his letter to the defendant, the absence of facts as a basis from which he could believe or suspect that the defendant had, on other occasions, violated the statute, and the stipulation, cause me to reach the conclusion that he wrote the letter to the defendant, not for the purpose of discovering violations, but with the intention and purpose of inducing the defendant to violate the statute; and that on these facts Grimm's Case is not an authority in support of the prosecution, and that, in the interests of a sound public policy, the defendant should be found not guilty, and discharged."

As to the defense of entrapment in a prosecution for a violation of the Interstate Commerce Act, see supra, II. m.

v. Receiving stolen property.

As to the defense of entrapment in the prosecution of other crimes where the want of consent of the person affected is an essential element of the crime, see supra, II. c, n, and infra, II. w and y.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen property it is a defense that the property was offered to the accused, with the consent of the owner, for the purpose of entrapment, for the receipt, to constitute such a crime, must be without the authority of the owner. United States v. De Bare (1875) 6 Biss. 358, Fed. Cas. No. 14,935; People v. Jaffe (1906) 185 N. Y. 497, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263, 78 N. E. 169, 7 Ann. Cas. 348; State v. Waghalter (1903) 177 Mo. 676, 76 S. W. 1028, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 283; Reg. v. Dolan (1855) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 449, Dears. C. C. 436, 3 C. L. R. 295, 24 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 59, 1 Jur. N. S. 72, 3 Week. Rep. 177, overruling Reg. v. Lyons (1841) Car. & M. (Eng.) 217; Reg. v. Schmidt (1866) 10 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 172, 35 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 94, L. R. 1 C. C.

15, 12 Jur. N. S. 149, 13 L. T. N. S. 679, 14 Week. Rep. 286; Reg. v. Hancock (1878) 14 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 119, 38 L. T. N. S. 787; Reg. v. Vilensky [1892] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 597, 61 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 218, 5 Reports, 16, 41 Week. Rep. 160, 56 J. P. 824.

In People v. Jaffe (1906) 185 N. Y. 497, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263, 78 N. E. 169, 7 Ann. Cas. 348, the court said: "The proof clearly showed, and the district attorney conceded upon the trial, that the goods which the defendant attempted to purchase on October 6th, 1902, had lost their character as stolen goods at the time when they were offered to the defendant and when he sought to buy them. In fact, the property had been restored to the owners and was wholly within their control, and was offered to the defendant by their authority and through their agency. The question presented by this appeal, therefore, is whether, upon an indictment for receiving goods, knowing them to have been stolen, the defendant may be convicted of an attempt to commit the crime where it appears without dispute that the property which he sought to receive was not in fact stolen property. The conviction was sustained by the appellate division chiefly upon the authority of the numerous cases in which it has been held that one may be convicted of an attempt to commit a crime notwithstanding the existence of facts unknown to him which would have rendered the complete perpetration of the crime itself impossible. Notably among these are what may be called the pickpocket cases, where, in prosecutions for attempts to commit larceny from the person by pocket picking, it is held not to be necessary to allege or prove that there was anything in the pocket which could be the subject of larceny. . . . In passing upon the question here presented for our determination, it is important to bear in mind precisely what it was that the defendant attempted to do. He simply made an effort to purchase certain specific pieces of cloth. He believed the cloth to be stolen property, but it was not such in fact. The purchase, therefore, if it had been completely effected, could not constitute the crime of receiving stolen property, knowing it to be stolen, since there could be no such thing as knowledge on the part of the defendant of a nonexistent fact, although there might be a belief on his part that the fact existed. As Mr. Bishop well says, it is a mere truism that there can be no receiving of stolen goods which have not been stolen. 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 1140. It is equally difficult to perceive how there can be an attempt to receive stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, when they have not been stolen in fact. The crucial distinction between the case before us and the pickpocket cases, and others involving the same principle, lies not in the possibility or impossibility of the commission of the crime, but in the fact that, in the present case, the act which it was doubtless the intent of the defendant to commit would not have been a crime if it had been consummated. If he had actually paid for the goods which he desired to buy, and received them into his possession, he would have committed no offense under § 550 of the Penal Code, because the very definition in that section of the offense of criminally receiving property makes it an essential element of the crime that the accused shall have known the property to have been stolen or wrongfully appropriated in such manner as to constitute larceny. This knowledge being a material ingredient of the offense, it is manifest that it cannot exist unless the property has in fact been stolen or larcenously appropriated."

viction, saying: "The moral turpitude of a receiver under such circumstances may be as great as in case the property comes directly from the hands of the thief, because the criminal intent on his part exists equally in both cases. But to create the offense which the law punishes, the property, when received, must, in fact, and in a legal sense, be stolen property. If these stamps were received by the defendant, they did not, when received, upon the proof made, bear this character. They had been captured from the thief by the owner, and the act of forwarding them to the alleged receiver was the act of the owner." To the same effect are Reg. v. Schmidt (1866) 10 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 172, 35 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 94, L. R. 1 C. C. 15, 12 Jur. N. S. 149, 13 L. T. N. S. 679, 14 Week. Rep. 286, and Reg. v. Villensky [1892] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 597, 61 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 218, 5 Reports, 16, 41 Week. Rep. 160, 56 J. P. 824.

So, in State v. Waghalter (1903) 177 Mo. 676, 76 S. W. 1028, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 283, it appeared that a detective, acting for a railroad company, persuaded a third person to convey a box of clothing, which was taken from the railroad company by the detective, and delivered by him to the third person for conveyance, to the accused, who was suspected of receiving stolen goods, for the purpose of entrapping him with a view to a prosecution. It was held that since there had been no felonious intent connected with the original taking, there was no larceny, and consequently the accused could not be guilty of the crime of receiving stolen property, although the third person who delivered the clothing to the accused believed it to be stolen.

In Reg. v. Dolan (1855) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 449, it appeared that the stolen goods were found in the pocket of the thief by the owner thereof. The owner sent for a policeman and the three went together towards the defendant's shop, where the thief had previously sold stolen goods. The policeman then gave the goods to the thief and he was told by the owner to go to the shop and sell them. The thief did so and turned the proceeds over to the owner. It was held that the purchaser was not guilty of receiving stolen goods. The court said: "I feel strongly that this conviction is wrong. I do not see how it can be supported, unless it could be laid down that, if at any period in the history of a chattel once stolen, though afterwards restored to the possession of the owner, it should be received by anyone with a knowledge that it had been stolen, an offense would be committed within the statute." To the same effect is Reg. v. Hancock (1878) 14 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 119, 38 L. T. N. S. 787, following Reg. v. Dolan (Eng.) supra.

w. Robbery.

It is a defense to a prosecution for robbery that the crime was instigated by the person robbed, for the purpose of entrapping the accused, as it is an element of the crime of robbery that it shall be committed without the consent of the victim. So, if the property is parted with, not because of force or intimidation, but solely for the purpose of prosecuting the person taking the property, robbery is not committed. Rex v. Fuller (1820) Russ. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 408. See also State v. West (1900) 157 Mo. 309, 57 S. W. 1071; Tones v. State (1905) 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 363, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 122 Am. St. Rep. 759, 88 S. W. 217, 13 Ann. Cas. 455.

But a person who knows that a robbery is contemplated against him may remain passive, and take steps to prevent the commission of the crime and apprehend the would-be robbers, without being held to have consented to the offense. State v. West (Mo.) and Tones v. State (Tex.) supra; State v. Piscoineri (1910) 68 W. Va. 76, 69 S. E. 375; Norden's Case (1754) Fost. C. L. (Eng.) 129.

wherein it appeared that a division superintendent had been apprised that an attempt would be made to rob a train, and, in pursuance of this information, placed a guard on the train, which captured the accused after they had stopped the train, the court said: "It is . . . well-settled law that where two or more persons conspire to commit an offense, and the person against whom or whose property the offense is premeditated becomes apprised of their intention and arranges to have them apprehended in the act, he does not thereby consent to their conduct, or furnish them any excuse."

Where a person carries marked money so that, if taken from him, the necessary evidence may be secured to convict the offenders, the entrapment is no defense. Tones v. States (Tex.) supra, wherein the court said: "We understand appellant's defense to embrace two propositions: First, that prosecutor was willing to be robbed, prepared himself for that purpose, made no resistance; and, conceding that the money was taken from him, under the circumstances, by the officers, that it was with his consent, and so there could be no robbery. Second, that appellant and his companion Finley were police officers of the town of Denison; that they were authorized by ordinance to arrest persons found drunk in any public place in said city; that appellant was found in such condition by them, and they took him into custody, and carried him to jail; that they had a right to search him; that he used no violence in said search; and that, in the absence of any violence used in procuring the money, conceding that they did procure it, this would not constitute robbery. Furthermore, if it be admitted that sufficient violence was shown in taking the money, still no intent was shown to appropriate it, and if subsequently they formed the intent, and did appropriate said money, it would not constitute robbery. On the first proposition, appellant has cited a number of authorities, from which he deduces a principle of law, as follows: Where money is placed upon a person with the purpose of being taken from him, in order to detect a criminal, the owner of the money and the person from whom the money is taken consenting thereto, robbery is not committed. . . . Of course, if it be conceded that the evidence shows that the prosecutor was consenting to the robbery, then the application of the authorities cited may be granted. However, we gather from the authorities cited by appellant, and others, that as to the offense of burglary, larceny, robbery, and other crimes of like character, if the owner of the burglarized premises or property invites a crime, or induces parties to commit an offense in order that they might be apprehended, that he cannot afterwards be heard to say that he did not consent to what was done. . . . But we do not believe it is held by any well-considered authority that where a person has learned of plans to burglarize his premises, and does not at all enter into the designs of the burglar, but does not try to prevent the burglary,—on the contrary, lays plans to entrap the burglar, and does apprehend him in the act,—there is no [any?] consent to the burglary; and the burglar is amenable to punishment."

So, it is no defense to a prosecution for taking property by force or threats, and against the owner's consent, in pursuance of a conspiracy for that purpose, that the prosecutor, after the defendants had formed their guilty intent, laid a trap, and went voluntarily to their meeting place with money which was marked and furnished him by the prosecuting attorney for the purpose of entrapping the defendants, who were thus captured by officers on the watch. State v. Piscoineri (1910) 68 W. Va. 76, 69 S. E. 375.

In Norden's Case (1754) Fost. C. L. (Eng.) 129, it was held to be no defense to a prosecution for robbery that a person having heard of the practice of a highwayman to rob a certain stage, accompanied it in a post chaise for the purpose of apprehending him, and when he came up and presented a weapon and demanded money, gave him some, and then captured the robber.

And it is no defense to a prosecution for an attempt to commit the crime of robbery, that the defendant's accomplices were acting under instructions from the district attorney's office for the purpose of apprehending the defendant, where the latter made the first suggestion of the crime, and the person to be robbed had no part in the transaction. People v. Du Veau (1905) 105 App. Div. 381, 94 N. Y. Supp. 225.

x. Subornation of perjury.

It may be a defense to a prosecution for attempted subornation of perjury that the offense was induced by another. In Com. v. Bickings (1903) 12 Pa. Dist. R. 206, wherein a judgment of conviction was arrested and the defendant discharged, it appeared that the defendant had been engaged in litigation against his brother, Levi Bickings; that, in the course of that litigation, it became necessary to prove certain disputed facts by a witness additional to himself; that one Omensetter, an acquaintance of both of the brothers, threw himself in the defendant's way, and finally lured the latter into giving him a written statement of the facts to be testified to, and the sum of $10 as part payment of a whole sum of $25 to be paid to him for testifying. A relation between Omensetter and the defendant's litigant brother was clearly made out, and the whole appeared to have been a trap so to discredit the defendant in the civil proceeding as to compel him to abate all or a part of his demand. The court, discussing the criminality of the defendant, said: "The liability of men to fall into crime by consulting their interests and passions is unfortunately great, without the stimulus of encouragement. No state, therefore, can safely adopt a policy by which crime is to be artificially propagated. This principle it is which leads to the limitations of the doctrine as laid down by Wharton, . . . namely, that the defendant who is trapped must himself have previously intended the offense into which he is trapped, and, also, that the offense intended is one to be committed by himself, either alone or with others. In the case before us, the design of the offense appears to have originated with Omensetter, and to have been by him transferred into the defendant's mind. Moreover, the crime to be committed, to wit, perjury, was to be committed by the same man, and not by the defendant. This is virtually the case of a detective who, by promising to perpetrate a crime, lures an innocent man into aiding and abetting it, the object being, not the perpetration of the crime, but the luring of the abettor. Such a proceeding is not a reality, but merely a tragical farce, in which the detective, masquerading as a criminal, captivates the unsophisticated defendant, and then, with mock heroics, denounces him."

y. Trading with slave.

In State v. Anone (1819) 11 S. C. L. (2 Nott & M'C.) 27, it was held to be no defense to a prosecution for the crime of trading with a slave without a note or ticket in writing, that the master of the slave sent him out with goods for the purpose of entrapping anyone who might trade with the slave. To the same effect, see State v. Sonnerkalb (1820) 11 S. C. L. (2 Nott & M'C.) 280. See also State v. Stroud (1819) 11 S. C. L. (2 Nott & M'C.) 34, note. The statute under which the foregoing cases arose apparently made the act a crime regardless of the consent of the master.

Where, however, the statute made the want of the owner's consent an essential element of the crime, it was held that a conviction could not be had where the master ordered the slave to make purchases for the sole purpose of prosecuting the seller. State v. Geze (1853) 8 La. Ann. 52, wherein it was held that where the owner or person having charge of a slave sent him to obtain liquor from the defendant for the purpose of inducing the latter to commit the statutory offense of selling liquor to a slave,

"by Howard M. Benton, Attorney in Fact."

After the execution of the bond, and while it was in full force and effect, and at a time when the officer was in the discharge of his duties as a member of the fire department of the city, riding his motorcycle, he ran into and against the bicycle of the plaintiff and appellee, Geisler, causing him to be thrown to the ground and badly injured. This suit was brought by the injured boy against the officer and his surety, the Massachusetts Bonding Insurance Company, to recover damages for the alleged negligence of the officer. A verdict for $500 being returned and judgment entered thereon in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants Manwaring and his surety appeal, urging several grounds for the reversal of the judgment, which may be set out as follows:

(1) There is no liability on the bond of the policeman for a trespass done by him while performing duties as a member of the fire department. (2) Public necessity exonerates a motorcycle policeman from liability for all but gross negligence. (3) The plaintiff, Geisler, was guilty of contributory negligence but for which the injury would not have happened. (4) The trial court grievously erred in instructing the jury on the law of "last clear chance," where only specific charges of negligence, which do not cover the act of which complaint is made, are contained in the petition. (5) The policeman's bond covered only his official acts, and is available to a citizen only when the officer has been guilty of misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance. (6) The surety on the official bond of a police officer is not liable for ordinary acts of negligence of the officer, for these are done in his individual capacity.

Appellant Manwaring was acting both as a police officer and fireman at the time of the accident to appellee, Geisler, and it is impossible to separate his duties one from the other. In such case the surety on the bond of the policeman may be held liable. The injured party will not be required to draw fine distinctions, and determine whether the officer was doing more duty as a policeman than as a fireman, or vice versa, if he was performing any duty as a police officer. Nor is a peace officer exonerated from liability for an injury inflicted on another while in the discharge of official duties, on the ground of public necessity, if the officer failed to exercise reasonable care for the protection of those whom he knew, or by the exercise of reasonable judgment should have expected, to be at the place of the injury, although he may not be criminally liable. For instance, an officer whose duty it is to make an arrest of one charged with felony may use such force and means as will prevent the escape of the prisoner, even to shooting and wounding him; but if, in shooting at a fleeing prisoner, a police officer should wound another on a public street where people are generally congregated and expected to be, the officer would not be exonerated from civil liability because he had a right to shoot to stop the prisoner, for it was his duty to so perform the functions of his office as not to injure another, and in shooting into a crowd, or along a public thoroughfare where people were wont to travel in large numbers, he would be guilty of such failure to exercise reasonable care as would render him civilly liable for the wrong, even though he was justified in firing at the prisoner.

Coming now to the consideration of the alleged insufficiency of the pleading of plaintiff to have warranted the trial court in giving an instruction on the law of the last clear chance, it may be said that the recognized rule in this jurisdiction is that a general allegation of neg-

tion set out in specific detail the particular acts of negligence upon which he will rely for recovery, he will be concluded thereby, and cannot introduce evidence of other or different acts of negligence. Even if there be a general allegation of negligence, and this is followed by an explanatory charge of specific acts of negligence, the plaintiff will likewise be confined in evidence to the proof of the specific acts of which he complains, and will not be allowed to enlarge thereon under his general averment of negligence. Gaines & Co. v. Johnson, 133 Ky. 507, 105 S. W. 382.

The petition in this case avers that the plaintiff was injured by the defendant, at a time when the defendant police officer was riding his motorcycle along Monmouth street in the city of Newport "at a dangerous and unreasonable rate of speed," without giving any warning, notice, or signal of any kind of the approach, of said motorcycle to the said infant plaintiff, and without having said motorcycle under reasonable control and keeping a lookout ahead of said motorcycle for persons using said street, suddenly and unexpectedly, and with gross and wanton carelessness and negligence, drove said motorcycle upon and against infant plaintiff and his bicycle, throwing infant plaintiff down to and upon said street with great violence, seriously injuring plaintiff and destroying his bicycle. "Plaintiff says that by reason of said negligence and said dangerous and unreasonable rate of speed and said failure of defendant William R. Manwaring, to give warning, notice, or signal of the approach of said motorcycle as aforesaid, and his failure at said time to have said motorcycle under reasonable control and keep a lookout ahead of his said motorcycle for persons upon said street, infant plaintiff was thereby injured."

It will be observed that the petition charges four specific acts of negligence: (1) Operation of machine at a dangerous rate of speed; (2) failure to give warning; (3) failure to have motorcycle under reasonable control; and (4) failure to keep a lookout for people on street.

No one of the specific acts of negligence charged in the pleading was sustained by the proof. As there was no general averment of negligence, and the specific acts of negligence charged do not cover the facts of this case the court should not have given instruction No. 1, which stated the law controlling persons having the last clear chance to avoid an injury.

The evidence for plaintiff tended to prove that the plaintiff, Geisler, a boy of thirteen years of age, was riding his bicycle along the right side of the public street late in the evening, when the engine of the fire department passed going south. The boy turned his wheel and crossed the street, and started back in the direction the fire engine was going. His wheel was about 3 or 4 feet from the curb, and on the right side of the street. The appellant Manwaring, who was riding a motorcycle and aiding the fire department at the time, came up behind appellee, and when in about 20 feet of appellee saw him, and shouted a warning to him to get out of the way, which appellee says he did not hear or obey. Instantly thereafter the motorcycle struck the wheel of the bicycle on which Geisler was riding, and threw him to the ground with great violence, inflicting the injury of which complaint is made.

It would appear from the evidence of appellee and his witnesses that appellant Manwaring could have avoided the injury to plaintiff, if he had only slightly changed the course of his motorcycle after he saw the

the court said: "The objection urged by counsel in their brief is to the effect that the letters were admitted without showing that they were received at the office of the defendant Freeman, and that certain replies, purporting on their face to come from his office, were received by the postoffice inspectors who caused the decoy letters to be sent. It was stipulated between the government and the defendants Freeman and Holsman that these letters were received, through the postoffice department, at the office of Freeman, and that the replies were transmitted through the mail from said office, and nothing was left for the determination of the court except the competency thereof as evidence fit to go to the jury. That the letters were competent is beyond question. The inspectors in no way became parties to the alleged conspiracy in sending the decoy letters. Their course was adopted simply for the purpose of ascertaining whether the law was being violated by the defendants, which resulted in obtaining pertinent evidence tending to show such violation of the law."

In Goldman v. United States (Fed.) supra, it appeared that a government inspector, in order to detect the defendant, who had been suspected of using the mails to defraud, answered an advertisement by the defendant, and succeeded in getting sufficient evidence to support a prosecution against him. The court sustained the conduct of the inspector, but intimated that, had his conduct been such as to induce rather than to detect a crime already planned, the conduct would not have been justified.

s. Practice of dentistry without license.

On a prosecution for practising dentistry without a license, it is no defense that the prosecuting witness went to the office of the defendant and had him fill a cavity in his tooth, and paid him for the service, with a view to prosecuting him therefor. State v. Littooy (1909) 52 Wash. 87, 100 Pac. 170, 17 Ann. Cas. 292.

Div. 402, 127 N. Y. Supp. 98, affirmed in (1911) 201 N. Y. 570, 95 N. E. 1136, it was held to be no defense to a prosecution for having committed the statutory crime of knowingly receiving money for and on account of procuring and placing women in the custody of another person, for immoral purposes, that a trap was laid for the defendant, and that the principal witness, in whose custody the women were placed, did not intend to, and did not in fact, make use of them for immoral purposes, the defendant having, in fact, knowingly received the money, having knowingly procured the women, and having intended to deliver, and having delivered, them for immoral purposes.

But in State v. Mantis (1920) 32 Idaho, 724, 187 Pac. 268, wherein it appeared that the accused had merely acquiesced in the suggestion of the prosecuting witness, acting at the instance of the district attorney, that the accused cohabit with her illegally, it was held that the criminal design had originated in the mind of the witness, and that the entrapment deprived the act of its criminality. The court said: "Entrapment into the commission of a crime is not a defense in the sense of a justification or excuse for an act which otherwise would be criminal, but it resolves itself into a question of whether the accused committed any crime. If the criminal design originated with him, or if he intentionally committed or carried out his own criminal purpose, whether it originated with him or not, at the suggestion of another person, the fact that someone other than the accused facilitated the execution of the scheme, or that an officer appeared to co-operate with him, will not be a defense. . . . In this case there is no evidence that the appellant originated the criminal design of which he was accused and convicted, or that he wilfully and with criminal intent attempted to carry out the crime of which he was convicted after it was suggested to him. The money was given only after its payment was suggested by the woman, and, after she had stated that she preferred to live with appellant for immoral purposes, the appellant merely acquiescing in her suggestion. The case falls clearly within the rule, and there is no evidence to sustain the verdict."

In State v. McCornish (1921) — Utah, —, 201 Pac. 637, reversing a conviction of pandering, the defendant, who was employed as a bell boy in a hotel, having, according to the state's evidence, at the solicitation of a policeman who had procured a room at the hotel, sent a prostitute to his room, the court said: "If the defendant in this case had been engaged in some unlawful business or enterprise, as was the case in State v. Robinson, 40 Utah, 448, 125 Pac. 657, and an officer had merely, in the course of defendant's business, asked him to deal with such officer as he dealt with others, the case would be entirely different. The defendant in this case, was, however, not carrying on, either directly or indirectly, an unlawful business or enterprise; but he, as we construe the evidence, was by the officer requested and induced to do an act constituting a crime, which he would not have done but for the inducement of the officer. The officer thus induced the defendant to do what he would not have done but for such inducement."

u. Pure Food and Drug Act violation.

In United States v. Morgan (1910) 181 Fed. 587, reversed in (1911) 222 U. S. 274, 56 L. ed. 198, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81, on other grounds, a prosecution for sending a misbranded shipment of water, branded "spring water," in interstate commerce, in violation of the Pure Food and Drug Act, the fact that the defendant was induced to act by a detective intending to prosecute him was declared to be immaterial.

In United States v. Eman Mfg. Co. (1920) 271 Fed. 353, it appeared that the prosecuting witness failed to induce the accused to violate the Pure Food and Drug Act by shipping a misbranded medicinal preparation to a druggist, who ordered it at the instance of a government agent, but that the agent later induced the accused to send him the preparation. It was held that the second attempt was a procurement of the commission of the crime, and that the entrapment was a defense. The court said: "The stipulation does not disclose that the defendant here has ever sent 'Sulfox' in interstate shipment other than the two bottles to Eaton in response to his letter. Eaton's failure to induce the defendant to violate the statute by shipping to the druggist, his letter to the defendant, the absence of facts as a basis from which he could believe or suspect that the defendant had, on other occasions, violated the statute, and the stipulation, cause me to reach the conclusion that he wrote the letter to the defendant, not for the purpose of discovering violations, but with the intention and purpose of inducing the defendant to violate the statute; and that on these facts Grimm's Case is not an authority in support of the prosecution, and that, in the interests of a sound public policy, the defendant should be found not guilty, and discharged."

As to the defense of entrapment in a prosecution for a violation of the Interstate Commerce Act, see supra, II. m.

v. Receiving stolen property.

As to the defense of entrapment in the prosecution of other crimes where the want of consent of the person affected is an essential element of the crime, see supra, II. c, n, and infra, II. w and y.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen property it is a defense that the property was offered to the accused, with the consent of the owner, for the purpose of entrapment, for the receipt, to constitute such a crime, must be without the authority of the owner. United States v. De Bare (1875) 6 Biss. 358, Fed. Cas. No. 14,935; People v. Jaffe (1906) 185 N. Y. 497, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263, 78 N. E. 169, 7 Ann. Cas. 348; State v. Waghalter (1903) 177 Mo. 676, 76 S. W. 1028, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 283; Reg. v. Dolan (1855) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 449, Dears. C. C. 436, 3 C. L. R. 295, 24 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 59, 1 Jur. N. S. 72, 3 Week. Rep. 177, overruling Reg. v. Lyons (1841) Car. & M. (Eng.) 217; Reg. v. Schmidt (1866) 10 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 172, 35 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 94, L. R. 1 C. C.

15, 12 Jur. N. S. 149, 13 L. T. N. S. 679, 14 Week. Rep. 286; Reg. v. Hancock (1878) 14 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 119, 38 L. T. N. S. 787; Reg. v. Vilensky [1892] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 597, 61 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 218, 5 Reports, 16, 41 Week. Rep. 160, 56 J. P. 824.

In People v. Jaffe (1906) 185 N. Y. 497, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263, 78 N. E. 169, 7 Ann. Cas. 348, the court said: "The proof clearly showed; and the district attorney conceded upon the trial, that the goods which the defendant attempted to purchase on October 6th, 1902, had lost their character as stolen goods at the time when they were offered to the defendant and when he sought to buy them. In fact, the property had been restored to the owners and was wholly within their control, and was offered to the defendant by their authority and through their agency. The question presented by this appeal, therefore, is whether, upon an indictment for receiving goods, knowing them to have been stolen, the defendant may be convicted of an attempt to commit the crime where it appears without dispute that the property which he sought to receive was not in fact stolen property. The conviction was sustained by the appellate division chiefly upon the authority of the numerous cases in which it has been held that one may be convicted of an attempt to commit a crime notwithstanding the existence of facts unknown to him which would have rendered the complete perpetration of the crime itself impossible. Notably among these are what may be called the pickpocket cases, where, in prosecutions for attempts to commit larceny from the person by pocket picking, it is held not to be necessary to allege or prove that there was anything in the pocket which could be the subject of larceny. . . . In passing upon the question here presented for our determination, it is important to bear in mind precisely what it was that the defendant attempted to do. He simply made an effort to purchase certain specific pieces of cloth. He believed the cloth to be stolen property, but it was not such in fact. The purchase, therefore, if it had been completely effected, could not constitute the crime of receiving stolen property, knowing it to be stolen, since there could be no such thing as knowledge on the part of the defendant of a nonexistent fact, although there might be a belief on his part that the fact existed. As Mr. Bishop well says, it is a mere truism that there can be no receiving of stolen goods which have not been stolen. 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 1140. It is equally difficult to perceive how there can be an attempt to receive stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, when they have not been stolen in fact. The crucial distinction between the case before us and the pickpocket cases, and others involving the same principle, lies not in the possibility or impossibility of the commission of the crime, but in the fact that, in the present case, the act which it was doubtless the intent of the defendant to commit would not have been a crime if it had been consummated. If he had actually paid for the goods which he desired to buy, and received them into his possession, he would have committed no offense under § 550 of the Penal Code, because the very definition in that section of the offense of criminally receiving property makes it an essential element of the crime that the accused shall have known the property to have been stolen or wrongfully appropriated in such manner as to constitute larceny. This knowledge being a material ingredient of the offense, it is manifest that it cannot exist unless the property has in fact been stolen or larcenously appropriated."

In United States v. De Bare (1875) 6 Biss. 358, Fed. Cas No. 14,935, wherein it appeared that postage stamps were stolen from the government and deposited by the thief with an express company, directed to the accused, but were recovered by the postmaster from the express company on an order from the thief, and subsequently forwarded by the postmaster, under the direction of the Postoffice Department, to the accused, the court held there could be no conviction, saying: "The moral turpitude of a receiver under such circumstances may be as great as in case the property comes directly from the hands of the thief, because the criminal intent on his part exists equally in both cases. But to create the offense which the law punishes, the property, when received, must, in fact, and in a legal sense, be stolen property. If these stamps were received by the defendant, they did not, when received, upon the proof made, bear this character. They had been captured from the thief by the owner, and the act of forwarding them to the alleged receiver was the act of the owner." To the same effect are Reg. v. Schmidt (1866) 10 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 172, 35 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 94, L. R. 1 C. C. 15, 12 Jur. N. S. 149, 13 L. T. N. S. 679, 14 Week. Rep. 286, and Reg. v. Villensky [1892] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 597, 61 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 218, 5 Reports, 16, 41 Week. Rep. 160, 56 J. P. 824.

So, in State v. Waghalter (1903) 177 Mo. 676, 76 S. W. 1028, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 283, it appeared that a detective, acting for a railroad company, persuaded a third person to convey a box of clothing, which was taken from the railroad company by the detective, and delivered by him to the third person for conveyance, to the accused, who was suspected of receiving stolen goods, for the purpose of entrapping him with a view to a prosecution. It was held that since there had been no felonious intent connected with the original taking, there was no larceny, and consequently the accused could not be guilty of the crime of receiving stolen property, although the third person who delivered the clothing to the accused believed it to be stolen.

In Reg. v. Dolan (1855) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 449, it appeared that the stolen goods were found in the pocket of the thief by the owner thereof. The owner sent for a policeman and the three went together towards the defendant's shop, where the thief had previously sold stolen goods. The policeman then gave the goods to the thief and he was told by the owner to go to the shop and sell them. The thief did so and turned the proceeds over to the owner. It was held that the purchaser was not guilty of receiving stolen goods. The court said: "I feel strongly that this conviction is wrong. I do not see how it can be supported, unless it could be laid down that, if at any period in the history of a chattel once stolen, though afterwards restored to the possession of the owner, it should be received by anyone with a knowledge that it had been stolen, an offense would be committed within the statute." To the same effect is Reg. v. Hancock (1878) 14 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 119, 38 L. T. N. S. 787, following Reg. v. Dolan (Eng.) supra.

w. Robbery.

As to the defense of entrapment in the prosecution of other crimes where the want of consent of the person affected is an essential element of the crime, see supra, II. c, n and v, and infra, II. y.

It is a defense to a prosecution for robbery that the crime was instigated by the person robbed, for the purpose of entrapping the accused, as it is an element of the crime of robbery that it shall be committed without the consent of the victim. So, if the property is parted with, not because of force or intimidation, but solely for the purpose of prosecuting the person taking the property, robbery is not committed. Rex v. Fuller (1820) Russ. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 408. See also State v. West (1900) 157 Mo. 309, 57 S. W. 1071; Tones v. State (1905) 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 363, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 122 Am. But a person who knows that a robbery is contemplated against him may remain passive, and take steps to prevent the commission of the crime and apprehend the would-be robbers, without being held to have consented to the offense. *State v. In People v. Jaffe (1906) 185 N. Y. 497, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263, 78 N. E. 169, 7 Ann. Cas. 348, the court said: "The proof clearly showed, and the district attorney conceded upon the trial, that the goods which the defendant attempted to purchase on October 6th, 1902, had lost their character as stolen goods at the time when they were offered to the defendant and when he sought to buy them. In fact, the property had been restored to the owners and was wholly within their control, and was offered to the defendant by their authority and through their agency. The question presented by this appeal, therefore, is whether, upon an indictment for receiving goods, knowing them to have been stolen, the defendant may be convicted of an attempt to commit the crime where it appears without dispute that the property which he sought to receive was not in fact stolen property. The conviction was sustained by the appellate division chiefly upon the authority of the numerous cases in which it has been held that one may be convicted of an attempt to commit a crime notwithstanding the existence of facts unknown to him which would have rendered the complete perpetration of the crime itself impossible. Notably among these are what may be called the pickpocket cases, where, in prosecutions for attempts to commit larceny from the person by pocket picking, it is held not to be necessary to allege or prove that there was anything in the pocket which could be the subject of larceny. . . . In passing upon the question here presented for our determination, it is important to bear in mind precisely what it was that the defendant attempted to do. He simply made an effort to purchase certain specific pieces of cloth. He believed the cloth to be stolen property, but it was not such in fact. The purchase, therefore, if it had been completely effected, could not constitute the crime of receiving stolen property, knowing it to be stolen, since there could be no such thing as knowledge on the part of the defendant of a nonexistent fact, although there might be a belief on his part that the fact existed. As Mr. Bishop well says, it is a mere truism that there can be no receiving of stolen goods which have not been stolen. 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 1140. It is equally difficult to perceive how there can be an attempt to receive stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, when they have not been stolen in fact. The crucial distinction between the case before us and the pickpocket cases, and others involving the same principle, lies not in the possibility or impossibility of the commission of the crime, but in the fact that, in the present case, the act which it was doubtless the intent of the defendant to commit would not have been a crime if it had been consummated. If he had actually paid for the goods which he desired to buy, and received them into his possession, he would have committed no offense under § 550 of the Penal Code, because the very definition in that section of the offense of criminally receiving property makes it an essential element of the crime that the accused shall have known the property to have been stolen or wrongfully appropriated in such manner as to constitute larceny. This knowledge being a material ingredient of the offense, it is manifest that it cannot exist unless the property has in fact been stolen or larcenously appropriated."

In United States v. De Bare (1875) 6 Biss. 358, Fed. Cas. No. 14,935, wherein it appeared that postage stamps were stolen from the government and deposited by the thief with an express company, directed to the accused, but were recovered by the postmaster from the express company on an order from the thief, and subsequently forwarded by the postmaster, under the direction of the Postoffice Department, to the accused, the court held there could be no conviction, saying: "The moral turpitude of a receiver under such circumstances may be as great as in case the property comes directly from the hands of the thief, because the criminal intent on his part exists equally in both cases. But to create the offense which the law punishes, the property, when received, must, in fact, and in a legal sense, be stolen property. If these stamps were received by the defendant, they did not, when received, upon the proof made, bear this character. They had been captured from the thief by the owner, and the act of forwarding them to the alleged receiver was the act of the owner." To the same effect are Reg. v. Schmidt (1866) 10 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 172, 35 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 94, L. R. 1 C. C. 15, 12 Jur. N. S. 149, 13 L. T. N. S. 679, 14 Week. Rep. 286, and Reg. v. Villensky [1892] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 597, 61 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 218, 5 Reports, 16, 41 Week. Rep. 160, 56 J. P. 824.

So, in State v. Waghalter (1903) 177 Mo. 676, 76 S. W. 1028, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 283, it appeared that a detective, acting for a railroad company, persuaded a third person to convey a box of clothing, which was taken from the railroad company by the detective, and delivered by him to the third person for conveyance, to the accused, who was suspected of receiving stolen goods, for the purpose of entrapping him with a view to a prosecution. It was held that since there had been no felonious intent connected with the original taking, there was no larceny, and consequently the accused could not be guilty of the crime of receiving stolen property, although the third person who delivered the clothing to the accused believed it to be stolen.

In Reg. v. Dolan (1855) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 449, it appeared that the stolen goods were found in the pocket of the thief by the owner thereof. The owner sent for a policeman and the three went together towards the defendant's shop, where the thief had previously sold stolen goods. The policeman then gave the goods to the thief and he was told by the owner to go to the shop and sell them. The thief did so and turned the proceeds over to the owner. It was held that the purchaser was not guilty of receiving stolen goods. The court said: "I feel strongly that this conviction is wrong. I do not see how it can be supported, unless it could be laid down that, if at any period in the history of a chattel once stolen, though afterwards restored to the possession of the owner, it should be received by anyone with a knowledge that it had been stolen, an offense would be committed within the statute." To the same effect is Reg. v. Hancock (1878) 14 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 119, 38 L. T. N. S. 787, following Reg. v. Dolan (Eng.) supra.

v. Robbery.

As to the defense of entrapment in the prosecution of other crimes where the want of consent of the person affected is an essential element of the crime, see supra, II. c, n and v, and infra, II. y.

It is a defense to a prosecution for robbery that the crime was instigated by the person robbed, for the purpose of entrapping the accused, as it is an element of the crime of robbery that it shall be committed without the consent of the victim. So, if the property is parted with, not because of force or intimidation, but solely for the purpose of prosecuting the person taking the property, robbery is not committed. Rex v. Fuller (1820) Russ. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 408. See also State v. West (1900) 157 Mo. 309, 57 S. W. 1071; Tones v. State (1905) 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 363, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 122 Am. St. Rep. 759, 88 S. W. 217, 13 Ann. Cas. 455.

But a person who knows that a robbery is contemplated against him may remain passive, and take steps to prevent the commission of the crime and apprehend the would-be robbers, without being held to have consented to the offense. State v. West (Mo.) and Tones v. State (Tex.) supra; State v. Piscineri (1910) 68 W. Va. 76, 69 S. E. 375; Norden's Case (1754) Fost. C. L. (Eng.) 129.

Thus, in State v. West (Mo.) supra, acts. No other rule would be safe. Sureties are not needed on a sheriff's bond, if they are only to be held when he acts legally. They vouch for his acts, and bind themselves to make good any damage he may cause to anyone, while acting under color of his office."

In Martin v. Smith (1910) 136 Ky. 804, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 463, 125 S. W. 249, the sureties on the bond of a town marshal were held to be liable for his wrongful act in shooting a person in the belief that he intended to interfere in an arrest which the officer was attempting to make.

Since a recovery cannot be had for negligent acts not done by virtue of office, in Jordan v. Neer (1912) 84 Okla. 400, 125 Pac. 1117, it was held that the sureties on the bond of a sheriff were not liable for the acts of their principal in attempting to stop, without a warrant, a man who was quietly proceeding along the highway, and killing him in an exchange of shots which followed his refusal to stop.

The sureties on the official bond of a constable are not liable for personal injury or wrongful death caused by such officer while professing to act in his official capacity, in making an arrest without a warrant, and without claim that an offense was being committed in his presence based on conduct giving color to such claim, or calling for judgment and opinion as to whether an offense had been so committed. State v. Mankin (1911) 68 W. Va. 772, 70 S. E. 764.

A peace officer who shoots a person in attempting to arrest him without a warrant, and without the exercise of the slightest diligence to ascertain whether the person has committed an offense, does not act colore officii so as to render his sureties liable. Chandler v. Rutherford (1900) 43 C. C. A. 218, 101 Fed. 774, wherein the court said: "To constitute color of office such as will render an officer's sureties liable for his wrongful acts, something else must be shown besides the fact that in doing the act complained of the officer claimed to be acting in an official ca-capacity. If he is armed with no writ, or if the writ under which he acts is utterly void, and if there is at the time no statute which authorizes the act to be done without process, then there is no such color of office as will enable him to impose a liability upon the sureties in his official bond."

Killing or injury in preventing escape.

In Thomas v. Kinkead (1892) 55 Ark. 502, 15 L.R.A. 558, 29 Am. St. Rep. 28, 18 S. W. 854, an action against a constable and the sureties on his official bond, to recover for the wrongful killing of a person by a deputy of the constable, the court held that a peace officer, having arrested a person accused of a misdemeanor, cannot lawfully kill him or inflict a bodily injury to prevent his escape, although no other means of prevention are available, and if he or his deputy inflict a bodily injury on the misdemeanor under such circumstances, though holding a warrant for his arrest, the sureties on the official bond of the officer are liable in damages.

The shooting by a city marshal of one who is fleeing after being arrested for a misdemeanor is wrongful, and is an official act for which his sureties are liable. Rischer v. Meehan (1896) 11 Ohio C. C. 408, 5 Ohio C. D. 416.

Similarly, in Brown v. Weaver (1898) 76 Miss. 7, 42 L.R.A. 423, 71 Am. St. Rep. 512, 23 So. 388, a sheriff and his sureties were held to be liable on the officer's bond, conditioned that "he faithfully perform all the duties of said office during his continuance therein," for the wrongful shooting by a deputy sheriff of a prisoner attempting to escape from arrest. The court said: "If the act from which the injury resulted was an official act, the authorities are clear that the sheriff is answerable. If it was not an official but a personal act, it is equally clear that he is not answerable. But an official act does not mean what a deputy might lawfully do in the execution of his office; if so, no action could ever lie against the sheriff for the 'misconduct' of his deputy. It means, therefore, whatever is done under color or by virtue of his office."

The act of a sheriff in shooting one guilty of a simple misdemeanor to prevent his escape from arrest, although the shot was fired merely to cause the misdemeanor to halt, was held, in State use of Johnson v. Cunningham (1914) 107 Miss. 140, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1179, 65 So. 115, to amount to negligence rendering liable the sureties on his official bond. The court said: "There can be no question that a sheriff and the sureties on his official bond are liable in a civil action for damages arising from the intentional or negligent shooting of a misdemeanor who flees to avoid arrest. The officer owes to the fugitive the duty to exercise care and precaution not to injure him. He must not intentionally shoot a misdemeanor who is a fugitive, nor must he discharge a firearm, while in pursuit, in such a manner as to cause such fugitive injury."

Under a statute allowing action on the bond of a city officer by one injured by the principal's neglect of duty, a surety company, bonding city detectives for the faithful performance of their duties and the payment of any damage that might be adjudged against said detectives for injury by them to any person, was held in Askay v. Maloney (1917) 85 Or. 333, 166 Pac. 29, to be properly joined in an action against the officers for death from their negligent act in shooting at an escaping prisoner, to the fatal injury of a third person; and it was said not to be essential that a judgment should be first obtained against the principals, for the bond, being given pursuant to statute, would be deemed to supply the statutory remedy. On a second appeal in (1919) 92 Or. 566, 179 Pac. 899, it appeared that the bond in question was merely an undertaking to reimburse the city, or any person, "for any loss sustained by reason of any persons named in the schedule hereto attached, or additions thereto, as hereinafter provided, . . . to faithfully discharge all the duties of their respective offices according to the true intent and meaning of said ordinances, and failure to make payment for any and all damages that may be adjudged against them by any tribunal for the illegal arrest, imprisonment, or injury by him to any person." The court held that under the terms of the bond the responsibility of the surety company for an alleged careless and negligent act of the officers in shooting in the public street at an escaping prisoner, thereby causing the death of a third person, was not concurrent with the responsibility of the officers, but was only secondary, while the liability of the individual defendants was primary.

But in Hendrick v. Walton (1887) 69 Tex. 192, 6 S. W. 749, it was held that, under a statute creating liability when the death of any person is caused by the wrongful act, negligence, unskillfulness, or default of another, a sheriff and his sureties were not liable for the act of a deputy in shooting one who was endeavoring to escape after being arrested. It was not decided in that case whether the act of the deputy was an official act, within a statute making the sheriff responsible for such acts of his deputy.

Failure to prevent killing by mob.

The act of a United States marshal in wrongfully permitting a prisoner, in charge of a deputy marshal whom he knows to be incompetent and unfit to perform the duties of his office, to be killed by a mob, is sufficient to render the officer liable on his official bond, because of his personal negligence, for the killing of the prisoner, through the deputy's unfitness. Asher v. Cabell (1892) 1 C. C. A. 693, 2 U. S. App. 158, 50 Fed. 818.

Where it appears that a sheriff-carelessly and negligently suffered a prisoner in his lawful custody to be killed by a mob, he and the sureties on his bond, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, will be held liable in damages. Indiana ex rel. Tyler v. Gobin (1899) 94 Fed. 48. See to the same effect, Ex parte Jenkins (1900) 25 Ind. App. 582, 81 Am. St. Rep. 114, 58 N. E. 560.

But exactly the contrary doctrine was held in State use of Cocking v. Wade (1898) 87 Md. 529, 40 L.R.A. 628, 40 Atl. 104, wherein it was affirmatively stated that the sureties on a sheriff's bond were not liable for a wrong committed by him in aiding and abetting a mob in lynching a prisoner regularly committed to his custody. The court said: "We will add that, even if it had been charged . . . that the sheriff acted maliciously, the official bond of that officer could not be held liable in a case like this. The liability of the sureties is that of an express contract that the sheriff shall 'well and truly execute the office of sheriff and in all things thereto appertaining, and should well and truly perform all the duties required by law to be by him performed.' This provision, it seems now to be well settled, 'binds the officer affirmatively to the faithful execution of his office. There is no clause to cover an abuse or usurpation of power—no negative words that he will commit no wrong by color of his office, nor do anything not authorized by law.' "

Failure to prevent injury by fellow prisoner.

If a sheriff is found guilty of negligence in not protecting a prisoner from injury by an insane fellow prisoner, the surety on his bond is likewise liable to the extent of the bond, which is conditioned for the faithful performance of the officer's duties. Kusah v. McCorkle (1918) 100 Wash. 318, L.R.A.1918C, 1158, 170 Pac. 1023.

Negligent driving of motorcycle.

In the reported case (MANWARING v. GEISLER, ante, 192) it is held that the bond of a police officer was liable for an injury caused by his negligent driving of a motorcycle, though he was at the time engaged in performing a duty for the fire department. The decision is, however, based on the terms of the bond, which rendered the sureties liable for any trespass by the officer for which he might be held liable, and there is dictum in the case that the rule would be otherwise with respect to a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of official duty.

CHARLES WELDON, Plff. in Certiorari,
v.

STATE OF ARKANSAS.

Arkansas Supreme Court — November 7, 1921.

(— Ark. —, 234 S. W. 466.)

Contempt — assault on judge as contempt.

1. An assault upon the judge during an intermission of the court, at a place other than that where the court is held, because of his official conduct with respect to a case on trial before him, is a contempt which the court has inherent power to punish.

—inherent power of courts.

2. Courts have power to punish for contempt as a necessary incident to the exercise of their express powers, and statutory authority need not be found to warrant that action.

(McCulloch, Ch. J., and Hart, J., dissent.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Garland County (Sorrells, J.) to review a judgment convicting defendant of contempt of court. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Thomas S. Downey and Harry H. Myers, for plaintiff in certiorari:

The acts complained of were not, and cannot be construed to have been, committed in the presence of the court.

Turk v. State, 123 Ark. 341, 185 S. W. 472; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 22; Shoultz v. McPheeters, 79 Ind. 376; Stewart v. Crane, 87 Ga. 330, 13 S. E. 552; Ex parte Gardner, 22 Nev. 280, 39 Pac. 570; Neel v. State, 9 Ark. 258, 50 Am. Dec. 209.

If the petitioner was guilty of contempt the punishment is excessive and unreasonable, and an unwarranted usurpation of power.

Carl Lee v. State, 102 Ark. 130, 143 S. W. 909.

Messrs. J. S. Utley, Attorney General, Elbert Godwin, and W. T. Hammock, Assistant Attorneys General, for the State:

The act of petitioner in assaulting Judge Wood, the regular presiding judge over the Garland circuit court, occasioned by litigation then pending before it, although while the court was not in session, was such contempt that it was authorized, under the law, to punish petitioner for contempt summarily, for assault.

Neel v. State, 9 Ark. 259, 50 Am. Dec. 209; Ex parte McCown, 139 N. C. 95, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 603, 51 S. E. 959; Field v. Thornell, 106 Iowa, 7, 68 Am. St. Rep. 281, 75 N. W. 685; United States v. Anonymous, 21 Fed. 772; 6 R. C. L. § 5, p. 492.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding grew out of the following citation, which issued out of the Garland circuit court: "Whereas, on the 4th day of July, 1921, Charlie Weldon, in the county of Garland and state of Arkansas, made an assault on the person of the Honorable Scott Wood, judge of this court, and whereas said assault was without provocation, and was prompted by malice by the acts of said judge in the performance of his judicial duties in a case pending in this court wherein the state of Arkansas is plaintiff and Charlie Weldon and others are defendants, and said assault was made with the intent to intimidate said judge and deter him from the performance of his duties in the trial of said case: It is therefore ordered that an attachment of contempt of court be issued for the said Charlie Weldon, and that he be requested to appear at the next regular day of the present term of said court on the 13th day of July, 1921, and show cause, if any he have, why he should not be punished for said contempt."

An agreement of exchange of courts was made between the judge of the Garland circuit court and W. B. Sorrells, judge of the eleventh circuit, and the matter was heard on the return day of the citation, before the last-named officer. The case coming on for hearing, defendant, Weldon, who will hereinafter be referred to as the petitioner, was found guilty as charged, and his punishment fixed at imprisonment in jail for three months and a fine of $500. Petitioner has by certiorari brought before us the record of the court below for review.

Judge Wood testified that the court over which he presided had taken a recess from the Saturday before the 4th of July to the 13th of that month, and that he spent the 4th at a bathing place called Arboresdale Springs, 8 miles from Hot Springs, the county seat, and that as he came from the water, and was standing outside a dressing booth waiting to get in, he noticed petitioner walking towards him, and as petitioner came up he said to witness, "You are a smart guy," and struck at the judge. The judge said: "What is the matter with you? You are crazy; you are a fool." Petitioner said, "Did you hear what he called me?" The judge denied having called petitioner any name. The judge testified that he said to petitioner, "I know what you are doing this for; you think you can bully somebody;" or, "You are doing it because I did, in my official capacity, have to try you."

The petitioner used vulgar language towards the judge, and called him some names, and asked: "What have you got it in for me for?"

What have I done to you?" but never denied that he was acting for the purpose of which the judge accused him, and made no response to the statement of the judge. The judge and the petitioner struck at each other, then clinched, but were separated without either having inflicted any bodily harm on the other. The judge further testified that he had only seen the petitioner in court, and had never before had any conversation or communication with him. He stated that petitioner had been indicted in his court for manufacturing intoxicating liquors, but an agreement had been made between petitioner and the prosecuting attorney that the charge should not be tried until a similar charge had been disposed of in the Federal court. Petitioner was convicted in the Federal court, but that conviction was reversed in the Federal court of appeals. Whereupon petitioner was put on trial in the Garland circuit court. There was a mistrial, and, in dismissing the jury, Judge Wood, who had presided, made the remark that the case would be set for another day and tried until a verdict was reached.

Petitioner testified that he spoke to the judge civilly, who responded by saying, "Hello, mooner," meaning thereby to call him a "moonshiner," and that this offensive epithet of the judge caused the difficulty which then ensued.

Each of these witnesses was corroborated in several material respects, but, without further reciting the testimony, we announce the conclusion that the finding of the trial court is supported by the testimony. Ex parte Winn, 105 Ark. 193, 150 S. W. 399.

It is insisted that the judgment of the court below must be quashed and the proceeding dismissed because the incident herein set out occurred on a day when the court was not in session, and at a place where a session of the court could not be legally held, and further, that, as the conduct complained of did not take place in the actual presence of the court, the punishment imposed is without authority of law, and is, in any event, in excess of that permitted by the law.

It is true that the incident complained of did not occur on a day when the Garland circuit court was in session (Light v. Self, 138 Ark. 221, 211 S. W. 369, 214 S. W. 746), although it did occur before the adjournment of the court for the term. It is also true that the incident occurred at a place where court could not be legally held. Mell v. State, 133 Ark. 197, L.R.A.1918D, 480, 202 S. W. 33. But are these facts conclusive of the question presented on this appeal?

Section 1484, Crawford & M. Dig., provides that every court of record "shall have power to punish as for criminal contempt persons guilty of the following acts;" and there follows, in five paragraphs, an enumeration of acts declared to constitute contempt of court. This section is taken from § 37, chap. 43, of the Revised Statutes of Arkansas; and no change appears to have been made in it except that, as approved (February 28, 1838), it read, "Every court of record shall have power to punish, as for criminal contempt, persons guilty of the following acts, and no others;" and thereafter follow the five paragraphs as they now appear in § 1484, Crawford & M. Dig.

The words "and no others" have been eliminated from the statute. This was done by Josiah Gould in chapter 36 of the digest of the statutes prepared by him in 1858, and in a note to the section where this omission first occurs the digester has the following explanation: "The words 'and no others' are stricken out as not binding on the courts. See State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384, and cases there cited."

The facts in the case of State v. Morrill, supra, were that Morrill had published an article in a newspaper, reflecting upon a decision of the supreme court and apparently attributing the decision to extraneous influence. In response to the summons which there issued, the defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction, submitting that the publication was not embraced within the statute regulating the punishment of contempts. Speaking for the court, Chief Justice English conceded that the act charged against the defendant was not embraced within any clause of the statute. The insistence was made by counsel for the defendant that the court must look to the statute for its power to punish contempts, and not to any supposed inherent power of its own springing from its constitutional organization, and that the courts were controlled by this statute, and could not go beyond its provisions. The chief justice proceeded to answer, and to refute this insistence, in an opinion evincing great research and learning. He quoted from the opinion of this court in the case of Neel v. State, 9 Ark. 259, 50 Am. Dec. 209, as follows: "By the common law, a court may punish for contemptuous conduct toward the tribunal, its process, the presiding judge, or for indignities to the judge while engaged in the performance of judicial duties in vacation, or for insults offered him in consequence of judicial acts; but indignities offered to the person of the judge in vacation, when not engaged in judicial business, and without reference to his official conduct, are not punishable as contempts."

The opinion in the Neel Case is one of equal erudition, and the two together so thoroughly discuss the common-law doctrine of contempt that this writer is unequal to the task of adding anything to the discussion; and the two opinions together make it clear that courts inherent power of courts.

have power to punish for contempt as a necessary incident to the exercise of their express powers, and that in doing so statutory authority need not be sought or found to warrant that action.

It is insisted, however, that our present Constitution has deprived the courts of this power, and that since its adoption the courts must look to the statute for authority to punish for contempts, except those committed in the immediate presence or hearing of the court, or in direct disobedience to its process. The provision of the Constitution referred to in § 26 of article 7, and reads as follows: "The general assembly shall have power to regulate by law the punishment of contempts not committed in the presence or hearing of the courts, or in disobedience of process." Crawford & M. Dig. § 1483.

A similar contention was made in the case of Turk v. State, 123 Ark. 341, 185 S. W. 472. There Turk and Wallen were never shown to have been at any time in the actual presence of the court. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears that the conduct complained of, to wit, the intimidation of a litigant from appearing in court and prosecuting his suit there pending, was committed "before reaching the courthouse." It was there insisted that as the offense with which Turk and Wallen were charged "was not committed in the presence or hearing of the court, and was not in disobedience of any process of the court, that its power to punish was exceeded in the fine and imprisonment assessed," inasmuch as § 1485, Crawford & M. Dig. (§ 721, Kirby's Dig.), provides that punishment for contempts not so committed "shall in no case exceed the sum of $50, nor the imprisonment ten days."

Answering this insistence, Mr. Justice Kirby, for the court, said:

"It is universally held that intimidating a witness and preventing his appearance at court, or procuring him to absent himself from the trial, is a contempt of court. Preventing the appearance of a litigant in court, for the prosecution of a suit brought to enforce a right, by intimidation and threats, is such an obstruction of judicial procedure as renders absolutely worthless all process of the court, which is instituted for the enforcement and protection of the rights, and the redress and prevention of wrongs, of the litigants. It destroys the dignity and power of the court and brings the administration of justice into disrepute.

"Here a citizen appealed to the court for the redress of an alleged wrong, only to find himself confronted by the wrongdoer and his associate on the day set for the trial, at the door of the court, and so intimidated with threats that he found it necessary to absent himself from the court of justice to which he had appealed, and abandon the prosecution of his cause of action through fear.

"The conduct of appellants was a flagrant offense against the dignity and power of the court, whose arm is long enough and strong enough to keep open and unobstructed the way to its door to all who must invoke its authority, which is not limited in the right to punish offenses of this kind except by the infliction of such punishment as is commensurate with the enormity of the offense and calculated to preserve and uphold the dignity and honor of the court and its respect in the confidence of the people. Ford v. State, 69 Ark. 550, 64 S. W. 879. The court had jurisdiction to hear the proceeding, and did not exceed its authority in the assessment of the punishment."

If full faith and credit are given to that opinion, we think it must necessarily follow that petitioner is as guilty of contempt as were Turk and Wallen.

If intimidating a witness and preventing his appearance at court is a contempt, if preventing the appearance of a litigant in court is such an obstruction of judicial procedure as constitutes contempt, why is it not contempt to be guilty of —assault on judge as

improper conduct designed and intended to influence and control the action of the court itself? The reasoning of Mr. Justice Scott in the case of Neel v. State, supra, is applicable here. He said: "When, therefore, the common law deemed it so necessary, for this great purpose, to protect the juror, the witness, the informer, the party, the jailer, the attorney, and other persons, many of whom might never again be called into a court of justice, it was not to be expected that it would fail to cover with its complete armor the presiding minister of the law's majesty, who would be so often exposed to similar trials. Not that any higher personal privileges were arrogated for him than for the humblest of these, but because it was obvious that the principle which suggested the protection of these would, at least to the same extent, protect him, if it did not rise with the grade of the officer, and the majesty of the law be more degraded in the person of a higher than a lower officer, intrusted with its administration."

In offering actual physical violence to the person of the judge, petitioner was in the constructive presence of the court, for he sought thus to influence, intimidate, and control the action of the judge in the matter of resetting his case for trial when the judge had again resumed the bench.

In the case of Stuart v. People, 4 Ill. 395, the supreme court of Illinois said that in the class of constructive contempts would necessarily be included all acts calculated to impede, embarrass, or obstruct the court in the administration of justice, and that such acts would be considered as done in the presence of the court. See also People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 196, 16 Am. Rep. 528, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 107; Ex parte McCown, 139 N. C. 95, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 603, 51 S. E. 957; McCarthy v. Hugo, 82 Conn. 262, 135 Am. St. Rep. 270, 73 Atl. 778, 17 Ann. Cas. 219, and the notes thereto, in which cases supporting and opposing the view that acts impeding the administration of justice will be held to be within the constructive presence of the court will be found.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Hart, J., dissenting (November 14, 1921):

My dissent is based on the ground that Weldon did not commit contempt in the presence of the court, and therefore, under our Constitution, his punishment is fixed by statute at a fine not exceeding the sum of $50 and imprisonment not exceeding ten days in jail.

State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384, sustains the inherent common-law right of constitutional courts to punish for contempt, committed either in or out of the presence of the court.

The Constitution of 1874 did not attempt to restrict the power of constitutional courts to punish for contempt, whether committed in or out of the presence of the court. Article 7, § 26, provides that the general assembly shall have the power to regulate by law the punishment of contempts not committed in the presence or hearing of the courts, or in disobedience of process. This section recognizes the inherent power of constitutional courts to punish for contempt, but gives the legislature power to prescribe the punishment where the contempt is not committed in the presence of the court.

The court either was or was not in session when the contempt was committed. If it was not in session, I cannot see how there could be any contempt committed in the presence of the court, either actual or constructive. If court was in session, the case would call for the application of the doctrine in Turk v. State, 123 Ark. 341, 185 S. W. 472. In that case the court was in session, and the contempt consisted in the defendant, by threats, preventing the plaintiff from appearing in the circuit court to prosecute his case. At the time the contempt was committed by the defendant, the plaintiff was in the town where the court was in session, for the purpose of attending the trial of his case on that day. The law does not take account of different parts of days. Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Graham, 129 Ark. 550, 196 S. W. 940. Hence the court said that he was constructively in the presence of the court when the contempt was committed.

The doctrine of constructive presence proceeds upon the theory that the misbehavior is committed where it takes effect. Where one puts in force an agency for the purpose of interfering with the administration of justice, he, in legal contemplation, accompanies the same to a point where it becomes effective. So, in the present case, if court had been in session, it would be said that the contempt was committed in the constructive presence of the court, although not at the courthouse. I cannot perceive how contempt could be committed, either in the actual or constructive presence of the court, when the court was not in session.

Light v. Self, 138 Ark. 221, 211 S. W. 369, 214 S. W. 746, is authority for holding that the court was not in session when Weldon committed the contempt. In that case the county court entered an order "Court adjourned until called by the judge," and at a later day attempted to amend the order of adjournment so as to make it read, "The court will suspend until to-morrow, and remain open until the business of the term is completed." This court held that this could not be done, because the court could not be kept in session by such an order.

The effect of the holding in that case is that any order made by a court not in session is void, and I cannot conceive how contempt could be committed in the presence of the court, which was not a court, because not in session.

All courts, unless restrained by statute, may adjourn their sittings to a distant day. Dunn v. State, 2 Ark. 229, 35 Am. Dec. 54, and McVay v. State, 104 Ark. 629, 150 S. W. 125. In State ex rel. Hall v. Canal Constr. Co. 134 Ark. 447, 203 S. W. 704, the court said that we have departed from the common-law rule that a term of court should be considered as one day, and that a court of record may adjourn from one day to a distant day. It was further stated that during the interim the court had no power to transact business.

Even under the dissenting opinion in the case of Light v. Self, supra, the contempt in the present case cannot be said to have been committed in the presence of the court. The dissenting opinion in that case proceeds upon the theory that the court was not adjourned by the order made. The dissenting opinion, however, recognized the power of the court to adjourn from one day to a distant day. When it has adjourned from one day to a distant day, I cannot perceive how it could be said to be in session for any purpose during the intervening days. If so, if a court should adjourn to a distant day for the purpose of holding a regular term of the court in another county in his district, it would follow, under the majority opinion, that contempt could be committed in the presence of the court—not only of the court which was actually being held, but also of the court which was adjourned.

Assault as contempt of court is the subject of the annotation following RE FOUNTAIN, post, 212; specifically, as to assault on judge, see subd. II. of that annotation.

RE L. E. FOUNTAIN, Appt.

North Carolina Supreme Court—September 21, 1921.

Contempt — abusing juror.

1. Abusing a juror for the verdict he has rendered, and making threatening gestures towards him after the case is ended, but before the end of the term of court, tends to impede and hinder the proceedings of the court, and to impair respect and authority for the court's proceedings, within the meaning of a statute making one guilty of an offense whose conduct has such tendency.

Appeal — contempt proceeding — review of facts.

2. The findings of fact in a proceeding to punish for contempt are not reviewable upon appeal from a judgment of the superior court.

Contempt — denying intent — effect.

3. One does not purge himself of contempt for abusing a juror, by denying intention to show contempt for the court.

Courts — respect for proceedings.

4. The action of tribunals established by law for the purpose of investigating matters at issue between litigants is to be respected and obeyed, and is subject to review only in the method provided by law.

Appeal — right of one adjudged guilty of contempt.

5. One adjudged guilty of contempt for abusing a juror for the verdict which he rendered is entitled to an appeal.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Edgecombe County (Calvert, J.) convicting him of indirect contempt not in the presence of the court. No error.

Statement by Clark, Ch. J.:

The judge finds as facts that at November term, 1921, of said county, the case of "L. E. Fountain against Calvin Jones" was called for trial on Thursday of the first week (it being a two-week term), and the verdict was rendered on the following day; that Raeford Liles was a talis juror, and after the verdict had been returned he was discharged from further service as a juror; that about an hour or two after the return of the verdict in said cause, and after said talis juror had been discharged from further service, he was met on the street by the plaintiff in the action, L. E. Fountain, "who accosted him, using abusive and insulting language toward him and the other jurors in the case, because of the verdict they had rendered, and committed an assault upon the said Liles." The matter was brought to the attention of the court during that term, who thereupon issued a rule against the said Fountain, which was not served, because of his absence from town, until after the said court had adjourned for the term and was continued by reason of such failure; the March term was a criminal term, and this matter was not reached, but at the April term it was called up, and a new rule to show cause was issued by the judge holding that term, requiring the respondent to appear to answer the rule, which he did in person and by counsel, and "upon the hearing then had the court makes these further findings of the fact: About an hour or two after the court adjourned for the day on which a verdict was rendered the respondent (L. E. Fountain) accosted the said Raeford Liles, using abusive and insulting language towards him, and of and concerning him and the other jurors in the case, and committed an assault upon him, the said Liles, and that this talis juror Liles that same afternoon informed one Daniel Harris, who was then a regular juror, and served as such the following day, that the acts and conduct of the said respondent, L. E. Fountain, did tend to impede and impair the respect and authority for the proceedings of the court; and the court finds that the respondent has been guilty of contempt of the court, and so adjudges L. E. Fountain, respondent, to be in contempt of court, and adjudges that he pay a fine of $100 and the costs of this proceeding. Thomas H. Calvert, Judge Presiding."

The respondent excepted to the foregoing findings of fact and the judgment of the court.

Messrs. G. M. T. Fountain & Son, for appellant:

The allegations in the affidavit, taken as true, constitute, in law, constructive contempt.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding for indirect contempt, under Consol. Stat. § 984, by conduct impeding and impairing the respect due to, and the authority of, the court, by abusing and assaulting a juror. Such conduct occurred during the term of the court, but not in the immediate presence of the court.

The court held in Re Gorham, 129 N. C. 485, 40 S. E. 311, that in a proceeding as for contempt in attempting to influence a juror, the findings of fact by the trial judge, if there is any evidence, cannot be reviewed on appeal, and that the respondent can purge himself only where the intention is the gravamen of the offense. Baker v. Cordon, 86 N. C. 116, 41 Am. Rep. 448.

Here there is evidence, and the offense was in the act, and not in the intention.

In this case, moreover, there was slight divergence between the evidence for the state and the respondent, and there was ample evidence to justify the findings of fact by the court. While the respondent denies attempting to strike the juror Liles, he does not deny the abusive and threatening language as to him and the other jurors on account of the verdict they rendered against him. Said juror testified that, when the respondent, upon the recess of the court, met him and began cursing and abusing him and the rest of the jury who had sat on the case, using profane and vile expressions, he started to walk away from said Fountain, but the latter continued to walk beside him, cursing and abusing him and all the members of the jury, and repeatedly raised his hand and shook it in his face, continuing to threaten and abuse both affiant and all other members of the jury, talking in an angry and vehement manner and threatening him so that the affiant had to walk away from him, being an old man seventy years of age, to avoid a battery upon him, and walked into the lot of an adjacent stable to avoid personal encounter and fisticuff, as he thought the said Fountain was going to strike him, and he was actually put in fear, and that this was before the court had adjourned for the term, and about two hours after the affiant had been discharged as a juror.

There was also an affidavit by the deputy sheriff that he was unable at that term of the court to serve the rule upon said Fountain, though his residence and place of business were in Tarboro, he absented himself from the county for the purpose of avoiding said officer, or keeping himself concealed to prevent service of said rule upon him. On an appeal in such proceedings from an inferior court, the findings of fact are reviewable, but it is otherwise when the appeal is from the superior court. Re Deaton, 105 N. C. 62, 11 S. E. 244.

The respondent does not deny the use of abusive language as stated by the juror as above, and says that he might have used gestures and raised his hand, but that he did not intend to assault him or put him in fear, and asserts he left town upon business.

In State v. Hampton, 63 N. C. 13, where the defendant, in striking distance of the prosecutor, his arm being bent, but not drawn back, said to the prosecutor, "I have a good mind to hit you," whereupon the prosecutor walked away, it was held that the defendant was guilty of an assault.

But it was not necessary, indeed, that there should have been a battery upon the juror. This is not an indictment for such battery. It is sufficient if the juror was called in question in the manner above stated, for the discharge of his official duty in rendering his verdict, for the court properly held that such conduct tended "to impede and hinder the proceedings of the court, and to impair the respect and authority for the proceedings of the court," and adjudged that the respondent had been guilty of contempt of the court. Consol. Stat. § 984.

The defendant contends that he has purged himself of contempt by denying his intention to show contempt for the court. The question is not whether the respondent intended to show his contempt of the court, but whether he intentionally did the acts which were a contempt of the court. Re Parker, 177 N. C. 467, 99 S. E. 342.

The adjustment of differences between parties, or the investigation of conduct forbidden by law, by legal tribunals, instead of by personal strength, marks the line between civilized government and barbarism. When the tribunals established for that purpose have investigated the matter at issue, or are investigating it, their action is to be respected and obeyed, and is subject to review only in the method provided by law.

In Ex parte McCown, 139 N. C. 95, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 603, 51 S. E. 957, there was a personal attack upon a judge during the recess of the court, and before it had actually adjourned, though the case on account of which the judge was attacked had been finally disposed of, and the court held that McCowan was in contempt; that the right of the court to be protected in the discharge of its duty is an inherent power of which it could not be deprived, for Const. art. 4, § 12, provides: "The general assembly shall have no power to deprive the judicial department of any power or jurisdiction which Courts—respect for proceedings. rightfully pertains to it as a co-ordinate department of the government."

It is a most essential power, rightfully pertaining to the judicial department, that those administering it, whether judges or jurors, shall not be assaulted or intimidated by violent and threatening conduct from the untrammelled discharge of their duties; and this is as essential in regard to jurors who are a part of the court as it is to the judges.

There would be small assurance of the impartial and fearless administration of justice if the judges only are to be protected from such misconduct as is here shown, but the jurors, who are much more liable to be thus called in question, should be left to defend themselves by physical strength, or by indictment or prosecution of the offenders.

In Re Brown, 168 N. C. 417, 84 S. E. 690, the court held that a newspaper criticism after the court had judge, and not a matter of contempt, adjourned was personal to the That case was rested upon the ground that the court had adjourned.

In the McCown Case, 139 N. C. at page 110, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 603 51 S. E. 962, Judge Walker said: "As courts can exercise judicial functions only through their judicial officers, an assault upon such an officer because he has discharged a required duty is necessarily an attack upon the court for what it has done in the administration of justice."

That case holds that such conduct is direct contempt, and is constructively done in the presence of the court, and falls within subsection Consol. Stat. § 978 (1). Besides the able and full discussion of the whole matter in that case, see also State v. Little, 175 N. C. 743, 94 S. E. 680, in which it is held (Hoke, J.), that the power of the court to attach for contempt includes in its protection all officers of the court, jurors, attorneys, and others, who in the line of their official duties are assisting the court in the despatch of its duties, and all witnesses who are in attendance under subpoena. In that case the defendant in a criminal action had assaulted the state's witness before the trial, for the purpose of hindering or delaying the administration of justice, and he was held to be in direct contempt, and that the respondent had no right of appeal, or to demand trial by jury, or to demand that his hearing be removed before another judge. Nothing could be added to the very full and careful discussion of the subject-matter in State v. Little.

The respondent was entitled to an appeal (Re Parker, supra), ^{Appeal—right of one adjudged guilty of contempt.} but, if he were not, —if his sentence were excessive or the jurisdiction was doubtful,—his remedy was by habeas corpus proceedings and a certiorari, if necessary, from this court. Re Holley, 154 N. C. 163, 69 S. E. 872.

Disregarding, however, this phase of the case, we find in the judgment of the court in this case no error.

In the early days in England fighting in court received severe punishment. Thus, in Davis's Case (Eng.) supra, the memorandum of the case is that a certain person struck another in the face with his right fist in the great hall of Westminster, all of the King's courts sitting there, and threatened to hang him if he would give evidence against a felon then to be arraigned; and for this act the offender was indicted, confessed the indictment, and judgment was rendered and executed for perpetual imprisonment during life, with forfeiture of all his property, and the cutting off of his right hand.

And in Waller's Case (1634) Cro. Car. 373, 79 Eng. Reprint, 926, where one was indicted because, in Westminster palace, near the great hall where the justices were in session, he made an assault upon another person, in disturbance of the law and contempt of the King, and was found guilty, it was held that, because he did not commit the offense in the presence of the justices or the King, the judgment of the cutting off of the hand should not be given, but he was punished by imprisonment and fine of £1,000.

Fighting in court during the progress of a trial has been regarded as not of a merely negative character, or, prima facie, innocent or colorless conduct, but as of a positive nature, which requires justification; and, therefore, one under custody for direct contempt for fighting in court, who attempts to show that the conduct for which he was held in contempt was a justifiable defense of his person, is attempting to contradict the record by showing facts to remove culpability, and is not merely attempting to supplement the record by showing such additional facts, not contradicting it, as would exonerate him. Re Mills (Haw.) supra.

It was held in Re Mills (1908) 19 Haw. 88, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 577, supra, that a mittimus sufficiently complied with a statutory provision that, "whenever any person shall be adjudged guilty of any contempt or sentenced therefor, the particular circumstances of the offense shall be fully set forth in such judgment and in the order or warrant of commitment," where it set out that the party to be taken into custody had been adjudged guilty of a direct contempt in taking part in a fight in the court room, in open court, when the court was in session and actually engaged in the trial of a case. The contention was overruled that the mittimus was insufficient because it failed to show that the accused was not acting in self-defense or under other justifiable circumstances.

II. Assault on judge.

In WELDON v. STATE (reported herewith) ante, 202, it was held that an assault upon the judge during an intermission of the court at a place other than that where the court was held, because of his official conduct with respect to a case on trial before him was a contempt which the court had inherent power to punish.

Also, in State v. Garland (1873) 25 La. Ann. 532, it was held that contempt of court was committed by an assault by an attorney on a judge during a recess of the court, because of a controversy between the two while the court was in session. There had been no adjournment, and it appears that the assault occurred in the court room as the judge was leaving.

And it was held in Ex parte McCown (1905) 139 N. C. 95, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 603, 51 S. E. 957, that a contempt of court at common law was committed by abusing and assaulting the judge after he had retired from the court room to his boarding house, upon adjournment subject to notice from the judge, because of his disposition of the case immediately prior thereto.

It was held also in Ex parte McCown (N. C.) supra, that abusing and assaulting a judge after he has retired from the court room during a recess of the court, because of his action in the case pending before him, is a direct contempt, within the meaning of a statute defining such a contempt as disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior committed during the sitting of any court of justice, in the immediate view and presence of the court, and directly tending to interrupt its proceedings, or to impair the respect due to its authority.

But in Ex parte Ballew (1921) — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 201 Pac. 525, assuming that the assault on a district judge, which occurred on the street in the evening, was in consequence of the judge's action in injunction proceedings on the previous day, the court held that the assault did not constitute a direct contempt of court, within the meaning of a statute defining direct contempts as "disorderly or insolent behavior committed during the session of the court, and in its immediate view and presence," or "any breach of the peace, noise, or disturbance so near to it as to interrupt its proceedings." And it was held that the assault did not come within any of the statutory definitions of contempt, either direct or indirect, and that the punishment for the act must be found in the provisions of the Penal Code.

And where the judge, having adjourned court for the day, was stopping at a tavern at which certain persons, with knowledge that the judge was there, committed a great riot, with quarreling and striking at each other, and could not be induced to depart until a late hour of the night, it was held that the rioters were not guilty of contempt of court. Com. v. Stuart (1822) 2 Va. Cas. 320.

As to what acts or language toward a judge not occurring while the court is in session may constitute a contempt of court, see, as illustrative of cases not involving assaults, Snyder v. State (1898) 151 Ind. 553, 52 N. E. 152; Field v. Thornell (1898) 106 Iowa, 7, 68 Am. St. Rep. 281, 75 N. W. 685; State v. Root (1896) 5 N. D. 487, 57 Am. St. Rep. 568, 67 N. W. 590.

III. Assault on juror.

Where, about two hours after the return of a verdict and the discharge of a juror from further service, he was met on the street by the plaintiff in the case, who accosted him, using abusive and insulting language on account of the verdict, and conducted himself in such a threatening manner as to cause the other party to retreat, to avoid, as he thought, a personal encounter, it was held in the reported case (RE FOUNTAIN, ante, 208) that a contempt of court had been committed, since a battery upon the juror was unnecessary, and it was sufficient if the juror was called in question in the manner indicated for the discharge of his official duty in rendering a verdict, this conduct being properly held to impede and hinder the proceedings of the court and to impair the respect and authority for its proceedings.

It was held in Re Glenn (1916) 103 S. C. 501, L.R.A. 1916D, 1190, 88 S. E. 294, that a witness is not guilty of contempt in assaulting a juror for a statement made by the latter, after the termination of the trial, as to the veracity of the witness. In this case the juror, on the day after the rendering of the verdict and while off duty as a juror, coming from his home to his place of business, made a statement with reference to the case, reflecting on the character and veracity of a witness. The latter, to whom the conversation was reported, sought an interview with the juror, during which the alleged assault occurred. The court said there was no pretense that the witness was guilty of any direct contempt; that there was no resistance or defiance of the court's power or authority, and no disobedience of any of its orders; that after a case is ended, nothing which is done, unless it is in disobedience of an order of the court, can be adjudged a contempt of court; and that no words spoken in reference either to judge or jury after a case is ended, can be construed as being a contempt of court.

Although perhaps not strictly in point as a case of assault, attention is called to Reg. v. Martin (1848) 5 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 356, where, immediately after a conviction, a brother of the prisoner went to the home of the foreman of the jury and challenged him to mortal combat for having bullied the jury in his brother's case; and it was held that he should be committed for contempt of court.

IV. Assault on attorney.

See also Sharon v. Hill and United States v. Anonymous (Fed.) under VI. infra.

The power of the court to punish for contempt consisting of an assault upon the prosecuting attorney in a pending case, which produces injuries incapacitating the attorney from attending court and hence delays the trial, is sustained in Steube v. State (1888) 3 Ohio C. C. 383, although the assault was committed about half a mile from the courthouse and two hours after the adjournment of court for the day. It was contended that the attack arose out of a personal difficulty wholly unconnected with the case, and that there was no intent to obstruct the administration of justice. The court held that such an intent was unnecessary, and that the evidence disproved the contention that the altercation was a merely personal one disconnected with the trial.

It was held, also, in Steube v. State (Ohio) supra, that in contemplation of law the assault was committed in the presence of the court, within the meaning of a statute relating to contempts so committed.

Allegations in the answer in the contempt proceeding that the assault was the result of a personal difficulty wholly unconnected with the trial in question, that it occurred two thirds of a mile from the courthouse after the court had adjourned, and that the defendant had no intention of obstructing the administration of justice or of committing a contempt of court, were held insufficient in Steube v. State (Ohio) supra, to purge the defendant of contempt on the theory that, in the absence of a reply, the allegation must be taken as true; the court saying that the case was not one in which pleadings were necessary or to which the rules of pleading were applicable, and that, in view of the evidence showing the falsity of the answer, the latter could only be regarded as aggravating the contempt.

It was held in United States v. Patterson (1886) 26 Fed. 509, that a contempt of court was committed by an assault made on counsel for one of the parties in a pending case, in the court room, during an intermission or recess, just after the presiding judge had left the bench, but before he or all of the jurors and witnesses in attendance had left the court room, although the cause of the encounter had no connection with the court or any of the proceedings, and the assailant had no intention or thought of any incivility to the court or judge. It was said: "The mistake of the respondent was in assuming that when the judge left the bench he might, so far as the court was concerned, proceed to accomplish his purpose of making the assault, supposing that it was only when the judge was upon the bench that any question of contempt could arise. But it must be apparent to everyone that this is a misconception, and far too restricted to admit of approval anywhere. A court would deserve the contempt of public opinion if it permitted so narrow a view of its prerogatives to prevail, and could not complain if, during its recess, the court room should be used for a cockpit or a convenient place to erect a prize ring. That is the logic of the false assumption that was made in this case. But, wholly aside from this consideration, there is a principle of protection to all who are engaged in and about the proceedings of a court that requires preservation against misbehavior of this kind. The defendant in court whose attorney was attacked is entitled to the protection of the court against any personal violence towards its attorney while he is in attendance on the court. Otherwise, attorneys might be driven from the court, or deterred from coming to it, or be held in bodily fear while in attendance, and thereby the administration of justice be obstructed. This principle might be pressed beyond reasonable limits, to be sure, but it certainly is not going beyond the true confines of the doctrine to apply it here. It protects parties, jurors, witnesses, the officers of the court, and all engaged in and about the business of the court, even from the service of civil process while in attendance, and certainly should protect an attorney at the bar from the approach and attack of those who would do him a personal violence."

The circumstance, however, that the assailant intended no disrespect for the court, and was under a misapprehension that he was not committing a contempt because the occurrence took place at a recess, was considered in United States v. Patterson (Fed.) supra, as sufficient to mitigate the punishment from imprisonment to a fine, the court expressly stating, however, that the case should not be considered a precedent in this regard.

And it was held a contempt of court, in United States v. Barrett (1911) 187 Fed. 378, for one interested in a pending suit to assault the attorney for the opposing party, because of his connection with and conduct of the case, in the street, in open view of the jury, which was then deliberating on the verdict, or to aid and abet in the assault through keeping off bystanders who might attempt to separate the combatants.

While, perhaps, not strictly a case of assault, attention is called to Re Johnson (1887) L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 68, holding that a solicitor was promptly committed for contempt of court where, in proceedings before a judge at chambers, it appeared that he had misconducted himself, and continued his misconduct by way of abuse and threats against the solicitor of his opponent with reference to the proceedings, while he and such solicitor were going along the passages on their way from the building. It was said by Lord Esher, M. R.: "I pass by altogether the question where and in what part of the building the appellant's misconduct took place; it is obvious that it took place immediately after proceedings before a judge in chambers, and in consequence of what had taken place upon these proceedings, and that the appellant intended in what he did to cast contumely and insult on such proceedings. It seems to me to be immaterial whether the judge sitting at chambers is to be considered as sitting in a court or not. I am not prepared to say he is not, but it is not necessary to consider the point. The judge was acting for the court judicially and in the administration of justice, and what the appellant did was an insult to the administration of justice. That being so, he was liable to be called to account for it, as he was, not before the judge sitting at chambers, but before the court. I do not say that a judge at chambers could, for an act of contempt perpetrated before him at chambers, himself commit for contempt. I do not decide whether he could or not, though I am inclined to think that he could not. It seems to me quite clear that a person behaving in such a manner as the appellant did, either before the judge or immediately after leaving his chambers, with the intention of casting contempt on the administration of justice, is guilty of a contempt of the court which is being represented by the judge, and can be attached for contempt by such court."

See also Ex parte Snodgrass (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 359, 65 S. W. 1061, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 400, where the language and conduct of an attorney, in discussing the testimony of witnesses, was such that one of the witnesses committed an assault on the attorney in the presence of the court, and the attorney was adjudged guilty of contempt for language and conduct provoking the assault. This was held erroneous, the case turning on the question of the propriety of the argument by the attorney leading to the assault.

V. Assault on witness.

It was held in Brannon v. Com. (1915) 162 Ky. 350, L.R.A.1915D, 569, 172 S. W. 703, that a criminal contempt was committed by an assault, before the jury had returned its verdict of guilty, upon a witness in the public street a few minutes after he had left the court room, where he had testified against the accused, for the purpose of punishing him for testimony he had already given, or of intimidating for the future in a similar case against the assailant, which was still to be tried. The court said: "For one to commit, as was done by the appellant in this case, an assault and battery upon the witness as a punishment for giving testimony against him in an action or criminal prosecution then pending, though in part disposed of, or as a means to intimidate him and influence his testimony expecting to be given in the future trial of an action or criminal prosecution then pending, is a criminal contempt, because such conduct is as much an interference with the authority and dignity of the court, and an obstruction of justice, as would be the intimidation or bribery of a witness, or any contempt committed in the presence of the court. The evidence clearly proves appellant's guilt of such a contempt; and, this being true, it was within the power and jurisdiction of the court to proceed against him by rule and summarily try him, as was done in this case."

And where one under indictment, during the term and before trial, at a café near the courthouse and the hotel in which the judge was staying, assaulted a party who was to be one of the principal witnesses against him, it being found that the purpose of his acts was to prejudice and delay the rights and remedies of the state in the indictments, and that they had this effect, and tended to cause delay in the transaction of the business of the court, and to impair respect and authority for its proceedings, it was held in State v. Little (1918) 175 N. C. 743, 94 S. E. 680, that the court correctly adjudged the offending party guilty of direct contempt and administered summary punishment for the offense, and that no appeal would lie from the sentence imposed.

VI. Assault on officers or agents of court.

An assault upon a United States commissioner because of past discharge of duty was held in Ex parte McLeod (1903) 120 Fed. 130, to be a contempt of the authority of the court, whose officer the commissioner was in the administration of criminal laws, although no proceeding against the offender was then pending, and the commissioner was not at the time in the performance of any duty. It is said in the syllabus by the court that as courts can exercise judicial functions only through their judicial officers, an assault upon a judicial officer because he has discharged a judicial duty is necessarily an attack upon the court; that it is vital to the welfare of society that courts which pass upon the life, liberty, and property of the citizen be free to exercise their reason and conscience unawed by fear or violence; and that the highest consideration of the public good demands that courts protect their officers against revenges induced in consequence of the performance of their duties, as well as violence while engaged in the actual discharge of duty.

It was held in Ex parte McLeod (Fed.) supra, that the Federal court was not deprived of the power to punish summarily, as for a contempt, an assault upon a court officer, while yet in office, induced by his performance of duty in a past case, by the statutory provision that Federal courts should have power to punish by fine or imprisonment contempts of their authority, provided such power to punish contempts should not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice.

Where an attorney, who was also a party in a suit, resisted and assaulted the marshal who had been ordered by the court to remove the attorney's wife from the court room because of grossly insulting language used by her to the judge while he was reading his opinion in the case, it was held in Re Terry (1888) 13 Sawy. 440, 36 Fed. 419, that he was properly committed for contempt of court, and could not secure a release by denial of wrongful or criminal intent. An application to the United States Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus for release from imprisonment for contempt in this case was denied in (1888) 128 U. S. 289, 32 L. ed. 405, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77.

In Ex parte O'Neal (1903) 125 Fed. 967, where one who had been convicted in the Federal district court of contempt in committing an assault upon and resisting an officer of the court, a trustee in bankruptcy, in the execution of its orders, sought release on habeas corpus, contending that the alleged assault occurred in a store at some distance from the court room, that the court was not in session and had not been in session for months before that date, and that the judge was not in the state at the time, the court, in refusing a release, said: "In my opinion, the additional facts offered to supplement the record do not materially change the status of the case, nor do they in any wise extend the jurisdiction of this court upon this writ. The charge of contempt against the relator is based upon the fact that he unlawfully assaulted and resisted an officer of the district court in the execution of orders of the court, and in the performance of the duties of his office under such orders; and in that respect it would seem to be immaterial whether at the time of the resistance the court was actually in session, with a judge present in the district, or whether the place of resistance was 40 or 400 feet from the actual place where the court was usually held, so long as it was not in the actual presence of the court, nor so near thereto as to embarrass the administration of justice." A writ of error to review the judgment of the district court in the contempt proceedings for the assault in this case was dismissed for want of jurisdiction in O'Neal v. United States (1903) 190 U. S. 36, 47 L. ed. 945, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 303.

In Williams v. Johns (1773) 2 Dick. 477, 21 Eng. Reprint, 355, on an application to commit the defendant for contempt in making the person who served him with a subpoena to appear and answer eat the same, and otherwise illtreating him, the court ordered the defendant to stand committed unless cause was shown.

Attention was called also to United States v. Anonymous (1884) 21 Fed. 761, where the taking of testimony before an examiner was interrupted by one who was attending as a party to the case and as an attorney, by his insulting and threatening language and conduct to the examiner and other counsel, and he was adjudged guilty of contempt.

And see Sharon v. Hill (1885) 24 Fed. 726, where the contempt consisted in the interruption of proceedings before an examiner in chancery in a Federal court, threatening the life of counsel, and drawing a pistol while examination of a witness was in progress, it being said that the examiner was an adjunct of the court, and that the act was undoubtedly as distinctly and clearly a contempt of court as though committed in the presence of the judge, in the court room, while in the act of trying a case.

VII. Miscellaneous.

Where the prosecuting witness after leaving the court, while in the lobby, struck the defendant, it was held in Rex v. Wigley (1835) 7 Car. & P. (Eng.) 6, that he should be committed for contempt of court.

And it was held in United States v. Emerson (1831) 4 Cranch, C. C. 188, Fed. Cas. No. 15,050, that the assault was committed "in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," within the meaning of the Federal statute declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court, where a party in suit, while the court was sitting, assaulted a person with whom he had a verbal altercation, in the entrance hall of the court room, separated therefrom only by a cloth-covered door without panels.

But in Ex parte O'Brien (1895) 127 Mo. 477, 30 S. W. 158, it was held that the evidence showed that the arrest and other acts constituting the alleged contempt occurred at a point beyond the range of the personal knowledge or vision of anyone in the court room, and that there had been no contempt committed in the "immediate view and presence" of the court so as to give it jurisdiction to award a punishment against the offender in his absence for such an offense. The case was one where a police officer was charged with assault in connection with the arrest, for another offense, of one who had just been discharged, and had gone outside the court room, which was separated from the scene of the disturbance by closed doors and a concourse of persons.

While the court did not use the word "view" in its order adjudging certain parties guilty of contempt, it was held not a valid objection that the order failed to show disorderly or contemptuous behavior in the immediate view and presence of the court, within a statute conferring power to punish summarily for contempt in such cases, where the order recited that an action was pending in court; that one of the parties was applying to have an order of dismissal signed by the court; that, in the presence of the judge at chambers in the courthouse, such party used boisterous and angry language and gestures; and that in the clerk's office, "in the immediate presence" of the court, he engaged in a fight with his codefendant. State v. Buddress (1911) 63 Wash. 26, 114 Pac. 879.

It was held, also, in State v. Buddress (Wash.) supra, that the order for summary punishment for contempt was not defective as failing to disclose that the court was in session, since it showed a breach of the peace or disturbance directly tending to interrupt the proceedings of the court, which was made contempt of court by statute, and it also affirmatively appeared that the court was transacting business when the exchange of words began, and, if it temporarily suspended business during the fight, those who brought about the suspension could not complain.

Without attempting to cover the question presented, attention is called also to State v. Woodsin (1844) 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 199, where, the defendant having been fined by the county court for contempt of court "by fighting in the yard of the courthouse, before the courthouse door, and in the presence of the court," it was held on appeal to the superior court that the record was conclusive that the encounter occurred in the presence of the court. v.

J. J. OUSTERHOUS, State Dairy Commissioner, et al., Respts.

Constitutional law — license of dairy.

1. Chapter 284, Comp. Laws 1913, which requires the owners or operators of cream stations within the state of North Dakota to take out a license, and provides that the dairy commissioner may at any time revoke such license on evidence that the licensee has violated any of the existing dairy statutes of the state, is constitutional, and does not deprive such licensees of liberty or property without due process of law.

[See note on this question beginning on page 235.]

Food — dairy business — public interest.

2. The creamery business in North Dakota is a business which is affected with a public interest.

License — purpose.

3. Licenses may be imposed not merely for the purpose of acting as temporary permissions to engage in harmful occupations, but in order to so control those that are useful that their operation may be harmless and that they may really subserve the public good.

— business affecting public welfare.

4. Licenses may be exacted for the purpose of regulation, so that a business which intimately affects the public welfare may be brought within the supervision of the authorities, and the regulations which are made concerning it may be more easily and certainly enforced.

Office — dairy commissioner — authority.

5. The dairy commissioner of the state of North Dakota, whose office is created by §§ 2835, 2836, Comp. Laws 1913, is an independent officer, and, as far as his duties as dairy commissioner are concerned, is not subordinate to the commissioner of agriculture and labor.

Estoppel — choice of forum — effect.

6. Where one chooses his forum in which his rights shall be determined or adjudicated, he cannot complain of lack of jurisdiction.

[See 10 R. C. L. 699.]

Constitutional law — scope of police power.

7. The police power of the state is not limited to regulations necessary for the preservation of good order or the public health or safety. The prevention of fraud and deceit, cheating and imposition, and unfair competition are equally within its province.

— revocation of license.

8. Chapter 105 of the Laws of 1917, which provides for the revocation of the licenses of the owners of cream stations by the dairy commissioner, on evidence that statutes of the state have been violated, is not unconstitutional, and does not deprive the owners of due process of law for the reason that no appeal from the order of the dairy commissioner is provided for by the statute; it being clear that mandamus will lie to redress any wrong which is suffered through any arbitrary, tyrannical, or unreasonable action on the part of the officer, or which is based on false information.

Certiorari — when available.

9. The writ of certiorari is not a writ of right, but will be granted or denied in the discretion of the court, and according to the circumstances of each particular case, as justice may require.

— review of merits.

10. The writ of certiorari, which is provided for in § 8445 of the Compiled Laws of 1913, can only be used "when inferior courts, officers, boards, or tribunals have exceeded their jurisdiction, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy." It cannot be used for the purpose of reviewing the merits of a case and of weighing evidence.

License — procuring — effect.

11. A person who obtains a license under a law, and seeks for a time to enjoy the benefits thereof, cannot afterwards, and when the license is sought to be revoked, question the constitutionality of the act.

(Christianson and Robinson, JJ., dissent.)

APPEAL by relator from an order of the District Court for Burleigh County (Nuessle, J.) denying a petition for a writ of certiorari to review the action of respondent dairy commissioner in revoking relator's license to conduct a cream station, and the action of the other respondent in sustaining the revocation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. F. E. McCurdy, for appellant:
Regulations and licenses under the police power can only be exercised where they have a real substantial relation to the protection of public health, public safety, or public morals, and should not impose any unnecessary and unreasonable restriction upon the use of private property.

17 R. C. L. 530; People v. Ringe, 197 N. Y. 143, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 528, 90 N. E. 451, 18 Ann. Cas. 474.

The dairy commissioner had no authority to revoke the license.

Tiedeman, Pol. Power, 273; Peginis v. Atlanta, 132 Ga. 302, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 717, 63 S. E. 857.

Messrs. William Langer, Attorney General, and Edward B. Cox, Assistant Attorney General, for respondents:

Relator is not in a position to urge the constitutionality of the law upon the ground that the act does not provide for notice and hearing before revocation of license, in view of the fact that he herein demanded and received a hearing, and that at such hearing he was present in person and represented by counsel, and was permitted to introduce oral and documentary evidence.

Quinn v. State, 82 Miss. 75, 83 So. 839; Cram v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 19 Ann. Cas. 181, note; Tennessee Fertilizer Co. v. McFall, 128 Tenn. 645, 163 S. W. 806; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 170 U. S. 57, 42 L. ed. 948, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 513; Security Trust & S. V. Co. v. Lexington, 203 U. S. 325, 51 L. ed. 204, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 87.

Relator, having applied for and received a license under the statute, and been protected by and received the benefits of its provisions, is not now in a position where he can urge that the law is unconstitutional.

Bruce, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the district court of the sixth judicial district, denying the petition of the appellant for a writ of certiorari to review the action of the dairy commissioner, J. J. Ousterhous, in revoking a license of the appellant to conduct a cream station at Hazen, North Dakota, and to review the action of the commissioner of agriculture and labor, J. N. Hagan, in sustaining the said revocation.

The statutes under which the action sought to be reviewed was taken are as follows:

Section 2835, Comp. Laws 1913: "There is hereby created a bureau of the department of agriculture and labor to be known as the dairy department, which is hereby created for the purpose of promoting, improving, and regulating the dairy products of the state and to establish and enforce proper rules and regulations pertaining thereto."

Section 2836, Comp. Laws 1913: "The commissioner of agriculture and labor is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a deputy in his department who shall be known as the dairy commissioner, and shall be the official head of the dairy department," etc.

Chapter 103, Laws 1917:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person to sample or test milk, cream, or any other dairy product excepting merchants dealing in manufactured butter for the purpose of determining the commercial value of such product when bought or sold, without first having secured a license from the state dairy department, and such license shall be conspicuously displayed in his place of business. Provided that in case of sickness or necessary absence, said person may appoint a substitute for six days and for a longer period subject to approval of the dairy commissioner, but said person shall be responsible for the acts of said substitute. This license shall be granted to those who shall have completed a course in milk and cream testing in any recognized college or dairy school, or to those who shall pass an examination under the direction of the state dairy department and satisfactorily demonstrate that they are properly qualified and competent to use such test.

"The dairy commissioner shall have the authority to revoke any license issued under the provisions of this act if the holder is convicted of a failure to comply with the state dairy laws. Said license shall be granted for a period of one year by the dairy department upon payment of a fee of two dollars ($2), payable prior to examinations, one dollar ($1) of which shall be returned in case of failure to pass said examination. In the case of a renewal of a license, a fee of one dollar ($1) shall be paid.

"The fees collected under the provisions of this act shall be paid into the state treasury, monthly, by the dairy commissioner to be credited to the dairy department and to be used for conducting said examinations."

Section 2854, Comp. Laws 1913: "It shall be unlawful for the owner, manager, agent or employee of any creamery or cheese factory to manipulate, underread or overread the Babcock test, or any other contrivance used for determining the quality or value of milk."

Chapter 105, Laws of 1917:

"Section 2844 of the Compiled Laws of 1913 is hereby amended and re-enacted so as to read as follows:

"Every person, firm or corporation owning or operating a creamery, cheese factory, renovating or process butter factory, or cream station in this state, shall be required before beginning business, or within thirty days thereafter, to obtain from the dairy commissioner a license for each and every creamery, cheese factory, renovating or process butter factory or cream station owned or operated by said person, firm or corporation, which shall be good for one year. The fee for such license shall be ten dollars, and no license shall be transferable. Each license shall record the name of the person, firm or corporation owning or operating the creamery, cheese factory, renovating or process butter factory, or cream station license, its place of business, the location thereof, the name of the manager thereof and the number of the same. Each license so issued shall constitute a license to the manager or agent of the place of business named therein.

"It shall be the duty of every person, partnership, firm or corporation, or association holding a license to operate in any plant in which dairy products are handled commercially, to post in a conspicuous place such license under which they are operating, together with a summary of the dairy laws which shall be prepared and sent out from the office of the dairy commissioner.

"The dairy commissioner may withhold a license from any applicant who has previously violated or refused to comply with any of the existing dairy laws or lawful requests issued by said dairy commissioner, or his authorized assistants. The dairy commissioner may, at any time, revoke a license on evidence that licensee has violated any of the existing dairy statutes, or has refused to comply with all lawful requests of the dairy commissioner or his authorized agents."

The first order canceling the license was in the form of a letter, and was as follows:

"Bismarck, N. D., August 3d, 1917.

"Mr. B. Cofman,

"Hazen, North Dakota.

"Dear sir:—

"Some time ago one of our deputy inspectors spent several days in your community with the intention of determining the truth of some of the reports that have been coming into this office. After making quite thorough examination from the evidence which our inspector obtained, we find that it becomes the duty of this department to revoke your license. Our inspector weighed, sampled, and tested several cans of cream which were delivered to you at your station, and we hold the check which you issued in payment of same, as evidence that you overread the test on one can of cream as much as 4 per cent, and that on another can you credited the producer with 21 lbs. less than he had delivered.

"You have been long enough in this business to know how to test the cream correctly, and no doubt you are also aware that to overread and underread the Babcock test is a violation of our state dairy laws.

"You will also note that the last legislative session made it the duty of this department to revoke the license of parties who violate our dairy laws and who do not comply with the requirements of this department.

"You will kindly give proper attention to this notice and make all the necessary arrangements to have your cream station closed by August 15th, 1917. We are sorry that such an action as this has been necessary. We are also convinced that a firm stand must be taken in enforcing the dairy laws.

"Very truly yours,

"(Signed) J. J. Osterhous,
"Dairy Commissioner."

Although it is clear from the provisions of §§ 2835 and 2836 of the Compiled Laws of 1913 that no appeal to the commissioner of agriculture and labor is provided for, and the dairy commissioner is an independent officer, the appellant and relator, Bernard Cofman, after the sending of the order in question, made an application to the commissioner of agriculture and labor for a hearing, and in response to this application the dairy commissioner, J. J. Ousterhous, to whom the application must have been referred, telegraphed said Cofman: "Your license will be extended for a period of ten days for arranging a hearing within that time. Will see your attorney to-morrow."

Thereafter and on the 21st day of August, 1917, with the consent of all parties, a hearing was had before the said commissioner of agriculture and labor, John T. Hagan, the relator personally appearing and offering testimony, and the dairy commissioner being represented by Assistant Attorney General Edward B. Cox. After this hearing the following order was issued by the said commissioner of agriculture and labor:

"State of North Dakota.

"Before Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor, in the Matter of the License of Bernard Cofman to Buy Cream at Hazen, North Dak.

"Order Sustaining Revocation of License.

"The above-entitled matter coming on to be heard on the 21st day of August, 1917, on petition of Bernard Cofman, of Hazen, North Dakota, the petitioner herein being present in person and by his attorney, F. E. McCurdy, and the state dairy commissioner, J. J. Ousterhous, being present in person and represented by Edward B. Cox, assistant attorney general. The commissioner having heard the testimony, the argument of counsel, and being fully advised in the premises, it is ordered and decreed by the commissioner that the order of the dairy commissioner revoking the license of Bernard Cofman, petitioner herein, to conduct a creamery station at Hazen, North Dakota, be in all things sustained and upheld.

"Dated this 15th day of Sept., 1917.

"J. N. Hagan,

"Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor."

Although the petition does not allege that this order was recognized and reaffirmed by the dairy commissioner, it seems to proceed on the assumption that this was done, and the certiorari is asked on the grounds that:

"The evidence in this case shows that, on the particular cream which the dairy commissioner charges was overread in the test for butter fat, it appears that three tests were made: One by the Hazen creamery, which test was 39 per cent; one by the public health laboratory at Bismarck, North Dakota, which tested 41 per cent; and the one by the relator, at 43 per cent. It further appears from the evidence that the Hazen creamery is in direct business competition with the relator, and that the inspector worked with the Hazen creamery in attempting to catch Mr. Cofman, and that at that time he made no effort to catch the Hazen creamery; that the evidence shows that the cream had been hauled over rough country roads, and that it is possible for a partial churning to have taken place, and small particles of the butter fat to have become joined together in small lumps, and that the amount of cream selected for making this test is a very small amount, 18 grams, and that should one of these small particles of butter fat have been found in the 18 grams that the test would be greater, and there might be a variation in the test, after being subject to such process. Furthermore, it appears it would be possible for high variation of the reading of the test because of the fact that cream is placed in a tube of a small diameter for test reading, and that, due to the capillary attraction, the cream has a tendency to be uneven, leaving a depression in the center, and that the test would be difficult to read without using what is known to the trade as a red reader.

"Referring to the weight proposition, there appears from the evidence that, instead of there being one can of cream, there were two cans of cream in the single test, and the two cans were weighed back and considered as one can of cream. These cans of cream were weighed at the same old Hazen creamery, and taken to Cofman's cream station and sold to him, and the empty cans taken back to the general merchandise store and weighed. The evidence doesn't show whether the scales were tested or not, and there is no evidence that the Hazen creamery scales had been tested, and it is correct: That since the hearing a test has been made of the scales of the general merchandise store, and it has been found defective. That the plaintiff and the merchant, one named Jake Krause, weighed this particular can on the same scale, and also on another scale, and found the scale of the general merchandise store defective. This was done since the hearings, as the matter only developed in evidence at the hearing, because no information whatever had been furnished to the plaintiff as to what cans of cream were tested or any particulars concerning the matter. That the state dairy commissioner having made a ruling as stated in the letter dated August 3, 1917, and set out in this petition, it appears that this was not a regular cream can, from the evidence submitted, and that it had been covered with a cloth tied over the top, and when weighed back the cloth was weighed with it, but it appears from the evidence that the cloth was not weighed back with it at the time it was weighed in the store. That a transcript of the evidence taken at the hearing is hereto annexed and referred to, and made a part of this application. That no opportunity was given the plaintiff to offer rebuttal testimony on this particular question, and for that reason these statements are incorporated in this petition.

"There is no competent evidence in the record to show that any false reading was made. In other words, there must be a false reading or manipulation of the Babcock test to be a violation of the law. There is absolutely no evidence of any false reading or manipulation. In other words, as far as the evidence shows, this may have been an exact record of the test which this man read. It may have been an exact reading of the Babcock test, also it may have been an exact reading of a correctly balanced scale which this man read, and in canceling this license the dairy commissioner presumed, and the commissioner of agriculture and labor presumed, things not in evidence, and arbitrarily, without jurisdiction, canceled this man's license.

sioner and the commissioner of agriculture and labor had no jurisdiction to revoke the license of this man for the reason that that portion of the amendment above set out is unconstitutional and void, in violation of § 13 of the Constitution of the state of North Dakota, which provision provides that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, and also article 5 of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States reads to the same effect.

"There being no provision in the Constitution for any hearing or for any trial by any tribunal, and no opportunity for a day in court by which the licensee may protect his right to pursue a lawful business, if this license is revoked it will have the effect of depriving him of his means of livelihood, absolutely ruining his business, and rendering a considerable investment in property valueless, destroy the good will of the business he has worked up in that community, and inflict upon him irreparable financial loss. That the relator has no other adequate means at law or otherwise, and that the said state dairy commissioner and the commissioner of agriculture and labor had exceeded their jurisdiction in canceling the license."

There is no merit in these contentions. The creamery business is essentially a business which is affected with a public interest, and as such is generally subject to governmental regulation. The police power of the state is not limited to regulations necessary "for the preservation of good order or the public health and safety. The prevention of fraud and deceit, cheating and imposition, is equally within the power, and a state may prescribe all such regulations as in its judgment will secure, or tend to secure, the people against the consequences of fraud." 6 R. C. L. 208; State v. Armour & Co.

The purpose of the statute, indeed, is well known, and is to build and to develop the dairying and stock-raising industries of the state. It is to prevent the unfair competition by which the financially stronger foreign creameries, and butter and cheese and ice cream factories, may destroy those of this state by overgrading or overmeasuring until the local creameries are driven to bankruptcy, and then control the grades and the prices. It is in line with the general laws of the state against unfair competition. Though the state may not interfere with interstate commerce, it may prevent fraud of this kind.

It is not historically true, as contended by counsel for appellant, that a person has a natural right to engage in any useful and lawful business, free from legislative interference and control, and that such a business cannot be the subject of a legislative license. A business may be useful, yet the method of conducting it may, unless regulated, be conducive of harm; and in the same way there may be inducements to and avenues of fraud in a perfectly legitimate business, or cases in which danger of fraud should be minimized, even though the business may be useful and harmless; and even a useful business may be so affected with a public interest that it may be properly regulated.

Licenses, indeed, may be imposed not merely for the purpose of acting as temporary permissions to engage in harmful occupations, but in order to so control those that are useful that their operation may be harmless, and that they may really subserve the public good, which, after all, is the basis of all property rights.

License—purpose.

It has never been the law that the state may not exact a license for the purpose of regulation, so that a business which intimately affects the public welfare may be brought within the supervision of the authorities, and that the regulations which are made concerning it may be more easily and certainly enforced. Parker & W. Public Health & Safety, § 276; People ex rel. Lodes v. Health Dept. 189 N. Y. 187, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 894, 82 N. E. 187; 17 R. C. L. 556.

Nor does the fact that chapter 105 of the Laws of 1917, which authorize the dairy commissioner to revoke the licenses in question, does not in terms provide for a hearing or for an appeal, render the statute invalid or the action of the dairy commissioner nugatory. Even if a hearing was necessary,—and on this we express no opinion,—such a hearing was accorded to the petitioner, and even if not before the dairy commissioner,—who, as we view the statute, is an independent officer, and not subordinate in such cases to the secretary of agriculture and labor,—yet before the very person (the secretary of agriculture and labor) whom the petitioner designated, and before whom he desired it to be had.

Even where a hearing is required by the Constitution to be had before an administrative officer is authorized to cancel licenses, or is looked upon as due process of law, it is not always necessary that it shall be provided for by the statute, but is merely a constitutional guaranty to which the authority conferred by the statute is subject.

Nor does the fact that no appeal to the courts is provided for nullify the act; for, without any such provision, it is clear that mandamus will lie in such a case to redress any wrong which is suffered through any arbitrary, tyrannical, or unreasonable action on the part of the officer, or which is based upon false information. People ex rel. Lodes v. Health Dept. supra.

We are satisfied, indeed, that the trial court did not err in denying the writ of certiorari in the case which is before us.

writ of right, but will be granted or denied in the discretion of the court, and according to the circumstances of each particular case, as justice may require.

merits. ferior courts, officers, boards, or tribunals have exceeded their jurisdiction and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy." See § 8445, Compiled Laws 1913.

It is clear that we cannot go into the merits of the case, and cannot determine whether the relator was in fact guilty of fraud in the conduct of his business, in reading of the weights, or in the tests which he applied. These matters are matters of defense at bar, and do not go into the jurisdiction. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. Blakemore, 17 N. D. 67, 114 N. W. 730; State ex rel. Noggle v. Crawford, 24 N. D. 8, 138 N. W. 2; 40 Am. St. Rep. 34, note. The remedy, if any, was by mandamus. 17 R. C. L. 557; People ex rel. Lodes v. Health Dept. supra.

Nor, in any event, can the relator question the right of the dairy commissioner to cancel the license on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the act, and that his business was such that could not be constitutionally licensed. It is clear, indeed, that a person who obtains a license—procuring—effect. license under a law, and seeks for a time to enjoy the benefits thereof, cannot afterwards question the constitutionality of the act when the license is sought to be revoked. Minneapolis, St. P. & S.

Ste. M. R. Co. v. Nester, 3 N. D. 480, 57 N. W. 510; Hart v. Folsom, 70 N. H. 213, 47 Atl. 603; State v. Seebold, 192 Mo. 720, 91 S. W. 491; note in 19 Ann. Cas. 183.

Nor, indeed, do we believe that there is any merit in the contention that the license, when once issued, can only be revoked after conviction in a criminal prosecution. It is true that chapter 103 of the Laws of 1917, in conferring the authority to revoke licenses issued to persons who are authorized to sample or test milk, uses the term "convicted."

It is also true that, although the word "convicted" has not always and in the case of licenses been held to imply a conviction before a court of law (see 1 Words & Phrases, 2d series, 1045; Sawicki v. Keron, 79 N. J. L. 382, 75 Atl. 478), it seems to be generally so construed by the law dictionaries. The revocation in the case at bar, however, is not sought to be had under the provisions of chapter 103, but under those of chapter 105 of the Laws of 1917, which relate, not to those who sample or test milk, but to "every person, firm, or corporation, owning or operating a creamery, cheese factory, . . . butter factory or cream station in this state," and which act was approved on the day after the approval of chapter 103, and contains the clause: "The dairy commissioner may withhold a license from any applicant who has previously violated or refused to comply with any of the existing dairy laws or lawful requests issued by said dairy commissioner, or his authorized assistant. The dairy commissioner may, at any time, revoke a license on evidence that licensee has violated any of the existing dairy statutes, or has refused to comply with all lawful requests of the dairy commissioner or his authorized agents."

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Christianson, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the reasoning or the conclusion reached by my associates in this case, and, in view of the importance of the questions involved, I deem it my duty to indicate the reasons for my dissent. It should be noted at the outset that the object of the license statute involved in this action is regulation, and not revenue. The power to tax is exercised to raise revenue; the police power is exercised to promote the order, safety, health, morals, and general welfare of society. While the police power is not susceptible of exact definition or limitation, the real object of such power, "and that . . . which in its broad sense includes every instance of its exercise, is the securing of the general welfare, comfort, and convenience of the people" (12 C. J. 920); and to that end it may be exercised to meet the changing conditions of society, and "put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare" (Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 55 L. ed. 112, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487; 9 Enc. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 523). Where a subject is within the police power, it is for the legislature, within constitutional limits, to determine what the remedy shall be. The police power, however, is not above the Constitution, but "is always subject to the rule that the legislature may not exercise any power that is expressly or impliedly forbidden to it by the state Constitution." 12 C. J. 929. The object of a police measure must be the public good; and the business sought to be regulated must, in some measure, be affected with public interest. For "no general power resides in the legislature to regulate private business, or prescribe the conditions under which it shall be conducted, . . . so long as the business is not affected with public interest. The merchant, manufacturer, artisan, and laborer, under our system of government, are left to pursue and provide for their own interest in their own way, untrammelled by burdensome and restrictive regulations, which, however common in rude and irregular times, are inconsistent with constitutional liberty." 9 Enc. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 521, 522. And "the legislature may not, under guise of protecting the public interest, deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, arbitrarily interfere with private business, or impose unusual and unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations." 9 Enc. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 523. See also 6 R. C. L. pp. 226-228. But, "to justify the state in interposing its authority in behalf of the public, it must appear that the interests of the public generally, as distinguished from those of a particular class, require such interference." 9 Enc. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 523.

While the legislature, in the exercise of the police power, may regulate all professions, trades, occupations, and business enterprises that are of a quasi public nature, by providing such rules or restrictions as to safeguard the general welfare of the public, such legislative power has its limits, and "is subject to the qualification that the measures adopted for the purpose of regulating the exercise of the rights of liberty and the use and enjoyment of property must be designed to effect some public object which government may legally accomplish, that they must be reasonable, and have some direct, real, and substantial relation to the public object sought to be accomplished, and that the governmental power is not to be arbitrarily or colorably exercised or used as a subterfuge for oppressing some individual or class of individuals. In short, the exercise of the police power is subject to judicial review, and personal and property rights cannot be wrongfully destroyed by arbitrary enactment. If the means employed have no real or substantial relation to the public objects which government may legally accomplish, if they are arbitrary and unreasonable, beyond the necessities of the case, the judiciary will disregard mere forms, and interfere for the protection of rights injuriously affected by such illegal action." 5 Enc. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. pp. 556, 557.

"The police power of the state extends only to such measures as are reasonable, and the general rule is that all police regulations must be reasonable under all circumstances. In every case it must appear that the means adopted are reasonably necessary and appropriate for the accomplishment of a legitimate object falling within the domain of the police power. A statute, to be within this power, must be reasonable in its operation upon the persons whom it affects, and not unduly oppressive. The validity of a police regulation, therefore, primarily depends on whether, under all the existing circumstances, the regulation is reasonable . . . and whether it is really designed to accomplish a purpose properly falling within the scope of the police power." 6 R. C. L. p. 236.

"All statutory restrictions of the use of property are imposed upon the theory that they are necessary for the safety, health, or comfort of the public. . . . Regulation which impairs or destroys, rather than preserves, . . . is within the condemnation of constitutional guaranties." 6 R. C. L. p. 239. See also 12 C. J. 934.

While it is true a license is generally held to be neither a contract nor property, within the technical definitions of those terms, it is nevertheless a personal right or franchise, which in many instances has great value. In the case at bar, for instance, the revocation of plaintiff's license (if sustained) deprives him of the right to pursue the vocation whereby he earns his livelihood, destroys an established business, and casts upon him the odium of having committed illegal acts, and being unworthy of permission to continue in his business. Manifestly, few determinations can in a greater degree affect the rights to acquire, possess, and protect property and reputation, and to pursue and obtain happiness (which are guaranteed to all men by § 1 of the state Constitution), than the determination of the dairy commissioner to revoke petitioner's license.

While the legislature may doubtless confer discretionary powers upon administrative boards or officers to grant, or withhold, or revoke licenses or permits to carry on trades or occupations, or perform acts which are properly the subject of police regulation (although it has been held in some of the state courts "to be contrary to the spirit of American institutions to vest this dispensing power in the hands of a single individual," see Chicago v. Trotter, 136 Ill. 430, 26 N. E. 359; Re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396, 6 Am. St. Rep. 310, 30 N. W. 72; State v. Fiske, 9 R. I. 94; Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 33 Am. Rep. 239; Sioux Falls v. Kirby, 6 S. D. 62, 25 L.R.A. 621, 60 N. W. 156, the regulations must be reasonable, and the power conferred exercised in a lawful and constitutional manner. (17 R. C. L. pp. 538-542). "In such cases the doctrine is, in the absence of anything upon the face of the law to the contrary, that the discretion vested in such tribunal, board, or official is a judicial or legal discretion, and it will not be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that it has been, or is being, used in an unreasonable, arbitrary, or oppressive manner." But when the law vests absolute and arbitrary discretion in a board or official, without right of appeal therefrom, to grant, or refuse, or revoke a license for conducting a legitimate business, or when the power granted to such administrative board or officer is shown to have been arbitrarily exercised under sanction of state authority, the party thus unlawfully oppressed may secure redress in the courts. 4 Enc. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. pp. 368, 369, 372. See also 17 R. C. L. p. 539, note 20.

And even in cases involving revocation of licenses in the exercise of official discretion, the courts have not refrained from inquiring into the facts far enough to ascertain whether the facts presented a case for the exercise of reasonable discretion, or whether the power of revocation had been, or was attempted to be, exercised capriciously, arbitrarily, or oppressively. William Fox Amusement Co. v. McClellan, 62 Misc. 100, 114 N. Y. Supp. 594; Edelstein v. Bell, 91 Misc. 620, 155 N. Y. Supp. 590; Bainbridge v. Minneapolis, 131 Minn. 195, L.R.A. 1916C, 224, 154 N. W. 964.

It should be remembered that the business sought to be regulated by the statutes under consideration is one inherently lawful and beneficial to society. In dealing with licenses for the conduct of business of this nature, the courts have not hesitated to set aside measures vesting arbitrary powers in boards (or especially in a single individual) to issue or revoke licenses, or to set aside the arbitrary acts of such board or individual when acting under a law fair on its face. In Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064, the Supreme Court of the United States held an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco providing that it should be unlawful for any person to engage in the laundry business within the corporate limits "without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone," to be violative of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

In determining the reasonableness of a license statute, the nature of the business sought to be regulated must be considered; for it is self-evident that there is a vast distinction between a license granted for the conduct of a business which is inherently lawful and harmless and relating to a subject which is useful to the community, and one granted for the conduct of a business which is inherently dangerous, or "which ministers to and feeds upon human weakness and passions." Manifestly, conditions and restrictions placed upon licenses of the latter kind, and entirely reasonable as applied to such licenses, might be entirely unreasonable as applied to licenses of the former kind. This distinction was expressly recognized and pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13. That case involved a retail liquor dealer's license. The validity of the ordinance and the action of the police commissioners in refusing to issue a license were assailed. It was asserted that the ordinance was invalid under the principle announced in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra, as a delegation of arbitrary discretion to the police commissioners. In distinguishing the two cases, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "It will thus be seen that that case [Yick Wo v. Hopkins] was essentially different from the one now under consideration, the ordinance there held invalid vesting uncontrolled discretion in the board of supervisors with reference to a business harmless in-itself and useful to the community, and the discretion appearing to have been exercised for the express purpose or depriving the petitioner of a privilege that was extended to others. In the present case the business is not one that any person is permitted to carry on without a license, but one that may be entirely prohibited or subjected to such restrictions as the governing authority of the city may prescribe." 137 U. S. 94, 95.

One of the most effective safeguards against the arbitrary acts of public officials is an opportunity to be heard. And the weight of judicial authority seems to support the doctrine that a person engaged in a business inherently lawful and useful to society may not be deprived of the license to conduct it without opportunity to defend his right to maintain it. The right to a full and fair hearing by an applicant for a license was recognized and upheld in Hart v. Folsom, 70 N. H. 213, 47 Atl. 603 (cited in the majority opinion). And it has been said that the theory that a person may be deprived of a license without an opportunity to be heard in his own defense "is so opposed to the principles of common law that any fact affecting the rights of an individual shall be investigated and determined ex parte, and without opportunity being afforded to the party to be affected thereby to be heard," that a law ought not to be construed as contemplating such procedure unless that purpose is expressed in the plainest terms. State ex rel. Powell v. State Medical Examining Bd. 32 Minn. 324, 50 Am. Rep. 575, 20 N. W. 238.

In considering the question of revocation of a license to practise law, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "Before a judgment disbaring an attorney is rendered, he should have notice of the grounds of complaint against him, and ample opportunity of explanation and defense. This is a rule of natural justice, and should be equally followed when proceedings are taken to deprive him of his right to practise his profession as when they are taken to reach his real or personal property. . . . The principle that there must be citation before hearing, and hearing or opportunity of being heard before judgment, is essential to the security of all private rights. Without its observance no one would be safe from oppression wherever power may be lodged." Ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall. 512, 22 L. ed. 208. See also People use of State Board of Health v. McCoy, 125 Ill. 289, 17 N. E. 786; State v. Schultz, 11 Mont. 429, 28 Pac. 643.

Leaving constitutional consideration on one side, the idea that an individual appointive, administrative official may revoke a license for the conduct of a lawful business, without affording the licensee a full opportunity to be heard, is so contrary to the spirit of our institutions that it ought not be presumed that the legislature intended to confer such power or prescribe such procedure unless it has said so in express terms.

The power to issue and revoke licenses is vested in the dairy commissioner, and no provision is made for an appeal from his decision. The dairy commissioner is appointed by the commissioner of agriculture and labor. Comp. Laws 1913, § 2836. Chapter 103, Laws 1917, empowers the dairy commissioner "to revoke any license issued under the provision of this act if the holder is convicted of a failure to comply with the state dairy laws." And chap. 105, Laws 1917, authorizes the dairy commissioner to "revoke a license, on evidence that licensee has violated any of the existing dairy statutes, or has refused to comply with all lawful requests of the dairy commissioner or his authorized agents." There are many statutory provisions relating to the business of operating creameries and cream stations. The test for milk and cream is carefully and minutely prescribed by the statute (Comp. Laws 1913), § 2853; and it is made a misdemeanor "to use any other means of determining the amount of butter fat in milk or cream than the Babcock test, or to use any other size of milk measure, weight, test tubes, or bottles" than those described in the statute, or "to manipulate, underread, or overread the Babcock test." Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 2853, 2854, 2861.

The words "convicted" and "evidence" have well-settled legal meanings. Manifestly, under our laws no one can be "convicted" without being afforded an opportunity to be heard in his defense, and mere rumors and hearsay statements, not made matters of record, but whispered in secret to a public officer, do not constitute evidence which may form the basis for an official act requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion. Yet in the case at bar the dairy commissioner attempted to revoke a valuable franchise, held by the petitioner, for the avowed reason that the petitioner had committed criminal acts, and this adjudication was made solely upon rumors or hearsay statements, and without the petitioner being afforded an opportunity to be heard.

"When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power The fundamental rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, considered as individual possessions, are secured by those maxims of constitutional law which are the monuments showing the victorious progress of the race in securing to men the blessings of civilization under the reign of just and equal laws, so that, in the famous language of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, the government of the commonwealth 'may be a government of laws and not of men;' for the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra.

The majority members hold that, inasmuch as the petitioner requested and obtained a hearing before the commissioner of agriculture and labor, he is bound by the decision rendered by such official. I believe this conclusion to be erroneous. The commissioner of agriculture and labor is an administrative officer. He has such powers only as are conferred upon him by law. N. D. Const. § 83. It is conceded by the majority members that the commissioner of agriculture and labor has no authority under our statutes to review the actions of the dairy commissioner with respect to the revocation of licenses issued under the dairy statutes. This being so, how can a hearing before him be of any consequence? If such hearing constitutes due process, and the parties become bound by the determination, then by similar process of reasoning it should be held that parties who go before a justice of peace and litigate title to realty, or some other question outside of the justice's jurisdiction, become bound by, and estopped to question the validity of, the decision, or that parties, by submitting a controversy to a person selected by them, clothe the person selected with authority to render a binding decision upon the questions submitted.

It is also suggested in the majority opinion that a party who accepts a license under the provisions of a statute is precluded from assailing the validity of any of the conditions imposed by the statute. Under the view I have taken of the case, the question is not necessarily involved, as, in my opinion, the statutes contemplate that the licensee shall have notice, and full opportunity to be heard, before his license is canceled, and that whatever discretion the dairy commissioner has with respect to the issuance or revocation of licenses must be exercised fairly and impartially, in harmony with the fundamental principles of American institutions.

In this connection, however, I deem it proper to observe that while it is true that a person may, under certain circumstances, waive the right to question the constitutionality of a statute, and may (with certain exceptions) even waive constitutional provisions intended for his benefit, it does not follow that a person who accepts a license will be deemed to have assented to conditions or restrictions sought to be imposed in violation of his constitutional rights.

In considering this question the Supreme Court of the United States said: "The defendant, however, insists that some of the provisions of the statute are in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and if it obtained the required license, it would be held to have accepted all of its provisions, and (in the same words of the statute) 'thereby to have agreed to comply with the same.' Section 1. The answer to this suggestion is that the acceptance of a license, in whatever form, will not impose upon the licensee an obligation to respect or to comply with any provisions of the statute, or with any regulations prescribed by the state railroad and warehouse commission, that are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. A license will give the defendant full authority to carry on its business in accordance with the valid laws of the state and the valid rules and regulations prescribed by the commission. If the commission refused to grant a license, or if it sought to revoke one granted, because the applicant in the one case, or the licensee in the other, refused to comply with statutory provisions or with rules or regulations inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, the rights of the applicant or the licensee could be protected and enforced by appropriate judicial proceedings." W. W. Cargill Co. v. Minnesota, 180 U. S. 452, 45 L. ed. 619, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 423.

See also San Francisco v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 74 Cal. 113, 5 Am. St. Rep. 425, 15 Pac. 380; Hibbard v. State, 65 Ohio St. 574, 58 L.R.A. 654, 64 N. E. 109.

The majority members, also, hold that petitioner has mistaken his remedy. It is stated that his remedy, if any, is mandamus, and not certiorari. Under our statute "the writ of mandamus may be issued . . . to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board or person to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station; or to compel the admission of a party to the use and enjoyment of a right or office to which he is entitled and from which he is unlawfully precluded by such inferior tribunal, corporation, board or person." Comp. Laws 1913, § 8457.

And "a writ of certiorari may be granted . . . when inferior courts, officers, boards or tribunals have exceeded their jurisdiction and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any other plain, speedy and adequate remedy." Comp. Laws 1913, § 8445.

Mandamus lies to compel action to be taken by the inferior body or officer. Certiorari lies to review action which has been taken by an inferior body or officer. 11 C. J. 90; 26 Cyc. 142. While mandamus may be invoked to compel the exercise of official discretion, it cannot compel such discretion to be exercised in a particular way. 26 Cyc. 159. Nor can such discretion be controlled or reviewed by mandamus when it has once been exercised. State ex rel. Dakota Hail Asso. v. Carey, 2 N. D. 36, 49 N. W. 164; Sawyer v. Mayhew, 10 S. D. 18, 71 N. W. 141.

The rule generally prevailing is that only acts judicial or quasi judicial in their nature are reviewable by certiorari. But, under the laws of this state, the writ is not confined to a review of judicial or quasi judicial proceedings, but extends to every case where the inferior courts, officers, boards, or tribunals have exceeded their jurisdiction, and there is no writ of error, appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. State ex rel. Johnson v. Clark, 21 N. D. 517, 131 N. W. 715. See also 11 C. J. 121. And "it is a general rule of the common law that when a new jurisdiction is created by statute, and the court or officer exercising it proceeds in a summary way or in a course not according to the common law, and a remedy for the revision of its exercise is not given by the statute creating it, certiorari will lie." 4 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 73.

In State ex rel. Johnson v. Clark, supra, this court reviewed the action of the city council of the city of Minot in annexing certain territory to such city, and held that the claim "on the part of the petitioner that the city council did not have jurisdiction to act, by reason of the failure to post and print notices" of the annexation proceeding, constituted such attack upon the jurisdiction of the city council as to make it a proper question for review by certiorari. And it seems that the authorities generally hold that action taken without legal notice constitutes an "excess" of jurisdiction, and is reviewable by certiorari. 11 C. J. 105; 4 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 93.

It seems to me that under the rule laid down in State ex rel. Johnson v. Clark, supra, the question raised by the petitioner, that the dairy commissioner exceeded his jurisdiction in revoking the license without giving the petitioner notice and an opportunity to be heard, is one properly reviewable by certiorari. There is no question of fact presented. The questions presented are purely questions of law with respect to the powers and jurisdiction of the dairy commissioner. It is conceded that he revoked petitioner's license without notice, and without affording him an opportunity to be heard; and that the dairy commissioner based his action upon rumors or hearsay statements submitted to him in the absence, and without the knowledge, of the petitioner. In my opinion such action was wholly unwarranted under the statutes, and contrary to the principles of natural justice.

The view I have taken of the statutes involved in this proceeding renders it unnecessary to determine to what extent the legislature may regulate the business of purchasing milk and cream, and I therefore express no opinion as to whether the license regulations contained in chapters 103 and 105, Laws 1917, are reasonable or unreasonable.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

In this case it appears that in August, 1917, at Hazen, North Dakota, Cofman, the appellant, was conducting a cream station under a license from the dairy commissioner, issued in May, 1917. On August 3d the commissioner wrote a letter to Cofman, purporting to revoke his license, and directed him to close his cream station by August 15th. This revoking letter was written without any prior notice to Cofman, and without giving him any hearing or any opportunity to refute the charges made against him. That charge, as stated in the letter, was that he had "overread the cream tester on one can of cream as much as 4 per cent, and that on two cans the weight was 2 pounds short."

Cofman appealed to the commissioner of agriculture and labor, and though the statute does not provide for any such appeal, yet, as a matter of courtesy, Cofman was given a chance to prove his innocence. He claimed that until specific charges were made against him, and until proven guilty by competent testimony, his innocence should be presumed, but the commissioners held that the license was not a property right, and that it was merely a gratuitous permission, which might be revoked without a hearing and without cause. However, without making any formal charge against Cofman and without any findings of fact, the commissioner of agriculture heard evidence and made a grandiloquent order and decree affirming the order of the dairy commissioner. From an order of the district court denying a review by certiorari, Cofman appeals to this court. The whole procedure is based on a gross misconception of the law. A license may, or it may not, involve any property right, but a license to conduct a cream station or a creamery, to practise law or medicine, or to follow any business vocation, is a property right of which a person may not be deprived in an arbitrary manner and without due process of law. By due process of law is meant the law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial.

On May 15, 1917, Cofman was issued a license to conduct a cream station at Hazen. It was issued under chapter 103, Laws 1917. The license is granted to a qualified person for one year upon payment of a fee of $2, and renewed on payment of $1. And the dairy commissioner is given authority to revoke any license if the holder is "convicted of a failure to comply with the state dairy laws." To convict is to prove and find guilty of an offense, crime, or wrong. The statute gives no authority to revoke a license until the holder has been tried and convicted of a failure to comply with the dairy laws. In law there can be no conviction of a wrong without formal written accusation and a fair opportunity for a trial; and until the accused is proven guilty he is presumed to be innocent. He may not be called upon to prove his innocence. He must be confronted with the witnesses against him, and have a reasonable opportunity to cross-question them and to disprove their testimony.

Cofman had none of these opportunities and guaranties. The commission acted as if they had an absolute right to revoke the license without any written accusation or any conviction of wrong.

As the whole record is before this court, there is no reason for a writ directing the dairy commissioner or the secretary to duplicate and certify the same; and in regard to the merits of the case there is no question of doubt. There is no charge or evidence that Cofman did wilfully overread his cream tester or underread the weight of his two cans of cream, and there is no claim that on such reading any person can be always perfect and accurate, or that the cream tester is always perfect and accurate; and the same is true of the different scales used in weighing cream cans; and from the record now before the court it does appear that the revocation of the license and the whole procedure were absolutely void.

a few cases in which a statute has been attacked because the title was not adequate to cover the subject-matter, which, of course, raises no question different from the mass of cases dealing with the accuracy of titles, and, therefore, makes no contribution to the solution of the problems now under consideration. There are also cases dealing with the question whether or not a regulation of a board of health was within the authority conferred upon the board by the legislature, which are omitted from this discussion because they do not involve the constitutionality of the regulation. Cases where the constitutional question was raised, but not passed upon, are also omitted, such as Kansas City v. Cook (1889) 38 Mo. App. 660, where the defendant raised the question of the constitutionality of the ordinance, but waived it in order not to defeat the jurisdiction of the court to which he appealed.

While Owensboro v. Evans (1916) 172 Ky. 831, 189 S. W. 1153, contains much discussion of the reasonableness of an ordinance imposing rather drastic requirements upon applicants for licenses to sell milk, the only constitutional provisions involved are the ones with respect to the titles of statutes, and with respect to the fixing by municipal corporations of different penalties than those imposed by the legislature for the same acts, neither of which have any important bearing upon the general question under discussion in this annotation.

II. General rule.

Milk is a food in more general use than perhaps any other one article. It is a sensitive food, very easily contaminated, and therefore all the regulations which, under the police power, may be made to preserve the purity of food, are properly utilized in the case of milk. But there is something about the possibilities of harmfulness in milk as a food which seems to appeal to the imagination in a way in which other foods do not, and therefore regulations have been made and sustained by the courts which to ordinary common sense seem to be little less than absurd. Very few of the human race have not, at some time in their lives, been more or less dependent on milk for their sustenance, and if all that has been said about its harmfulness were true, very few persons would survive the ordeal of a milk diet. But the fact is they do survive, and this neutralizes, to some extent at least, the extravagant claims that are made with regard to the class of regulations necessary to make milk a fit food. But the fact is that there is scarcely an exception to the rule that the courts will sustain, as a police measure, practically every regulation which is said by the health board to be necessary to the protection of milk as food. Therefore, the decisions uphold not only the regulations for the licensing of dealers, the inspection of cattle, the surroundings in which they are kept, the cleansing of utensils, and provisions against adulteration, but they sustain also the tuberculin test for cattle, and a blood test for peddlers, and have even sustained a regulation requiring dealers to give bond to pay for milk purchased. The uniformity of the rule upholding regulations regarding the production and sale of milk is shown by the following decisions:

III. Delegation of legislative power to boards of health.

The granting to a board of health of power to issue or withhold permits to sell milk within the city limits, in the honest exercise of a reasonable discretion, does not deprive one seeking to carry on such business, and who is refused a permit, of his property without due process of law. New York ex rel. Lieberman v. Van De Carr (1905) 199 U. S. 552, 50 L. ed. 305, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 144, affirming (1903) 175 N. Y. 440, 108 Am. St. Rep. 781, 67 N. E. 913. The court says it will not interfere, because the states have seen fit to give administrative discretion to local boards to grant or withhold licenses or permits to carry on trades or occupations, or perform acts which are properly the subject of regulation in the exercise of the reserved power of the states to protect the health and safety of its people. In the lower court (175 N. Y. 440) it was said: "In great cities, where, in certain sections, life exists under crowded conditions that cannot be fully comprehended unless seen, and where many articles for table consumption by all classes of the community are liable to pass through processes and conditions little short of appalling unless regulated by law, the full and vigorous exercise of the police power in the interests of the public health and general welfare is absolutely essential. It is quite impossible that every offender against the provisions of the Sanitary Code should be accorded due process of law as embracing jury trial and the slow results of the ordinary procedure in the courts. The vesting of powers more or less arbitrary in various officials and boards is necessary if the work of prevention and regulation is to ward off fevers, pestilence, and the many other ills that constantly menace great centers of population. . . . The requirement of § 66 of the Sanitary Code that the relator should not sell milk without a permit is reasonable, and violates neither the Federal nor state Constitution—is in accordance with law and long-established precedent."

The legislature may confer upon a municipal board of health power to adopt a regulation for the preservation of the purity of the milk to be sold in the municipality. People ex rel. Cox v. Special Sessions Justices (1876) 7 Hun (N. Y.) 214. The court says the power to enact and enforce ordinances has always formed an essential feature in the creation of municipal corporations, and the Constitution contains nothing restricting its exercise to any particular part of the municipal body. The ordinance was merely the exercise of municipal authority through the intervention of the board instead of the common council.

The legislature may constitutionally confer on boards of health power to enact sanitary ordinances, such as ordinances to prevent the sale of adulterated milk, which shall have the force of law within the districts over which their jurisdiction extends. Polinsky v. People (1878) 73 N. Y. 65.

IV. Inspection of cattle and dairies.

In Hill v. Fetherolf (1912) 236 Pa.

70, 84 Atl. 677, without naming any specific constitutional provision alleged to have been infringed, the court held that it was within the police power of a city to provide for the inspection of dairies from which milk was to be shipped to the city for sale.

An ordinance is not unconstitutional which requires, as a prerequisite to the issuance of a license for the sale of milk, the examination and testing of milk sold, the examination and inspection of the place where it is produced and of the cattle, the nonuse of milk from diseased cows, and the care of the cows by persons free from disease. Walton v. Toledo (1902) 23 Ohio C. C. 547.

In Creaghan v. Baltimore (1918) 132 Md. 442, 104 Atl. 180, the court, relying largely on prior cases from the state, upheld the constitutionality of a municipal ordinance providing for the inspection and cleanliness of dairies from which milk was brought to the city, and the refusing of permits when proper standards were not maintained.

One of the fiercest controversies in scientific circles in recent years has revolved about the possibility of transmission of bovine tuberculosis to human beings, and the safety and conclusiveness of the tuberculin test as applied to cattle. It has been positively stated that Koch, the discoverer of tuberculin, has taken the position that bovine tuberculosis cannot be transmitted to the human race, and he has quite a respectable following among the medical profession. There are also investigators who have claimed that the tuberculin test for cattle is unreliable as a test, and that it is positively dangerous to the cattle themselves. The health boards, however, have quite generally resolved the doubt in favor of the possibility of transmitting the disease and of the reliability and safety of the tuberculin test, and, where they have required the use of the test, the courts have held the regulation to be constitutional.

In Nelson v. Minneapolis (1910) 112 Minn. 16, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 260, 127 N. W. 445, the court, in passing upon the constitutionality of an ordinance requiring a tuberculin test as a condition to the sale of milk within the city, said that all questions respecting the validity of the ordinance were disposed of in State v. Nelson (1896) 66 Minn. 166, 34 L.R.A. 318, 61 Am. St. Rep. 399, 68 N. W. 1066, which expressly affirmed that a city had power to impose the test as a police regulation. But the question of the constitutionality of the ordinance is not discussed in that case, the questions there discussed being the reasonableness of the ordinance, and whether or not it was authorized by statute. But the court says: "The question of the public health is one of first importance in the regulation and control of human affairs, and all laws or ordinances enacted for that purpose, when not so arbitrary as to be unnecessarily destructive of individual property rights, are uniformly upheld by the courts. Milk constitutes one of the principal articles of our food supply, and the purity thereof, and its freedom from disease germs, are of serious concern to consumers. The methods, regulations, and restrictions to be imposed, to attain, so far as may be, results consistent with the public welfare, are purely of legislative cognizance. The courts have no power to determine the merits of conflicting theories, nor to declare that a particular method of advancing and protecting the public is superior or likely to insure greater safety or better protection than others. The legislative determination of the methods, restrictions, and regulations is final, except when so arbitrary as to be violative of the constitutional rights of the citizen. In the case at bar the city council, duly authorized thereto by legislative grant, determined that the tuberculin test of cows was the most feasible and practicable method of insuring a pure milk supply. This involved a matter of legislative judgment and discretion, and necessarily a comparison with other methods designed to secure the same result, including the theory of pasteurization. The courts cannot make this comparison, weigh the feasibility and the practicability of each, and substitute their judgment and discretion for that of the legislative body whose determination of the question they are called upon to review."

In Adams v. Milwaukee (1911) 144 Wis. 371, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1066, 129 N. W. 518, the constitutionality of an ordinance requiring the tuberculin test for cattle, the milk from which was to be sold in the municipality, was attacked, and the court, after stating that there was considerable difference in opinion as to the efficacy of the test, and also as to whether or not bovine tuberculosis could be transmitted to human beings, said that there was evidence that milk from tubercular cows was harmful to health, and that there was a sufficient basis for a police regulation of its sale and distribution in the city. The court says the evidence, findings, and authorities cited go to show a widespread recognition of the danger of infection from bovine tuberculosis, and of the efficacy of the tuberculin test. When there are conflicting scientific beliefs or theories in such matters, it is for the city council to determine upon which theory it will pass its police regulations.

In New Orleans v. Charouleau (1908) 121 La. 890, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 368, 126 Am. St. Rep. 332, 46 So. 911, 15 Ann. Cas. 46, the ordinance provided for the tuberculin test of all cows whose milk was to be sold within the city, and summary destruction of those found to be infected with tuberculosis. The constitutionality of the ordinance was questioned, but the court held: "It being shown that tuberculosis in a cow may be ascertained by a practically infallible test, and it being further shown that the presence of a cow so affected in a dairy in a city is a serious menace to the public health, the public authorities have the same right to require the destruction of such cow without compensation to the owner, and without judicial inquiry, as they have to require the destruction of decayed fish, meats, and vegetables."

In Hawkins v. Hoyer (1914) 108 Miss. 282, 66 So. 741, a statute permitting the board of health to require the rejection of milk from all cows which reacted to a tuberculin test was held to be constitutional. The principal objections raised were that the statute permitted condemnation of the property by one man, without trial or hearing, and that it took private property without compensation. But the court said: "The legislature, by virtue of the police power of the state, may enact all needful laws for the purpose of preserving the health, preventing the spread of disease, and protecting the lives of the citizens. Under this power the legislature may create boards of health and bestow upon them necessary powers to promote the general health of the people by providing for them healthful conditions. . . . The regulation is within the police power of the state. It is in aid of good health, and consequently tends to the welfare and safety of the people. Tuberculosis is a disease dangerous and destructive to human life. It is recognized that tuberculosis may be communicated to human beings by the use of milk from cows infected with the disease. Therefore, it was proper for the board of health, the body empowered and enjoined by the statute to supervise the health interest of the people and to prevent the spread of epidemic diseases, to make this regulation. . . . There is no purpose therein to deprive a person of property or restrict or interfere with his liberty of action. It is only an inspection provision ordained by the board in its work of supervising and promoting the health interest of the people."

V. Feeding of cattle.

The police power of the state extends to the prohibition of the sale of milk from cows fed on still slop, although there is nothing to show that such milk is not a pure and wholesome article of food. Sanders v. Com. (1903) 117 Ky. 1, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932, 111 Am. St. Rep. 219, 77 S. W. 358. The court says: "The development in the science of bacteriology in recent years has conclusively proved that the microbe is a most potent agent in the propagation of contagious diseases, and that there is no more favorable element for their absorption, growth, and development than milk, and that milk contaminated by their presence communicates diphtheria, typhoid fever, tuberculosis, and other kindred contagious diseases, to human beings, especially to the young. And it is a matter of common knowledge that the conditions usually prevailing around places where 'still slop' is produced are also highly favorable to the development of many forms of bacilli. The heat, dampness, and fermentation—all essential elements in the production of still slop—are favorable to germ growth. So that we may fairly assume that the general assembly, in the enactment of this statute, had sufficient information to justify the belief that milk from cows fed on still slop had ample opportunity to become impregnated with elements dangerous to the public health. Nearly every police regulation affects to some extent property rights; and, whilst this power cannot be made the excuse for oppressive and unjust legislation, the courts are not permitted to say that the legislature may not enact laws apparently necessary for the public health."

In Johnson v. Simonton (1872) 43 Cal. 242, which was an action for libel in charging the feeding of cows whose milk was used for human consumption, on still slops, contrary to municipal ordinance, the court, without much discussion of the constitutional question, says that the statute was one within the constitutional power of the legislature to enact. That if it indeed be a fact that the milk of cows fed in whole, or in part, on still slops, is unwholesome for human food, there can be no doubt of the authority of the city to enact the ordinance.

VI. Fixing standard of milk.

a. In general.

The state may fix the standard of milk to be placed on the market. State, Shivers, Prosecutor, v. Newton (1883) 45 N. J. L. 469; People v. Bowen (1905) 182 N. Y. 1, 74 N. E. 489, reversing (1904) 97 App. Div. 642, 90 N. Y. Supp. 1108; People v. Koster (1907) 121 App. Div. 852, 106

N. Y. Supp. 793; People v. Abramson (1910) 137 App. Div. 549, 122 N. Y. Supp. 115.

And also of cream. People v. Hills (1901) 64 App. Div. 584, 72 N. Y. Supp. 340; People v. Laesser (1903) 79 App. Div. 384, 79 N. Y. Supp. 470.

An ordinance is not unconstitutional because it prescribes a quality standard and forbids the sale of milk which does not comply with it, although the milk sold may be wholesome. St. Louis v. Scheer (1911) 235 Mo. 721, 139 S. W. 434.

The ordinance involved in St. Louis v. Liessing (1905) 190 Mo. 464, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 918, 109 Am. St. Rep. 774, 89 S. W. 611, 4 Ann. Cas. 112, provided that no milk should be offered for sale unless it showed on analysis not less than 3 per cent by weight of butter fat, $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent solids not fat, and $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent ash, provided that, in contested analysis, butter fat should be estimated gravimetrically by the Adams paper coil process, total solids by evaporation and nonfatty solids by difference between total solids and butter fat, and ash by weighing the residue after incineration of total solids at a dull red heat until all the organic matter is destroyed. The constitutionality of the ordinance was attacked on the ground that the production, sale, and distribution of milk are a legitimate and lawful occupation, conducted as a matter of right and not as a privilege, and that unusual and arbitrary restrictions cannot be lawfully imposed upon it by ordinance, nor can harsh, expensive, and burdensome provisions be enacted against persons engaged in an innocent and useful business, so as to deprive them of the right to devote their property thereto, and destroy their freedom and liberty. The court replied that the ordinance was obviously a police regulation, to guard against the sale or dissemination of an unwholesome and injurious quality of milk and cream, and to protect the public against imposition, fraud, and deception as to an article of food almost universally used by the people. The court said the provisions of the Federal Constitution invoked by defendant were not designed to interfere with the exercise of the police power by the states, and they have not shorn the states of their police power to regulate trades and occupations so as to guard against injury to the public, nor to regulate the use of property so as to prohibit that which is injurious and dangerous to the community. "Perhaps on no one subject has this police power been affirmed as often as the right to inspect and regulate the sale of milk and cream. Numerous decisions of courts of last resort sustain the right of cities in safeguarding the health of their citizens, and in the prevention of deception upon them, by fixing a reasonable standard of purity, to be scientifically ascertained, of milk and cream sold within their limits, and prohibiting the sale of milk of the quality inferior to that required by such municipal standard. When the courts have come to deal with such municipal regulation, they have announced the rule that, if the article is universally conceded to be so wholesome and innocuous that the court may take judicial notice of it, the legislature under the Constitution has no right to absolutely prohibit it; but, if there is a dispute as to the fact of its unwholesomeness for food or drink, then the legislature can either regulate or prohibit it. The constitutionality of the law is not to be determined upon a question of fact in each case, but the courts determine for themselves, upon the fundamental principles of our Constitution, that the act of the legislature or municipal assembly is not to be declared void unless the violation of the Constitution is so manifest as to leave no room for reasonable doubt. . . . It will scarcely be asserted that all milk is so wholesome and nutritious that there can be no doubt in the mind of the court of its wholesomeness. To do so would be to deny our common experience, and to condemn legislation on this subject in almost every state in the Union. . . . The specific provision, the validity of which is in question in this case, is that part of § 18 prohibiting the sale of milk showing an analysis of less than $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent of ash. This, in effect, is the same as fixing the amount of milk fats, or solid matter, that the milk must contain, which is one of the nutritious ingredients in milk, and the diminution of which deteriorates the quality of milk in a corresponding degree. Authorities above cited are all in harmony on the proposition that it is perfectly competent, in the interest of the health of a community, to fix the standard of quality, and that there is nothing unreasonable or oppressive in the ordinance in that respect."

And that case was followed in St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. (1905) 190 Mo. 507, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 926, 89 S. W. 627, St. Louis v. Bippen (1907) 201 Mo. 528, 100 S. W. 1048, and St. Louis v. Schottell (1907) — Mo. —, 100 S. W. 1049.

In St. Louis v. Reuter (1905) 190 Mo. 514, 89 S. W. 628, the court applied the rule of the Liessing Case to a requirement that cream should contain not less than 12 per cent of butter fat.

A statute making the sale, or possession for sale, of milk containing less than 12.15 per cent of solids, and 3.35 per cent fat, punishable is constitutional. Com. v. Wheeler (1910) 205 Mass. 384, 137 Am. St. Rep. 456, 91 N. E. 415, 18 Ann. Cas. 319. The court says: "Milk is a very important article of food, which enters largely into the sustenance and development of children. It is the natural food of infants for a considerable time after their birth, and the milk of the cow is often used to supply the deficiency of milk from the mother. Probably there is no other article of diet the purity and good quality of which are so important to the life and health of the people, and especially to the life and health of young children, as are the purity and good quality of milk. It is also very easy to adulterate it, and it may be adulterated, especially by the addition of water, in such a way that nothing but a chemical analysis will detect the adulteration. The legislature, in the interest of the public health, has enacted laws intended to enable the people to obtain milk of good quality that is free from adulteration. No one can question the propriety of legislation upon this subject. If statutes are directed to this end, the methods adopted for accomplishing the object desired, so long as they have some manifest relation to the object, must be left to legislative determination."

In State v. Crescent Creamery Co. (1901) 83 Minn. 284, 54 L.R.A. 466, 85 Am. St. Rep. 464, 86 N. W. 107, which involved the validity of an ordinance making unlawful the sale of cream containing less than 20 per cent of fat, the court says: "The defendant claims that this statute, in so far as it prohibits the sale of cream solely because it contains less than 20 per centum of fat, is unconstitutional, because it is unreasonable and not a proper exercise of the police power, is based upon an arbitrary classification, and is special legislation, and is an unlawful restraint of trade, and illegally restricts the citizen's right to contract and to pursue a lawful calling, and deprives him of his liberty and property without due process of law. . . . We . . . hold that the statute in question forbids, and only forbids, the sale of cream, as such, which is below the prescribed standard. So construed, the statute is a proper exercise of the police power of the state, and is valid. Its constitutionality rests upon the same principles as does the validity of statutes prohibiting the sale of milk unless it contains a prescribed percentage of fat and solids, and other similar statutes."

And that case was followed in State v. Tetu (1906) 98 Minn. 351, 107 N. W. 953, 108 N. W. 470.

In State v. Campbell (1887) 64 N. H. 402, 10 Am. St. Rep. 419, 13 Atl. 585, the court said of a statute fixing the solids which milk must contain to be salable that it clearly applies to the class of police regulations designed to prevent frauds and to protect the health of the people. The court further said the fixing of an arbitrary standard does not render the statute unconstitutional. "The statute tends to discourage the breeding of a certain class of cattle for the supply of the milk market. The difficulty of guarding against the adulteration of milk may have influenced the legislature in fixing a standard of richness. Practically it makes no difference whether milk is diluted after it is drawn from the cow, or whether it is made watery by giving her such food as will produce milk of an inferior quality, or whether the dilution regarded by the legislature as excessive arises from the nature of a particular animal or a particular breed of cattle. The sale of such milk to unsuspecting consumers for a price in excess of its value is a fraud which the statute was designed to suppress. It is a valid exercise by the legislature of the police power, for the prevention of fraud and the protection of the public health, and as such is constitutional."

The legislature may make the sale of milk below the standard criminal, regardless of the intent. People v. Kibler (1887) 106 N. Y. 323, 12 N. E. 795. The court says: "It is notorious that the adulteration of food products has grown to proportions so enormous as to menace the health and safety of the people. Ingenuity keeps pace with greed, and the careless and heedless consumers are exposed to increasing perils. To redress such evils is a plain duty, but a difficult task. Experience has taught the lesson that repressive measures which depend for their efficiency upon proof of the dealer's knowledge and of his intent to deceive and defraud are of little use and rarely accomplish their purpose. Such an emergency may justify legislation which throws upon the seller the entire responsibility of the purity and soundness of what he sells, and compels him to know and to be certain."

A statute forbidding the sale of adulterated food products is not unconstitutional when applied to prevent the sale of a condensed combination of skimmed milk and cocoanut oil, plainly labeled so as not to deceive the public. Hebe Co. v. Calvert (1917) 246 Fed. 711. The court says that since the product is sold as condensed milk there is a possibility of the public being deceived, and that the Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of manufacturing and selling an article offered in such manner as to induce purchasers to believe they are buying something which is in fact different from that which is offered for sale.

That case was affirmed in (1919) 248 U. S. 297, 63 L. ed. 255, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 125, where the court said: "The power of the legislature 'is not to be denied simply because some innocent articles or transactions may be found within the proscribed class. The inquiry must be whether, considering the end in view, the statute passes the bounds of reason and assumes the character of a merely arbitrary fiat.' . . . If the character or effect of the article, as intended to be used, 'be debatable, the legislature is entitled to its own judgment, and that judgment is not to be superseded by the verdict of a jury,' or, we may add, by the personal opinion of judges, 'upon the issue which the legislature has decided.'"

A nonproducing vender of milk is not denied due process of law because he is not permitted to show that milk below the required standard is just as it came from the cow, when that privilege is accorded to a producer of milk. St. John v. New York (1906) 201 U. S. 633, 50 L. ed. 896, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 554, 5 Ann. Cas. 909. The court says: "If we could look no farther than the mere act of selling, the injustice of the law might be demonstrated; but something more must be considered. Not only the final purpose of the law must be considered, but the means of its administration—the ways it may be defeated. Legislation, to be practical and efficient, must regard this special purpose as well as the ultimate purpose. The ultimate purpose is that wholesome milk shall reach the consumer, and it is the conception of the law that milk below a certain strength is not wholesome, but a difference is made between milk naturally deficient and milk made so by dilution. It is not for us to say that this is not a proper difference, and regarding it the law fixes its standard by milk in the condition that it comes from the herd. . . . As the standard established can be proved in the hands of a producing vender, he is exempt from the penalty; as it cannot certainly be proved in the hands of other venders so as to prevent evasions of the law, such venders are not exempt. In the one case the source of milk can be known and the tests of the statute applied; in the other case this would be impossible, except in few instances. We cannot see that any particular hardship results."

An ordinance which fixes the standard of milk to be sold is not invalid because it provides that the analysis shall be made by the city chemist. St. Louis v. Liessing (1905) 190 Mo. 464, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 918, 109 Am. St. Rep. 774, 89 S. W. 611, 4 Ann. Cas. 112.

b. Forbidding adulteration.

The legislature may forbid the sale of unhealthful, adulterated, or unwholesome milk as a police regulation to protect the public health. People v. Cipperly (1885) 37 Hun (N. Y.) 324, reversed on other grounds in (1886) 101 N. Y. 634, 4 N. E. 107.

Forbidding the sale to any butter or cheese factory of milk adulterated with water violates no constitutional right. People v. West (1887) 106 N. Y. 293, 60 Am. Rep. 452, 12 N. E. 610.

Com. v. Waite (1865) 11 Allen (Mass.) 264, 87 Am. Dec. 711, was a prosecution for selling adulterated milk, and the evidence showed that water had been added to the milk. The court said: The defendant argued that "it is innocent and lawful to sell pure milk, and it is innocent and lawful to sell pure water; therefore the legislature has no power to make the sale of milk and water, when mixed, a penal offense unless it is done with a fraudulent intent. But it is notorious that the sale of milk adulterated with water is extensively practised with a fraudulent intent. It is for the legislature to judge what reasonable laws ought to be enacted to protect the people against this fraud, and to adapt the protection to the nature of the case. They have seen fit to require that every man who sells milk shall take the risk of selling a pure article. No man is obliged to go into the business; and by using proper precautions any dealer can ascertain whether the milk he offers for sale has been watered. The court can see no ground for pronouncing the law unreasonable, and has no authority to judge as to its expediency."

In Butler v. Chambers (1886) 36 Minn. 69, 1 Am. St. Rep. 638, 30 N. W. 308, which involved the provisions of the statute relating to the sale of imitation butter, the court referred to the provisions of the statute relating to the sale of impure milk, the care and feeding of the cows, and the sale of adulterated milk, and stated that these provisions of the statute are all unquestionably within the legislative authority.

In St. Louis v. Schuler (1905) 190 Mo. 524, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 928, 89 S. W. 621, an ordinance forbidding the use of any preservative in milk to be sold within the city was upheld as a valid exercise of the police power, as against a contention that it unconstitutionally deprived the owner of his natural rights and liberty, and the natural gains of his own industry, and of his property and liberty without due process of law. The court says that under our system of laws the legislature is empowered to enact all laws necessary to the protection of public health. In this case the legislature was exercising its police power in regard to a subject affecting the public health. The subject-matter, then, was clearly within the powers of the city council. The court continues: "We think the ground upon which this prohibition against the use of preservatives in milk rests is the right of the legislature to pass all needful and proper ordinances to secure the purity of milk, and to prevent any tampering with milk by absolutely prohibiting the use of artificial preservatives therein. . . . It is a matter of common knowledge that milk is a necessary food of the sick and of the infirm, of the old and the young; that through the agency of impure milk the germs of many diseases are disseminated, and, even where there is an absence of any deleterious impurity or the germs of specific diseases, adulterated or diluted milk is not wholesome and nutritious. . . . It cannot be said that the effect of formaldehyde in milk is so well known not to be deleterious that the courts must take judicial cognizance of that fact. That its action is such that it changes the chemical properties of the milk so that it will not sour was established and conceded on the trial, and it was for this reason that it was insisted that, as it preserved the milk from souring, it was claimed to be highly beneficial. We cannot accept this conclusion. It must be recognized that it was a legislative function, in the passage of this ordinance for the preservation of health, to insist that milk should have neither adulterants nor preservatives placed in it, and to inquire as to the effect thereof. . . . The municipal assembly in no manner destroyed or affected the defendant's right of property. He had the right to sell pure and unadulterated milk of the standard prescribed by the ordinance, and the purchaser and the consumer of milk had the right to purchase from him pure milk unmixed with any foreign matter added to it, and this was what the ordinance required, no more and no less, and in so doing it infringed no provision of the organic law of this state or any article of the Federal Constitution.

State v. Schlenker (1900) 112 Iowa, 642, 51 L.R.A. 347, 84 Am. St. Rep. 360, 84 N. W. 698, was a prosecution for mixing boracic acid with milk as a preservative. There was evidence that the acid, in the quantity used, was a harmless preservative, and it was contended that the legislature had no power to forbid the sale, without deceit or fraud, of a harmless and wholesome article of food. The court said this may be true as a general proposition, but it is also true that, in virtue of the police power, it may pass such laws as are or may reasonably appear to be necessary for the health, comfort, and safety of the people. The court says the statute does not deprive the defendant of his property, but it does impose upon him the duty of so using it that no injury will result to others most likely to be affected by a disregard on his part of the reasonable health regulations that it enacts. The court says, with respect to the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, that it is fundamental that it does not impose any restraints on the exercise of the police power of the state for the protection of the safety, health, or morals of the community.

Isenhour v. State (1901) 157 Ind. 517, 87 Am. St. Rep. 228, 62 N. E. 40, was a prosecution under a statute forbidding having in possession adulterated food which consisted of milk containing formaldehyde. The statute was attacked on the ground that it violated the constitutional provision that no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation. This was answered by the statement that it did not appear that any property had been taken, and, therefore, that accused was not in a position to raise that question. The court, however, says this class of legislation emanates from an exercise of the police power for the protection of the public health. The power of the legislature, and its right to determine for itself when an emergency for such legislation exists, and the means and instrumentalities necessary to accomplish the end in view, are no longer a doubtful question.

c. Coloring matter.

In St. Louis v. Polinsky (1905) 190 Mo. 516, 89 S. W. 625, the court, in considering the constitutionality of an ordinance forbidding the adding of coloring matter to milk or cream, so far as it related to the use of annatto which was added to cream to improve its color, and was admitted to be harmless, said: "By adding annatto to the white milk or cream given by winter-fed or poorly fed cows, a deception is practised upon the milk-consuming public by making this milk of inferior quality assume the rich and golden appearance of superior milk. Such conduct is a fraud and deception upon the public, and an unfair advantage over honest competitors who refuse to resort to such deception, against which the ordinance is leveled."

d. Certification or Pasteurization.

In Pfeffer v. Milwaukee (1920) 171 Wis. 514, 10 A.L.R. 128, 177 N. W. 850, an ordinance requiring either certification of milk, which implied its passing the tuberculin test, or Pasteurization by either the holding or flash method, was attacked, but the court, after describing the benefits of Pasteurization, says: "In the light of these known facts and practices regarding the Pasteurization treatment of milk to destroy pathogenic germs, and the systems of inspection and certification to make it a healthful food and preserve it in that state in the process of distribution among the people of the city, it cannot be said that the common council of the city has provided unreasonable and oppressive regulations for the promotion of the public health of the people, nor that the powers conferred on the health officer for the enforcement of the ordinance are unreasonable, or prejudicial to the private rights and property interests of the plaintiffs and others similarly situated."

In Koy v. Chicago (1914) 263 Ill. 122, 104 N. E. 1104, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 67, which involved the validity of an ordinance requiring the installation of registering apparatus on Pasteurizing plants, no specific clause of the Constitution is referred to as being infringed; but the court says legislators and city councils, in the exercise of the police power, may prohibit all things hurtful to the health and safety of society, even though the prohibition invade the right of liberty or property of the individual. The court says: "Not only may laws and ordinances require that milk offered for sale shall be pure, wholesome, and free from the bacilli of any disease, but they may and do, in order to produce this result, prescribe the manner in which such purity, wholesomeness, and freedom from disease shall be secured and made to appear. The cows may be required to be registered with a designated public authority; the dairies to be conducted and managed according to prescribed regulations, and, together with the dairy utensils, subjected to inspection; the receptacles in which milk is contained to be of prescribed character and capacity; the labels to be placed according to fixed regulations and to contain certain required information; the milk to be prepared in the manner, at the times, and by the means directed, and at all times to be subject to inspection. These may be drastic restrictions upon a private business, but experience and the increasing knowledge of the causes of disease and the agencies of its propagation have demonstrated the necessity of such restriction to the preservation of the public health."

e. Arbitrary declaration of adulteration or unwholesomeness.

A provision that milk below a certain specified standard shall be deemed to be adulterated is not unconstitutional. State v. Smyth (1883) 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344. The court says: "Defendant contends that the section is unconstitutional, because, as he alleges, it establishes a rule of evidence and makes it conclusive of the guilt of the accused. We do not take this view of the section. It does not establish a rule of evidence, but creates, or rather defines, an offense. It was the purpose of the statute to prohibit, not only the dealing in milk which had been adulterated, but also in milk of such inferior quality as to fall below the standard named in § 3. It is equally a fraud on the buyer, whether the milk which he buys was originally good and has been deteriorated by the addition of water, or whether in its natural state it is so poor that it contains the same proportion of water as that which has been adulterated. . . . If a cow habitually gives milk of a quality so poor as to come within the statute, or, as the defendant puts it in his brief, so poor that as a commercial commodity it is valuable only for the purposes of irrigation, she is of no value as a milk producer, and can have none as such to her owner, unless he can sell her milk to his unsuspecting neighbors for a price greatly in excess of its value—a species of fraud which ought not to be tolerated. The section is but a slight extension of the provision which prohibits the sale of adulterated milk, and, like that, was designed to protect the public against imposition. We think it is a valid exercise by the legislature of the police power incident to the state.” And that case was followed in State v. Groves (1885) 15 R. I. 208, 2 Atl. 384.

In People v. Cipperly (1886) 101 N. Y. 634, 4 N. E. 107, it was held on the opinion of Learned, P. J., in the general term of the supreme court (1885) 37 Hun, 319, that a provision that milk containing less than a certain percentage of solids shall be declared to be adulterated did not deprive the owner of his property without due process of law. The judge said: “The defendant takes the broader ground that the legislature cannot, under the Constitution, prohibit the sale of milk drawn from healthy cows, which, in its natural state, falls below the standard fixed by the act, unless such milk, or the articles made from it, are in fact unwholesome or dangerous to public health. How is that question of fact to be determined? The court cannot take judicial notice whether milk below the standard is or is not unwholesome or dangerous to public health. Is that to be a question for the jury? If so, the court must charge a jury, in each case, that, if they find milk below that standard to be unwholesome, then the statute is constitutional; if they find it to be wholesome, then the statute is unconstitutional. Evidently a constitutional question cannot be settled, or rather unsettled, in that way. The constitutionality would vary with the varying judgments of juries. Either, then, the legislature can, under the Constitution, forbid the sale of milk below a certain standard, whether such milk be in fact wholesome or not, or else they cannot do this, whether that milk be in fact wholesome or not. If they may fix a standard, they must judge whether or not milk below that standard is wholesome. . . . An examination of the present law clearly shows that it relates to, and is appropriate to promote, the public health. Whether its details are wise we do not know. But its object is evident and is good. . . . The present law only says that a sale of milk below a certain standard is a sale of adulterated milk within the meaning of the law; that a sale of milk from cows fed on distillery waste, or from cows within a certain time of parturition, is a sale of unwholesome milk within the meaning of the law. This is not a rule of evidence, but an explanation of the meaning of the words used in the statute. . . . If the legislature, knowing the difficulty of guarding against the watering or other adulteration of milk, deem it best to fix a standard of richness, I think this is within their power, and that, too, irrespective of the question whether the milk is diluted after it is taken from the cow, or whether it is made watery in the animal itself, by giving such food as will produce a great flow of what might well be called milk and water.”

The majority of the general term held that the provision requiring the milk to be declared unwholesome if it contained less than the required percentage of solids was unconstitutional. It says due process of law gave to the defendant the right to contest the allegation that the milk was adulterated or impure, or unwholesome. There can be no trial if the statute requires judgment to be pronounced against the defendant upon proof by the state of some fact not in issue. The legislature cannot make certain facts conclusive evidence, which in their nature are not so. The court says: “If the legislature can compel the courts to render judgment contrary to their convictions of the truth, produced by the evidence, then the legislative power can coerce the judicial power; a proposition destructive of the co-ordinate departments of the government. . . . The . . . section of the act which requires that, upon a trial for selling adulterated milk, the milk shall be declared adulterated if it do not contain the percentage of ingredients specified in the statute, is beyond the legislative power, because it deprives the defendant of his liberty and property without due process of law, in that it deprives him of the right, upon the trial of the charge against him, to have the issue determined according to the evidence of the fact, and compels him to submit to the statutory declaration thereof, without having the truth ascertained."

The ruling of the court of appeals in that case was followed in People v. Beaman (1905) 102 App. Div. 152, 92 N. Y. Supp. 295, and People v. Eddy (1891) 35 N. Y. S. R. 146, 12 N. Y. Supp. 628.

A statute is not unconstitutional for providing that milk, shown by the analysis of the public officer to contain a deficiency in solids, shall be deemed to be adulterated. State, Shivers, Prosecutor, v. Newton (1883) 45 N. J. L. 469. The court says: "In interpreting the significance of this clause, I think it is obvious that its design is to include within the kind of prohibited milk such as shall not possess a certain standard of excellence. I think the standard so fixed was not intended to mark the absolute line between pure and diluted milk. The placing of the standard was to set up a mark to indicate where, in the judgment of the legislature, the salubrity or fair commercial value of milk ceased to exist. The section does not mean that the result of the analysis shall be conclusive evidence that the milk, has in fact, been adulterated, but it does mean that milk below a certain standard shall not be sold; therefore, when analysis discloses that condition, it shall be, for the purposes of the act, considered adulterated, so that by force of the other sections it thereby becomes prohibited."

In Com. v. Evans (1882) 132 Mass. 11, a statutory provision that milk shall be deemed to be adulterated if it contain less than 13 per cent of solids is constitutional. The court says this belongs to the class of police regulations designed to prevent frauds and to protect the health of the people, which it is within the constitutional power of the legislature to enact.

1. Compulsory evidence.

An ordinance for regulation of sale of milk is not invalid as requiring one to give evidence against himself, or as depriving him of his property without due process of law, because it requires him to furnish a small quantity of milk free for analysis by the city chemist. St. Louis v. Liessing (1905) 190 Mo. 464, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 918, 109 Am. St. Rep. 774, 89 S. W. 611, 4 Ann. Cas. 112.

Requiring dairymen to furnish, without compensation, samples of the milk sold by them for analysis, does not violate constitutional provisions against being required to furnish evidence against oneself, or against taking property without compensation or due process of law, or depriving the owner of the equal protection of the laws, or guaranteeing against unreasonable searches and seizures. State v. Dupaquier (1894) 46 La. Ann. 577, 26 L.R.A. 162, 49 Am. St. Rep. 334, 15 So. 502. The court says: "Defendant has selected as a business one which, improperly conducted in the hands of unscrupulous men, would seriously affect the health of the public. It is no longer a debatable question whether callings of that character can be legally brought under reasonable restraints and regulations through the exercise of the police power. The object of the ordinance in question is to protect the general public against dishonest venders of milk; its effect will be not only not to injure appellant, but to protect him as a member of the public from that class of persons, and incidentally to save him as an honest vender in that business from injurious competition through fraudulent devices and ill practices. Honest venders could certainly see nothing to flow from the ordinance but proper and beneficial results; they certainly should raise no complaint at having their own actions brought to a test, when in so doing they purge the business of disreputable characters."

A provision authorizing inspectors to enter a carriage used in the conveyance of milk, and take specimens of milk found therein for analysis, is constitutional. Com. v. Carter (1882)

132 Mass. 12. The court says: "It is contended that this provision is unconstitutional, because it authorizes the taking of property without consent or compensation; warrants unreasonable searches and seizures, compels one to furnish evidence against himself, and is not within the police power of the commonwealth. An analysis of a specimen of milk offered for sale is an appropriate means of carrying into effect the various provisions of the statutes regulating the sale of milk in this commonwealth. . . . The power granted is not in violation of the provision . . . of the Declaration of Rights that no subject shall be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against, himself. If the seizure is such as is authorized by the Constitution and a law passed in pursuance thereof, the fact that the thing seized may be used in evidence, in a criminal charge against the person from whose possession it is taken, does not render the seizure itself a violation of the Declaration of Rights. . . . If the statute had required that all milk offered for sale should first be inspected, it would hardly be contended that the trifling injury to property occasioned by taking samples for inspection would be such a taking of private property for public use as to require that compensation be made therefor. Such an injury to property is a necessary incident to the enforcement of reasonable regulations affecting trade in food. Private property is held subject to the exercise of such public rights, for the common benefit; and, in the case of licensed dealers in merchandise, the injury suffered by inspection is accompanied by advantages which must be regarded as a sufficient compensation. . . . Such a seizure of milk for the purposes of examination is a reasonable method of inspection, and does not require a warrant. It is a supervision under the laws, by a public officer, of a trade which concerns the public health, and is within the police power of the commonwealth."

One who voluntarily furnishes samples of milk for analysis cannot attack the validity of the ordinance on the ground that it unconstitutionally compels him to furnish evidence against himself. State v. Stone (1894) 46 La. Ann. 147, 15 So. 11.

g. Summary destruction.

Providing for destruction of all milk taken from cows not subjected to the tuberculin test, as soon as it is brought into the city, is not unconstitutional. Nelson v. Minneapolis (1910) 112 Minn. 16, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 260, 127 N. W. 445. The court says: "Whether the ordinance, in so far as it authorizes the seizure and destruction of milk taken from uninspected cows and brought within the city for sale in violation of the ordinance, so violates the constitutional rights of plaintiffs, and constitutes a taking of their property without due process of law, is the important question in the case. It is urged that before destroying the milk the authorities should be required to ascertain whether it is in fact unwholesome and unfit for food, and that to permit them to destroy the same without regard to whether it is, or is not, free from disease germs, authorizes a taking of property for public use without compensation, and is not that due process of law guaranteed by the Constitution. It is further claimed, with respect to the enforcement of police regulations, that power in the municipal officers, if constitutional rights be respected, must be limited to those methods that will work the least injury to private rights. Counsel's argument in support of their theory of the law is plausible and forceful, but we are unable to concur therein. The council determined that the tuberculin test was a reasonable, and the most practicable, method of insuring purity in the milk brought into the city. To enforce the regulation the council had the power to impose such penalties as would render the regulation effective, and serve the purpose intended. It provided, in addition to fine and imprisonment, a destruction of the condemned milk. The authorities sustain regulations of this character. It is, in fact, the only feasible method of preventing contaminated or unwholesome milk from reaching the citizens, and to enforce or compel a compliance with the ordinance. A mere fine or imprisonment of the offender would not prevent the milk reaching the consumers; but its destruction, when brought into the city, is effective for all purposes. This authority must be sustained, unless it is to be held as a matter of law that the city should either determine that the milk is in fact impure, or, in the interests of the dairymen, establish and maintain a Pasteurization plant, in which all milk brought into the city may be purified and rendered wholesome."

In Deems v. Baltimore (1894) 80 Md. 164, 26 L.R.A. 541, 45 Am. St. Rep. 339, 30 Atl. 648, the court, in considering the constitutionality of an ordinance which provided for summary destruction of milk which did not meet certain tests of a lactometer and litmus paper, said: "To justify such interference with private rights, its exercise must have for its immediate object the promotion of the public good, and, so far as may be practicable, every effort should be made to adjust the conflicting rights of the public and the private rights of individuals. At the same time, the emergency may be so great, and the danger to be averted so imminent, that private rights must yield to the paramount safety of the public; and to await, in such cases, the delay necessarily incident to ordinary judicial inquiry in the determination of private rights would defeat altogether the object and purposes for which the exercise of this salutary power was invoked. Whatever injury or inconvenience one may suffer in such cases, he is, in the eye of the law, compensated by sharing the common benefit resulting from the summary exercise of this power, and which, under the circumstances, was absolutely necessary for the protection of the public. The use of milk as an article of food enters largely, as we all know, into the daily consumption of every household, and there is no more fruitful source of disease than the use of adulterated and unwholesome milk. And if the appellant's contention be right that the question, whether or not milk, which is daily offered for sale in every part of a large and populous city, comes up to the standard prescribed by the ordinance, must be determined by the ordinary process of judicial investigation, or by chemical analysis, it would be impossible to prevent the danger to the public health necessarily resulting from impure and unwholesome milk. And it is absolutely necessary, therefore, that the appellee should have the power to provide for its inspection by proper means and instruments, and if, upon such inspection, it shall be found not to come up to the standard prescribed by the ordinance, to direct that the offending thing shall be destroyed."

A provision for destruction of milk, or its return to the consignor, if found below the required standard, is not unconstitutional. State, Shivers, Prosecutor, v. Newton (1883) 45 N. J. L. 469. The court says: "That the title to all private property is held subject to the paramount consideration of the health and safety of the entire public is too well settled for discussion. It is equally well established that the authority inherent in the state, under the title of police power, enables the legislature to fix upon certain kinds of property, or upon the manner in which property is used, the brand of noxiousness to public safety or health. And when the character of a nuisance has been so affixed to property or its use, it is a frequent exercise of legislative power, in addition to the visitation of a penalty to be recovered by action, or imprisonment upon conviction under indictment, to also provide for the abatement of the nuisance itself by means of a seizure and destruction of the property itself."

An ordinance authorizing the seizure and destruction of milk held for sale, when below the required standard of wholesomeness, does not violate the constitutional provision against depriving one of property without due process of law. Blazier v. Miller (1877) 10 Hun (N. Y.) 435. The court says its justification rests upon the immediate and imminent danger to life and health, which it is designed to avert.

Milk kept for sale at a temperature of more than 50 degrees may be declared to be a nuisance, and summarily destroyed, without depriving the owner of his property without due process of law. Kaiser v. Walsh (1906) 4 Ohio N. P. N. S. 507, 17 Ohio Dec. 324.

The confiscation and destruction of milk intended to be sold within a city, which has been drawn from cows which have not been subjected to the tuberculin test as required by municipal ordinance, does not unconstitutionally deprive the owner of his property without due process of law. Adams v. Milwaukee (1911) 144 Wis. 371, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1066, 129 N. W. 518, affirmed in (1913) 228 U. S. 572, 57 L. ed. 971, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 610. The evidence tended to show that the milk which plaintiff attempted to sell was from healthy cows, and produced under sanitary surroundings, but the court said ordinances may be enacted for the abatement of public nuisances and the preservation of public health. "When the nuisance is abated by destruction of property, there must exist a necessity for resorting to this drastic and unusual method of enforcement. A case must be presented in which the usual sanction of fine or imprisonment, or the abatement by suit in court, or, indeed, any milder or slower mode of dealing with the offender than destruction of his property, would be inadequate to preserve the public health or safety. 'Salus populi est suprema lex.' And, in all ordinary cases of destruction of property under such authority, the property owner may resort to the courts and recover his damages by proving that the property which was destroyed as a nuisance, or as dangerous to the public health or safety, was not such in fact. . . . In this way the law attempts to harmonize the clash of legal rules, and vindicate at once the right of property, including the right of the owner thereof to due process of law, and also the public right to preservation of its health and safety. The situation here disclosed, with about 3,500 8-gallon cans of milk arriving daily in the city; the fact that the milk will sour and become practically worthless as a beverage in twenty-four hours or less of summer weather; the impossibility of imposing or enforcing fines provided in a city ordinance upon shippers residing and remaining out of the city; the fact that imprisonment of the offender would not prevent the milk reaching the consumer; the futility of proceeding by fine and imprisonment against the carrier or consignee; the impossibility of allowing this enormous quantity of milk to remain at the delivery depots, reeking and rotting, a breeding place for pathogenic bacteria and insects, during the period necessary for notice to the owner and resort to judicial proceedings; together with the necessity for effectually preventing any of such milk from being used—all establish a situation in which it may be said that the common council had the right to decide that the destruction of the milk is the only available or efficient penalty for the enforcement of the ordinance, and that such destruction was necessary."

An ordinance requiring the capacity of milk containers to be indelibly stamped on them, and making it an offense to have in possession, with intent to use it, any container of less capacity than is indicated upon it, is a valid exercise of the police power, and violates no constitutional right. Chicago v. Bowman Dairy Co. (1908) 234 Ill. 294, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 684, 123 Am. St. Rep. 100, 84 N. E. 913, 14 Ann. Cas. 700. The court says: "Milk and cream are articles of general consumption. They are usually sold by the pint or quart, and, while each transaction involves but a few cents, the number of such transactions in a large city like Chicago daily reaches a large sum. The opportunities for fraud in their sale are great, and the ordinary legal remedy afforded the individual consumer to protect himself against fraud or deceit is wholly inadequate. Clearly, therefore, an ordinance like the one under consideration is valid, and is not obnoxious to any of the provisions of the state or national Constitution."

b. Identification.

Forbidding the use for milk or cream of receptacles marked with the names of other dealers is not unconstitutional. Jury v. State (1912) 35 Ohio C. C. 514.

c. Sealed containers.

No constitutional right is infringed by forbidding a milk dealer to deliver dipped milk, but requiring it all to be put up in sealed containers. Mannix v. Frost (1917) 100 Misc. 36, 164 N. Y. Supp. 1050, affirmed in (1917) 181 App. Div. 961, 168 N. Y. Supp. 1118.

In State v. Stokes (1916) 91 Conn. 67, 98 Atl. 294, the court held that an ordinance requiring milk sold in stores, bakeries, and butcher shops to be kept in sealed bottles, while not requiring it to be so kept when sold by dairymen or farmers, having for its purpose the preservation of the public health, and being adapted to that end, was within the police power, and not a violation of the Constitution. The court says: "The ordinance applies to a class of dealers who keep milk for sale under circumstances making it peculiarly liable to contamination from bacteria, from the fact that it is liable to be kept for a considerable period under conditions exposing it to such contamination. The language used shows that the ordinance was intended to apply to milk kept for sale in these establishments, and not to sales by farmers or dairymen who may supply such establishments and others with milk. It does not attempt to prevent the sale of milk, whether the same be standard, adulterated, or impure. It is a mere regulation of the manner in which the milk shall be contained before and at the time of the sale, for the purpose of supplying a safeguard to the public. It applies to a class of dealers whose methods of handling the commodity seemed, in the judgment of the board of commissioners, to require regulation in the interest of the public health. Applied to such a class, the regulation is not unjustly discriminating."

In People v. Frudenberg (1913) 209 N. Y. 213, 103 N. E. 166, a provision,

"nor shall any person receive or have in his possession any such receptacle [i. e., one used in the transportation and delivery of milk and cream] which has not been washed after holding milk or cream, or which is unclean in any way," was held to mean, not that it could not be reclaimed by the dealer unless it was washed, but that it should be washed by him without delay, and, as so interpreted, the act was held to be constitutional. The facts of the case were that accused, a driver in charge of the delivery wagon, in making his rounds, gathered up the empty bottles and took them to the railroad station where they were to be shipped to the dairy for washing and refilling, instead of taking them to the nearest sterilizing plant in the city for the performance of that service, and the court held him liable for failure to comply with the law. The dissenting judge says: "This enactment forbids the purveyor of milk from resuming possession of the bottles in which the milk has been furnished to the customer unless such bottles have been cleaned before they are taken back. The vender is not given a reasonable time within which to clean them; he is not given any time at all. If he has such receptacles in his possession which have not been washed after holding milk, he is liable to fine and imprisonment, no matter how short may be the duration of his possession, and although he proceeds to cleanse the bottles with the utmost celerity. He may not receive them if they are unwashed. It seems to me too clear for argument that such an ordinance deprives the milk dealer of his property without any neglect or wrongdoing on his part. He cannot lawfully regain it unless the consumer, over whom he has no legal control, has previously cleansed the receptacle in which the milk was furnished." The lower court said that a strict construction of the law was precisely what was intended. It was of opinion that the statute was not unreasonable, and was within the police power of the state. It does not deprive the milk company of its property, but merely requires it, before accepting a bottle, or other receptacle, from a customer, to insist that the customer shall observe the law and wash out the receptacle. This can be done easily, by ceasing to deliver milk to a customer who refuses to obey the law, or by lodging an information against the persistent lawbreaker. The court further says the law is undoubtedly drastic, but the danger to be apprehended from the use of unclean receptacles for milk intended for human food is so obvious and so well-known that drastic measures to prevent the possibility of such use are reasonable and justifiable.

In State ex rel. Lowry v. Davis (1911) 1 Tenn. C. C. A. 550, an ordinance relating to the licensing of milk dealers was attacked for unconstitutionality, and several matters are considered in the opinion, but the only provision which appeared to affect the complaining party required the maintenance of a wash room for empty milk receptacles, separate from the place where the milk was kept. The court held that this requirement was reasonable, which, under the circumstances, meant constitutional, saying: "It is shown that empty milk cans teem with bacteria; that if they are washed in the room where the milk is kept that the milk becomes contaminated and unwholesome. . . . We do not see that a compliance with this rule would be unreasonably expensive, or place any undue hardship upon the relator. If the facts proven by the bacteriologist in this case are true, the observance of this rule is absolutely necessary to preserve the purity of the milk, and we are constrained to hold that this provision of the ordinance is entirely reasonable. . . . We would hesitate to pronounce an ordinance invalid which had for its purpose the regulation of the milk supply of a great city like Memphis. As before stated, it is a necessary article of food; it is the food of the infant and of the sick and infirm; it must be kept wholesome and free from impurities, otherwise the health of the people may become greatly impaired; and to use an unwholesome milk may result in death. We think it of the utmost importance that those who sell a commodity of this kind to a large city should observe all necessary rules and regulations necessary to preserve the purity of the milk which they offer for sale, and the disposition of a party to resist these wholesome regulations indicates an improper spirit, and shows the necessity of the regulation. A person who will resist reasonable regulations, in our opinion, would put upon the market his milk in any manner permitted, without reference to its wholesomeness, and with little concern for the result which might follow the sale of impure milk."

VIII. License.

a. In general.

The reported case (COFMAN v. OUSTERHOUS, ante, 219) holds that requiring owners or proprietors of cream stations to take out a license, which may be revoked on evidence that the licensee has violated any of the existing dairy statutes, is constitutional.

In St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. (1905) 190 Mo. 492, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 936, 89 S. W. 617, an ordinance requiring milk venders to register with the health commissioner, and pay a fee therefor, was attacked as violating constitutional provisions protecting property rights, etc. The court, however, said it was clearly a valid police regulation looking to the protection of the health, and ministering to the welfare, of the public. The fact that the selling of milk is a lawful trade or business does not exempt it from reasonable police regulations. The court says: "When it is considered that no article of food is more universally used by the public, and that no other article is perhaps so sensitive to atmosphere and vegetable influences as milk, and that it is within common knowledge that impure milk is a fruitful source of disease and disorders, especially among children, it needs no discussion to show that the milk business is one which particularly falls within the power of the state and its municipalities to regulate."

An ordinance will not be declared void for exaction of a fee for licenses to milk dealers, if the revenue derived therefrom is not disproportionate to the cost of the enforcement of the ordinance and the regulation of the business to which the ordinance applies. Littlefield v. State (1894) 42 Neb. 223, 28 L.R.A. 588, 47 Am. St. Rep. 697, 60 N. W. 724.

In Norfolk v. Flynn (1903) 101 Va. 473, 62 L.R.A. 771, 99 Am. St. Rep. 918, 44 S. E. 717, an ordinance requiring a license to sell milk and prohibiting the sale of impure, adulterated, or unwholesome milk, prescribing a test of what constitutes pure milk, and requiring free inspection and test of milk sold in the city, and exacting a fee to cover the expenses of the inspection, was held to be a valid exercise of the police power.

b. Blood test.

A regulation of the health department, requiring a blood test from all applicants for license to peddle milk as a precaution against typhoid fever, was upheld in People ex rel. Schulz v. Hamilton (1916) 97 Misc. 437, 161 N. Y. Supp. 425. The court says: "The requirement of a blood test as a condition for a license to sell milk and cream seems to be a fair and reasonable precaution to protect the public against any increase of typhoid. Milk is a particularly sensitive product, produced under conditions which, if not regulated and controlled, may carry and disseminate the germs of typhoid, or other diseases, and spread them in the community. It is the chief food of infants, and lies at the basis of their health and strength. It may be heated, sterilized, or Pasteurized; but even then contact with unclean utensils or unclean human beings may make it the carrier of disease germs. Unlike other articles of food, it cannot be washed and otherwise cleansed in the home. The impurities may be hidden from sight, and thus a sense of security engendered which may render it a still more serious menace to health. Under these conditions it would seem to impose no unreasonable hardship upon a dealer in milk or cream to require him to submit to a blood test, to make sure that he has not had typhoid and is not a typhoid carrier. That typhoid is a contagious disease and may be transmitted by one afflicted with the disease is a matter of common knowledge, and the court will take notice of that fact without proof. . . . The court will also take notice of the fact that an examination of a drop of blood will reveal whether or not the person from whom it has been taken has had typhoid. This may not be universally held by scientific men, or universally believed by the people; but, until science disproves the value of the test, it will be accepted by the courts as true. . . . This rule does not infringe upon the civil rights of the individual. Government has been instituted among men for their mutual protection, and no man has the right to make himself or his business a menace to the public health. Take away the regulation and control of individual rights, and organized society would break up into its original elements. Under organized society all rights are subject to such reasonable regulations as may be deemed by the governing authority essential to the society, health, peace, good order, and morals of the community. It is a part of the social compact that government shall be maintained for the common good, for the protection and safety of property, and the happiness of all the people, and that of any particular individual, class, or group of men must give way to the welfare of all." That case was, however, reversed on the ground that there was no statutory authority for prescribing the test sought to be enforced, in (1919) 188 App. Div. 783, 177 N. Y. Supp. 222.

c. Provision for paying bills.

Requiring a bond for payment of debts, or a deposit of securities with a public official, by one seeking to engage in the business of purchasing milk within the state for shipment to market, is valid. People v. Beakes Dairy Co. (1918) 222 N. Y. 416, 3 A.L.R. 1260, 119 N. E. 115. The court says: "This statute points to protection from the probability of financial loss rather than fraud, and goes far beyond any mere licensing statute, by requiring the licensee to give security for payment of his debts to purchasers. . The business regulated is not done with ignorant people, the chosen and easy prey of the cunning and unscrupulous impostor. It is done with men of ordinary intelligence, fully conscious of what they are about.

. . . It is urged that so much of this statute as aims to compel certain purchasers of milk to pay their debts, measured by the standards of the obligations of the state to its citizens as we now understand them, is a hateful interference with the freedom of men to transact ordinary business, not affected with a public interest, with other men as they see fit; that its implication is that bad debts may be secured or prevented by the exercise on the part of the state of its power to regulate trades and callings; that this is a doctrine of paternalism, in direct conflict with our judicial notion of liberty under the Constitution." The court held that the regulation was a valid exercise of the power over a domestic corporation, saying: Defendant is a corporation created by this state, and, therefore, has no natural right to purchase milk without obtaining a license on such terms as the state directs. The court affirmed the decision of the appellate division in (1917) 179 App. Div. 942, 166 N. Y. Supp. 209, because of a defect of pleading, but the lower court had taken the position that the statute was class legislation, and not a valid exercise of the police power, which question the court of appeals holds that defendant is not in a position to raise.

d. Revocation.

A public officer cannot be empowered to revoke a license to sell milk, merely because satisfied that the licensee is unable properly to conduct the business, or intends to deceive, or defraud customers, without notice and an opportunity to be heard. People ex rel. Levy Dairy Co. v. Wilson (1917) 179 App. Div. 416, 166 N. Y. Supp. 211.

But in People ex rel. Lodes v. Health Dept. (1907) 189 N. Y. 187, 13 L.R.A.

(N.S.) 894, 82 N. E. 197, it was held that no constitutional rights were impaired by revocation of license to sell milk without notice or hearing. The court says: "Milk is an article of food extensively used by our inhabitants, and is chiefly relied upon to support the lives of infant children. If impure or adulterated, or polluted with germs of dangerous or infectious diseases, its use becomes highly dangerous, and the health and welfare of the public demand speedy, and, in some cases, instant, prevention of its distribution to the people. While it is the duty of the board of health to watch, and through its inspectors detect, violations of the statute and the conditions imposed by it, it has been given no judicial power to hear, try, and determine such violations, but must act upon the information obtained by it through its own channels of inquiry. . . . Although the relator had established a business and secured customers under the permit granted to him, the permit itself cannot be treated as property in any legal or constitutional sense, but was a mere license revocable by the power that was authorized to issue it."

IX. Provisions for transportation.

In Chicago v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1916) 275 Ill. 30, L.R.A.1917C, 238, 113 N. E. 849, the court, although conceding the right of municipal corporations to regulate the milk supply, held void for unreasonableness a provision of an ordinance forbidding carriers to transport milk which was above a specified temperature, where there was no way for them to ascertain whether the specified temperature was exceeded or not. The question of the constitutionality of the ordinance was argued by counsel, but was not referred to by the court.

X. Discriminatory provisions.

In State v. Broadbelt (1899) 89 Md. 565, 45 L.R.A. 433, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 771, a statute was attacked as denying due process of law and depriving of equal protection of the laws, which provided for the registration of all herds of cows the milk from which was sold in cities, towns, or villages, but which did not apply to herds whose milk was sold elsewhere. The statute also provided for inspection, and the maintenance of prescribed standards of cleanliness in stables where registered herds were kept. The court, in upholding the validity of the statute, said: "The entire act is strictly a police regulation, enacted for the purpose of preserving the public health. The strides which our knowledge of bacteriology has made in recent years are generally known; and the ubiquitous microbe has been shown to be a potent agent in the propagation of disease. Tuberculosis—identical, it is said, with consumption in man—is caused by the organism known as Koch's bacillus, and is readily communicable through milk. Diphtheria is another contagious disease whose specific organism finds in milk favorable conditions of growth; and there is abundant evidence to show that contaminated milk transmits this contagion. Cholera has again and again been traced to the same source; and scarlet fever is generally believed to be communicable by infected milk, and it is said that it may be even caused by an eruption on the udder. Typhoid fever bacilli have been detected in milk supposed to be wholesome. Besides conveying disease, milk occasionally contains certain germs which form poisonous products known as ptomaines. Milk may carry the bacilli of these and perhaps other deadly diseases, to infancy, to adolescence, and to age; to the delicate and to the robust alike, and to persons in every class and condition of society. It may receive these germs direct from the cow, if the cow be unhealthy; or it may absorb them from the dairy, the dairy utensils, or the stable, if these be uncleanly. Though inspection of cattle and dairies may reduce the frequency of infection, the preservation of the public health by preventing the sale of infected milk, or of milk that may come from infected sources, when milk by reason of its almost universal use, in one form or another, as an article of food, is especially likely to spread disease, is one of the most imperative duties of the state, and obviously one most incontestably within the scope of the police power. . . . A dairyman has no right to sell milk that may be contaminated, or that may be given by diseased cows, or may be kept on uncleanly premises or in unsterilized utensils; and, if he undertakes to sell milk at all to cities, towns, and villages, he must submit to such reasonable sanitary regulations respecting his property used in that business, as the legislature may deem necessary to prevent that property from being the source of origin of infectious and contagious diseases. No matter how absolute his title, he holds his property subject to this liability—that his use of it may be so regulated as that it shall not be injurious to the community."

A statute imposing a tax on only such milk dealers as use vehicles for the purpose of delivering milk to their customers is invalid for discrimination. Read v. Graham (1907) 31 Ky. *L. Rep. 569, 102 S. W. 860.

A classification for the purpose of a license fee, to be exacted from persons selling milk, may be based on the number of cows in the dairy. State v. McKinney (1903) 29 Mont. 375, 74 Pac. 1095, 1 Ann. Cas. 579.

In Birmingham v. Goldstein (1907) 151 Ala. 473, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 568, 125 Am. St. Rep. 33, 44 So. 113, an ordinance requiring persons desiring to sell milk within the city to obtain a license, the cost of which was proportioned to the number of cows kept by him, was upheld against a contention that it was void as class legislation. The court asks, Wherein consists the unconstitutionality? stating that it is settled that the constitutional provision with respect to the uniformity of taxes does not apply to license taxes.

An ordinance imposing a license tax on milk dealers is not invalid merely because it does not impose it separately upon grocers who sell milk. Newport v. French Bros. Bauer Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 174, 183 S. W. 532. The court says: "It is a matter of common knowledge that grocers sell in their stores all of the articles of both food and drink which go into the daily consumption of the people, and it would be utterly impracticable, as well as burdensome, to require a separate license for the sale of each article which he vends, and a payment of a separate license tax thereon. If a grocer who sells milk in his store should be required to pay a license tax upon his entire business as a grocer, which would include that of vending milk, as well as the other articles sold from his store, it could not be said that the ordinance under discussion makes a discrimination in his favor against the venders of milk from wagons, and from stores other than grocery stores. Considered in connection with the section of the ordinance which provides that each person who engages in an occupation within the city must pay a license tax, although the part of the ordinance which is copied into the petition does not provide for the levying of a license tax upon a grocer, and the petition failing to allege that such an ordinance was not then in effect, it cannot be presumed that there was no such ordinance, and hence it cannot be said that the ordinance complained of is inherently violative of law, or of the well-settled principles that are generally recognized as limitations upon the enactment of ordinances by municipalities."

Where a license tax was imposed upon venders of milk, which was alleged not to be enforced against merchants selling milk in connection with other commodities, the court held that under the Constitution the ordinance would not be valid unless all venders of milk were taxed, but it would be competent for the council to classify venders of milk, if the classification could be made upon a reasonable and natural basis, and impose a different fee upon each class so created; but that the ordinance was not rendered unconstitutional because the municipal authorities did not enforce it against some persons who were within its terms. Weyman v. Newport (1913) 153 Ky. 487, 156 S. W. 109.

One desiring to sell milk is not deprived of the equal protection of the laws by a requirement that he must secure a permit from the board of

The fact that an ordinance requiring containers in which milk is sold to have their capacity stamped on them, and making it a misdemeanor to have in possession, with intent to use, a container of less capacity than is marked upon it, is not invalid as class legislation because it does not apply to the selling of other commodities by liquid measure. Chicago v. Bowman Dairy Co. (1908) 234 Ill. 294, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 684, 123 Am. St. Rep. 100, 84 N. E. 913, 14 Ann. Cas. 700.

An ordinance is not unconstitutional for partial and unequal operation, which requires cows from which milk is to be sold in the city to be tested with tuberculin when they are kept outside the city, while not requiring such test if the cows are kept within it. Adams v. Milwaukee (1911) 144 Wis. 371, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1066, 129 N. W. 518. The court says, when we consider these two classes of milk dealers from the viewpoint of facility for inspection and regulation, differences sustaining the classification appear. The court further says it would be practically impossible to subject to examination the milk coming into the city every day for sale. On the other hand, every cow within the city can be subjected to individual examination.

The exemption from the provision of a statute providing punishment for selling, or having in possession for sale, milk below a specified standard, of producers, unless the sample was taken from their premises, and they failed, for twenty days after notice, to bring their product up to standard, does not make the statute unconstitutional for discrimination. Com. v. Titcomb (1917) 229 Mass. 14, 118 N. E. 328. The court says: "The statute is designed to protect and promote the public health. Under present conditions of life, milk is an essential article of food in almost universal use. Any statute rationally adapted to the end of securing its purity, preserving unimpaired its natural qualities, and securing it from adulteration, plainly is within the power of the legislature. . . . The main object being to shield the public from an imposition, in guise of a fluid which may look like pure milk and yet be either adulterated or skimmed,—an imposition difficult of detection,—necessarily there must exist a wide discretion in the selection of appropriate means. It would be comparatively simple to ascertain whether the quality of milk offered for sale by the farmer, either at his door or at wholesale or retail delivery, was that produced naturally by his herd. It would be difficult, commonly, to find out whether the milk offered for sale, especially in cities, by dealers who were not producers, was of the natural quality given by the cows from which it had come. . . . When the statute is considered in its application to two venders of milk selling in competition side by side, one a producer and the other a dealer who is not a producer, it has an appearance of inequality. . . . This appearance is strengthened by the suggestion that the non-producing seller may have bought his milk of his competitor who is also a producer. But placing the situation in its true perspective minimizes this seeming inequality, and demonstrates that it may not be substantial. The ultimate aim of the statute is to secure a pure and healthful article of food of widespread use. The individual consumer ordinarily is unable to detect adulteration, and is well-nigh powerless to defend himself against such deception. It is not commonly discernible on a superficial inspection. These factors justify a reasonable classification. The legislature may have found that common experience has demonstrated that impurities and adulterations are found in the vast majority of instances in milk kept for sale by nonproducing dealers, and only in a comparatively insignificant and negligible number of instances in milk offered for sale by the owner of the cows from which the milk comes. It may have found, also, that instances of milk below the established standard, offered for sale by producers, arise usually from the failure of the cows to produce milk of that quality, rather than from any wilful act of the producer. It is, perhaps, matter of common knowledge that some breeds of cows often do not give milk of the quality required by the Massachusetts standard: . . . If that be so, it may have been thought that the farmer should be given a chance to bring the milk of his herd up to the required standard before rendering him liable to prosecution."

But, under a constitutional provision requiring uniform taxation, an ordinance is invalid which levies a tax on each cow kept in a dairy within a subdivision of a territory to which the jurisdiction of the levying authority extends. Parish of Orleans v. Nougues (1856) 11 La. Ann. 739.

A statute is not unconstitutional as providing two penalties for the same offense, because it provides a forfeiture of a specified sum for each offense, and, in addition, makes the sale a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment. People v. McDermott Dairy Co. (1910) 122 N. Y. Supp. 294.

In a prosecution for selling adulterated milk contrary to ordinance, the defense was that the ordinance violated the constitutional prohibition against putting twice in jeopardy, since there was a state statute providing punishment for the same act. The court, however, says the ordinance was in force before the statute, and that, prior to the passage of the statute, there could be no possible doubt as to the constitutionality of the ordinance. The ordinance was held not to be in conflict with the statute, so that there was no unconstitutionality in any event. State v. Labatut (1887) 39 La. Ann. 513, 2 So. 550.

In State v. Fourcade (1893) 45 La. Ann. 717, 40 Am. St. Rep. 249, 13 So. 187, it was held that, since one could be punished as an offender against the state and the municipal law, there was no unconstitutional double jeopardy in an ordinance against selling adulterated milk, although the state statute provided punishment for the same offense.

H. P. F.

SALT LAKE CITY, Plff. in Certiorari,
v.
INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF UTAH.

Utah Supreme Court—June 11, 1921.

Constitutional law — requiring employer carrying his own insurance to pay into state fund — equal protection.

1. Requiring an employer carrying his own insurance to pay a certain amount into the state treasury, in case of death of an employee without dependents, to provide a fund for compensating employees suffering second disability, which, when combined with the first, causes injuries greater than the compensation provided for the disability from the second injury alone, does not deprive the employer of the equal protection of the laws, nor deprive him of his property without due process of law, where he is privileged to insure in the state fund if he chooses to do so.

Workmen's compensation — conditions for carrying own insurance. as a condition of permitting him to carry his own insurance against injury to employees.

2. The state may impose any terms it chooses upon an employer of labor, CERTIORARI to review an order of the Industrial Commission requiring plaintiff to pay a certain amount into the state treasury, and reasonable funeral expenses, under the State Industrial Act, in proceedings before the Commission, by the parents of a deceased person, to recover compensation for his death. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William H. Folland, Horace H. Smith, Shirley P. Jones, and James H. Wolfe, for plaintiff in certiorari:

Subdivision 1, § 3140, of the Laws of Utah 1919, is unconstitutional for the reason that it is a denial of the equal protection of the laws, and it is a taking of property without due process of law.

Southern R. Co. v. Greene, 216 U. S. 400, 54 L. ed. 536, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 287, 17 Ann. Cas. 1247; American Fuel Co. v. Industrial Commission, — Utah, —, 8 A.L.R. 1342, 187 Pac. 633; Gulf, C. & S. F. Messrs. Harvey H. Cluff, Attorney General, J. Robert Robinson, W. Hal Fair, William A. Hilton, and L. A. Murie, Assistant Attorneys General for defendant in certiorari:

In order for an act which is under the police power to be declared unconstitutional, it must be shown that the legislature has made a classification which is unreasonable and arbitrary.

Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. 220 U. S. 61, 55 L. ed. 369, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 160; State ex rel. Bryant v. Lindsay, 94 N. J. L. 357, 110 Atl. 823; Jeffrey Mfg. Co. v. Blagg, 235 U. S. 571, 59 L. ed. 364, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 167, 7 N. C. C. A. 570; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 55 L. ed. 112, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Unless a classification adopted by the legislature in the application of the police power is purely arbitrary and capricious, its judgment on the subject should be respected and sustained.

Thurman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts alleged in plaintiff's brief tend to show that on July 12, 1920, one Asa H. Hancock was a regularly employed member of the fire department of plaintiff, and that on that day he was accidentally killed in the course of his employment. Proceedings were had for compensation before the defendant Industrial Commission (hereinafter called Commission) on the part of the father and mother of deceased, claiming to be his dependents. The Commission found, among other things, that plaintiff was an employer and self-insurer, subject to the provisions of the Utah Industrial Act, and that deceased left no dependents. The Commission ordered that plaintiff pay into the state treasury the sum of $750 and reasonable funeral expenses, not exceeding the sum of $150, in accordance with the provisions of the statute hereinafter quoted. The case is before us on a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings.

Some contention was made in plaintiff's brief to the effect that the proceedings before the Commission were not had under the Industrial Act, but under the firemen's pension fund, that plaintiff was not a party to said proceedings, and that therefore the Commission was without jurisdiction to make the order. This contention has since been waived by stipulation.

Plaintiff contends, however, that the Commission acted without and in excess of its jurisdiction, because the statute in pursuance of which the order was made is unconstitutional for the following reasons:

(1) That it is a denial of the equal protection of the laws; (2) that it is a taking of property without due process of law.

Utah Comp. Laws 1917, § 3140, subd. 1, as amended in Sess. Laws 1919, p. 163, is the statute against which the constitutional objection is raised, and reads as follows: "If there be no dependents, the employer or insurance carrier shall pay the burial expenses of the deceased, as provided herein, and shall pay into the state treasury the sum of $750 unless the employer is insured in the state insurance fund. Such payments shall be held in a special fund for the purposes provided in subdivision 6 of this section. The state treasury shall be the custodian of this special fund and the Commission shall direct the distribution thereof."

Subdivision 6 of the same section, referred to in subdivision 1, states the purpose for which the payment is exacted and is pertinent in this connection:

"If any employee who has previously incurred permanent partial disability incurs a subsequent permanent partial disability such that the compensation payable for the disability resulting from the combined injuries is greater than the compensation which except for the pre-existing disability would have been payable for the latter injury, the employee shall receive compensation on the basis of the combined injuries, but the liability of his employer shall be for the latter injury only and the remainder shall be paid out of the special fund provided for in subdivision 1 of this section."

In its contention that the statute is a denial of the equal protection of the laws, plaintiff's principal grievance seems to be the apparent discrimination in favor of the state insurance fund and the employers insured thereby as against other insurance carriers and employers within the act.

The plaintiff, as an employer under the act, had the choice of any one of three methods of insurance: (1) By insuring in the state insurance fund; (2) by insuring in a stock corporation or mutual association; (3) by carrying its own insurance. Utah Comp. Laws 1917, § 3114. A fourth method was also available to plaintiff, subject to the approval of the Commission, namely, by entering into an agreement with its employees as provided in § 3124 of the same compilation. By insuring in the state insurance fund plaintiff would have avoided the liability in question, but of its own volition it elected to become a self-insurer. It must be conclusively presumed that plaintiff did so with full knowledge of the contingent liability of which it now complains. It must also be presumed that, notwithstanding such contingent liability, plaintiff believed it would be to its advantage to carry its own insurance. In such case it would be relieved of the payment of premiums to another insurance carrier, and would only be subjected to the payment of such compensation as may become due its employees under the terms of the act. If no accident occurred, no payment would be required. In these circumstances defendant contends that, having obtained these advantages by electing to carry its own insurance, and the contingent liability it assumed having now become a fixed obligation, plaintiff should not be permitted to say that the law which fixes the obligation is unconstitutional in that it is a denial of the equal protection of the laws. In support of this contention it relies on a line of decisions practically uniform in holding that, where an employer has the right to elect whether or not he will come within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and elects so to do, he will not be permitted to question the constitutionality of the act. Many such cases will be found in the note to Jensen

v. Southern P. Co. L.R.A.1916A, at page 414, to which we refer the reader. It is not at all clear to the writer that these cases are applicable to the question presented here. They seem to fall within the principle, from which, as far as we are advised, there is no dissent, that where a party voluntarily accepts the provisions of an unconstitutional law and becomes a beneficiary thereof, he cannot deny its constitutionality nor be relieved from its onerous conditions. The following cases are typical illustrations of the principle: Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Osborn, 193 U. S. 17, 48 L. ed. 598, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 310, and Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415, 26 L. ed. 187. In the last case cited the court, in its opinion, at page 421 of 102 U. S., says: "It is well settled as a general proposition, subject to certain exceptions, not necessary to be here noted, that where a party has availed himself for his benefit of an unconstitutional law, he cannot, in a subsequent litigation with others not in that position, aver its unconstitutionality as a defense, although such unconstitutionality may have been pronounced by a competent judicial tribunal in another suit. In such cases the principle of estoppel applies with full force and conclusive effect,"—citing cases.

The fundamental distinction between these cases and the case at bar consists in the fact that the plaintiff in the instant case cannot be said to have accepted that provision of the law which it now asserts is unconstitutional. Neither has it received any benefit therefrom; hence it is difficult to see wherein the doctrine of estoppel can apply. In fact, it cannot be contended that plaintiff has voluntarily accepted any provision of the Industrial Act, for the act has been held to be compulsory. Industrial Commission v. Daly Min. Co. 51 Utah, 602, 172 Pac. 301. Plaintiff is within the law because it belongs to that class of employers which come within its provisions, but while, for the reason above stated, we are compelled to hold that plaintiff is not estopped from asserting that the provision of the law complained of is unconstitutional, and while the statute on its face appears to be discriminatory, we are not prepared to admit, when considered in its entirety, that the statute is a denial of the equal protection of the laws. The authorities relied on by plaintiff in support of this contention are not convincing. The first case to which our attention is called is Southern R. Co. v. Greene, 216 U. S. 400, 54 L. ed. 536, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 287, 17 Ann. Cas. 1247. The case was appealed from a judgment of the supreme court of Alabama, and the exact question determined by the court is stated in the following language: "The important Federal question for our determination in this case is: When a corporation of another state has come into the taxing state, in compliance with its laws, and has therein acquired property of a fixed and permanent nature, upon which it has paid all taxes levied by the state, is it liable to a new and additional franchise tax for the privilege of doing business within the state, which tax is not imposed upon domestic corporations doing business in the state of the same character as that in which the foreign corporation is itself engaged?"

Without indulging in extended comment, the distinction in the cases is clearly manifest. In that case the foreign corporation was already within the taxing state, carrying on business in compliance with its laws, and had acquired property of a "fixed and permanent nature." The taxing state levied a new and additional franchise tax upon the corporation for the privilege of doing business within the state, which tax was not imposed upon domestic corporations engaged in business of the same character. In the instant case the plaintiff was not engaged in the business of workmen's compensation insurance when the statute in question was enacted; it had acquired no property of a "fixed and permanent value" or otherwise in such business under previous laws of the state; it had no standing or existence whatever as an agency authorized by law to carry on the business of insurance until the privilege was conferred upon it by the Workmen's Compensation Act in 1917, which act created the contingent liability of which plaintiff now complains. In the Alabama case the Federal Supreme Court held that the statute imposing the discriminating tax was a denial of the equal protection of the laws, and for the reasons stated we are in hearty accord with the conclusion reached. We fail, however, to discern any analogy between that case and the case at bar. Our further reasons for so holding will be stated more clearly before concluding this opinion.

The remaining cases cited by plaintiff in support of its contention under this subhead are the following: American Fuel Co. v. Industrial Commission, —Utah, —, 8 A.L.R. 1342, 187 Pac. 633; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 666, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255; Scranton Leasing Co. v. Industrial Commission, 51 Utah, 368, 170 Pac. 976; Industrial Commission v. Evans, 52 Utah, 394, 174 Pac. 825; Garfield Smelting Co. v. Industrial Commission, 53 Utah, 133, 178 Pac. 57; State of South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, 50 L. ed. 261, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, 4 Ann. Cas. 737; Arnold v. State, 163 App. Div. 253, 148 N. Y. Supp. 479; Re Western Implement Co. (D. C.) 166 Fed. 576.

As we view the question submitted for our determination, these cases are in no sense controlling. We therefore decline to enter upon an extended review. The Utah cases, if we understand plaintiff's position, are cited primarily to establish the following propositions: (1) That the employer is primarily liable for the payment of compensation and is not relieved therefrom merely because his liability is insured; (2) that the rate fixed for state insurance becomes the rate to which other insurers must conform; (3) that, although the employer who is insured is not required to pay the award direct, still he has a direct interest in the drafts made upon the insurance fund, because the greater the drafts the greater will be the demands upon the employer who is insured therein; (4) that the same right of access to the judicial tribunals of the state that is accorded to one party must likewise be accorded to the other.

The fundamental idea sought to be deduced from the doctrine of these cases seems to be that all employers are in the same class and all insurance carriers are in the same class, and therefore all in each class should be treated alike, because they are entitled to the equal protection of the laws. The point, apparently most plausible, made by plaintiff, is that, inasmuch as the state has the right to determine the rate it will pay, to which rate other insurers must conform, the requiring of other insurers or employers to pay $750 in case of no dependents, while the state is exempt from such payment, is an unwarranted discrimination in favor of the state. In this connection the point is also made that, being exempt from paying the $750, and at the same time having the exclusive right to determine the rate which it should pay, to which rate other insurers must conform, the state by reason of its exemption can fix the rate so low that other insurers will be unable to compete.

Assuming that this is a case in which classification must conform to constitutional principles, and also assuming that the provisions of the statute above quoted are the only provisions that should be considered in determining this question, there would be much force in plaintiff's contention that the statute in question is arbitrary and capricious in its classification, and therefore a denial of the equal protection of the laws. But let us briefly consider the question from another angle, even as to the question whether or not there is an arbitrary and capricious classification. To do this we should consider the Industrial Act as a whole and apply to it the constitutional provisions invoked by plaintiff as the same have been construed by the court of last resort. First, we shall quote an excerpt from plaintiff's brief, which, in part at least, states a fundamental principle pertaining to this class of legislation: "All employers belong to one class; that is, they are all liable alike for compensation to their employees, and their liability is imposed because it is now well settled that the cost of human wreckage may be taxed against the industry which employs it, and upon this theory all employers of labor are held to a primary liability." (Italics ours.)

It being "well settled that the cost of human wreckage may be taxed against the industry which employs it," and it also being conceded by plaintiff that the power of the state within constitutional limits is plenary as to this subject, to what extent, if at all, is the classification arbitrary or capricious, or the statute discriminatory in favor of the state or the state insurance fund? It is true the statute exempts the state from paying the $750 in question while requiring other employers or their insurers to pay it. Let us see what the state has done as an offset against this exaction from other employers and insurers. Bearing in mind that "the cost of human wreckage may be taxed against the industry which employs it," this cost of human wreckage ought not to be borne by the state or the taxpayers of the state as such, for the primary obligation rests upon the industry which employs labor. Notwithstanding this fact, the state of Utah in 1917, when the Industrial Act was passed, provided, without expense to employers, a tribunal for the administration of the act, consisting of three commissioners, and fixed their salaries at $4,000 per annum. In the same act it appropriated the sum of $40,000 for the establishment of a state insurance fund, and the further sum of $50,000 for the payment of salaries and expenses of the Commission and its employees. In 1919 it appropriated the sum of $24,000 for the payment of commissioners' salaries during the following biennium, $3,000 for the payment of their traveling expenses and the investigator's salary, and $10,000 for general office expenses, including salaries of secretary, stenographers and clerks. The amount appropriated in 1921 for the same purposes amounted to the enormous sum of $95,000. Enough has been said, we think, to conclusively demonstrate that the state has not discriminated against other employers or insurers, for it has taken upon itself the onerous burden which, according to the admission of plaintiff, might have been imposed solely upon the industries employing labor. As against these contributions of the state for the benefit of industries employing labor, can it be justly contended that the demands of the statute that each industry pay into the state treasury the sum of $750 in the event of the remote contingency of an employee's death by accident without dependents is either discriminatory or unjust? Can it be justly contended that the classification is arbitrary or capricious, or that the statute is a denial of the equal protection of the laws? We think not. We do not understand that a classification, in order to avoid objections as to its constitutionality, should be absolutely uniform and equal in every respect as between the parties composing the class. That equality is not always practicable is recognized in many cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and especially in Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. 220 U. S. 61. At page 78 (55 L. ed. 369, 377, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 340, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 160), the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Van Devanter, says: "The rules by which this contention must be tested, as is shown by repeated decisions of this court, are these: (1) The equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment does not take from the state the power to classify in the adoption of police laws, but admits of the exercise of a wide scope of discretion in that regard, and avoids what is done only when it is without any reasonable basis, and therefore is purely arbitrary. (2) A classification having some reasonable basis does not offend against that clause merely because it is not made with mathematical nicety or because in practice it results in some inequality. (3) When the classification in such a law is called in question, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, the existence of that state of facts at the time the law was enacted must be assumed. (4) One who assails the classification in such a law must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis, but is essentially arbitrary. Bachtel v. Wilson, 204 U. S. 36, 41, 51 L. ed. 357, 359, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 248; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Melton, 218 U. S. 36, 54 L. ed. 921, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 84, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676; Ozan Lumber Co. v. Union County Nat. Bank, 207 U. S. 251, 256, 52 L. ed. 195, 197, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 89; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 132, 24 L. ed. 77, 86; Henderson Bridge Co. v. Henderson, 173 U. S. 592, 615, 43 L. ed. 823, 831, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553.

1. Tested by the rules stated in the excerpt quoted, not only does it appear that the classification made in the instant case is not arbitrary or capricious so as to render it obnoxious to the equal protection clause of the Constitution, but, if there is any question concerning it, the burden is cast upon plaintiff to show that the classification does not rest upon any reasonable basis, but is essentially arbitrary. We are of the opinion that plaintiff has failed to discharge the burden thus imposed.

2. But plaintiff also contends that the statute to which objection is made is the taking of property without due process of law. Under this subhead it is contended that the exaction of the $750 from the employer or his insurer under the terms of the statute is the same in effect as taking money from one person and giving it to another without any connection whatever between the person who receives the money and the person from whom it was exacted. This is hardly a correct statement of either the effect or purpose of the statute. The real purpose of the statute, both subdivision 1 and subdivision 6 heretofore quoted, is the building up and maintaining of a special fund for the compensation of employees who, by a combination of successive injuries, have become permanently and totally disabled, but whose total disability is not otherwise provided for in the Industrial Act. We submit the following as a typical illustration: If A should suffer the total loss of one eye, his compensation under the regular schedule (Utah Comp. Laws 1917, § 3138) would be not exceeding $16 per week for 100 weeks. If he should afterwards lose the other eye in the same or different employment within the act, he would be entitled under the same schedule, to an additional sum of not exceeding $16 per week for 100 weeks. The total compensation for the loss of both eyes would be not exceeding $16 per week for 200 weeks. But the loss of both eyes under § 3139 of the same compilation constitutes permanent total disability, for which the injured employee is allowed 60 per cent of his average weekly wages for a period of five years from the date of the injury, and thereafter 45 per cent of such average weekly wages during the remainder of his life, the maximum not to exceed $16 and the minimum not less than $7 per week. The discrepancy between the total amount payable to the employee for these successive injuries under the regular schedule and the amount he would receive had he lost both eyes in the same accident under § 3139 would amount to a considerable sum, dependent entirely upon how long the employee lives after the expiration of the first 200 weeks. The $750 exaction from employers is to take care of this discrepancy so that the entire burden may not be cast upon the last employer. If the law imposed the liability upon him alone, the result would be that the unfortunate employee who has suffered only the loss of a single member would be handicapped in obtaining employment thereafter, for the loss of another member might result in permanent total disability. State Industrial Commission v. Newman, 222 N. Y. 363, 118 N. E. 794.

These were undoubtedly the considerations which moved the legislature to enact the provisions of the statute of which plaintiff complains. It is undeniable that the purpose was commendable and germane to the general purpose of the Industrial Act. In their discussion of this question, counsel for plaintiff indulge in subtleties and refinements which the writer is unable to follow. They cite no case in point or analogous in principle. The only case referred to on this branch of the argument is State ex rel. Bryant v. Lindsay, 94 N. J. L. 357, 110 Atl. 823, a New Jersey case arising under a statute of that state. It is stated by the court that the statute is neither an amendment nor a supplement to the Workmen's Compensation Act. Speaking of the statute, at page 358 the court says: "It requires that, in cases where an employee dies as a result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and leaving no dependents entitled to compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and the dependents, if there had been any, would have been entitled to compensation under the said act, then the employer of such person must pay the commissioner of labor the sum of $400, which the commissioner is to turn over to the state treasurer, and that all moneys collected under this act shall be used exclusively for the purpose mentioned in another act of 1918 (page 429 of the Pamphlet Laws of that year), which is the act relating to what is called the Workmen's Compensation Bureau."

At another point on the same page the opinion reads: "It seems quite obvious that this is nothing more or less than a tax imposed for the purpose of supporting the expense of a state agency. The act, as we have said, does not pretend to be either a supplement or an amendment of the Workmen's Compensation Act; it is separate and distinct. Consequently it cannot be supported upon the theory of a contract between employer and employee, conclusively presumed because of the absence of dissent, pursuant to the statutory procedure outlined in the Compensation Act."

While the court held the statute to be unconstitutional, it cannot be assumed, in view of the language quoted from the opinion, that the court would have made the same holding had it been construing the Utah statute. The dissimilarity between the two statutes is altogether too pronounced to justify such assumption.

In reply to plaintiff's contention that the statute authorizes the taking of property from one person and giving it to another without any obligatory relation existing between them, counsel for defendant call our attention to an Oklahoma case, Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 55 L. ed. 112, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487. The second and last paragraphs of the syllabus reflect the opinion of the court sufficiently for our purpose. For further details the reader is referred to the case itself.

"The broad words of the 14th Amendment are not to be pushed to a dryly logical extreme, and the courts will be slow to strike down as unconstitutional legislation of the states enacted under the police power."

"The Acts of December 17, 1907, and March 11, 1909, of Oklahoma, subjecting state banks to assessments for a depositors' guaranty fund, are within the police power of the state, and do not deprive banks assessed of their property without due process of law or deny to them the equal protection of the law, nor do they impair the obligation of the charter contracts."

We regard the case last cited as very much in point in support of defendant's position. There are two points of difference between that case and the case at bar: (1) In that case the assessment for the maintenance of the depositors' guaranty fund was made upon all state banks alike. In this case the state insurance fund is exempt from the payment required of others. But that apparent discrimination has been shown to be unreal, in our discussion of the first objection relied on by plaintiff. (2) In the Oklahoma case the assessment for the maintenance of the guaranty fund was compulsory,—the banks were required to pay it,—while in the instant case the plaintiff could have avoided the liability by insuring in the state insurance fund. If there is any substantial distinction between the two cases, in our opinion the defendant in the instant case is in a stronger position than was the defendant in the Oklahoma case.

But, notwithstanding all that has been said in the preceding pages of this opinion, there is a grave question in the mind of the writer as to whether or not there is really any constitutional question involved. It is practically conceded by plaintiff, and if not conceded it must be admitted, that the state has the right and the power to require all employers to insure in the state insurance fund, and not leave it optional, as under the present law. If, then, the right to insure in stock corporations or mutual associations, or of self-insurance, is a mere privilege granted by the state, upon what theory can the employer complain of the conditions imposed for the privilege granted? If the state has the power to entirely prohibit other employers from carrying their own insurance or insuring otherwise than in the state insurance fund, why may not the state, if it sees fit to grant the privilege, fix the terms and name the conditions? This question was squarely presented by defendant's counsel in their brief filed in the case, and was of sufficient importance to deserve a reply.

In the absence of some logical reason or authority to the contrary, we feel compelled to hold that the state had the power to name the terms and conditions upon which employers might insure the payment of compensation to their employees even though there was an apparent discrimination in favor of the state.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: constitutionality and construction of provisions directed against noninsuring or self-insuring employers.

Little authority on the question under consideration has been disclosed.

It will be observed that in the reported case (SALT LAKE CITY v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION, ante, 259) it was decided that an act requiring an employer carrying his own insurance, in case of death of an employee without dependents, to pay a certain amount into the state treasury, to provide a fund for compensating employees suffering a second disability, did not deprive him of his property without due process of law, where he was privileged to insure in the state fund if he chose to do so.

In Sperduto v. New York City Interborough R. Co. (1919) 186 App. Div. 145, 173 N. Y. Supp. 834, appeal dismissed in (1919) 226 N. Y. 73, 123 N. E. 207, where an amendment of the Workmen's Compensation Act provided that, if an award required payment of death benefits or other compensation by insurance carrier or employer in periodical payments, the commission might, in its discretion, at any time, compute and permit or require to be paid into the state fund an amount equal to the present value of all unpaid death benefits, or other compensation in which awards were made for total permanent, or permanent partial, disability for a period of 104 weeks or more, for which liability exists, together with such additional sum as the commission might deem necessary for a proportionate payment of expenses of administering the fund created, it was held that, if this was construed to give the commission power arbitrarily to require mutual and self-insurers, who were solvent, to pay the present value of future instalments of compensation awards, it was an illegal discrimination and invalid. The court said: "The commission has exercised very extraordinary powers, which entirely change, in the case of the self-insurer and the mutual insurer, the plan of payment fixed by the legislature in compensation cases. The theory of the law is that the business, in an easy way, by periodical payments, must bear the losses sustained by the employer or his dependents, and that the losses shall be paid in substantially the manner in which the wages were paid, but that the commission may, in a given case, commute the payments to one or more lump sums, in its discretion and in the 'interest of justice.' The commission has proceeded upon the theory that the legislature has substantially given it the power to reverse § 25 and arbitrarily to make new laws in certain cases,—a power which the legislature has not the authority to give. If the commission has correctly construed § 27, it is clearly unconstitutional. But the courts will hesitate in construing a statute in a way which makes it unconstitutional, and will go to the limit of construction in sustaining it. Every reasonable intendment is in favor of its validity. There is nothing in the section which permits the commission to make an omnibus order like the one in question, discriminating against certain employees and certain kinds of insurance. The clause in the section, that the commission may commute one or more awards by one or more resolutions, may be construed as meaning that the commission may hold a hearing on notice, inquire into the facts as to an insurer which may have several awards against it, upon facts similar in their nature, and that an investigation and a separate trial in each of such cases is not necessary. It may have other proper construction, but it was not intended to permit the commission arbitrarily to change the Workmen's Compensation Law, and commute awards, without notice and without hearing, based solely on the kind of insurance accepted. By § 50 of the act the employer may furnish one of three kinds of insurance: (1) Subdivision 1 provides for insurance in the state fund; (2) subdivision 2, for insurance in a stock company or mutual association authorized by law to transact such business; or (3) subdivision 3, by the employer qualifying, with the approval of the commission, as a self-insurer. The commission has the right to revoke the consent at any time for cause shown. It seems idle for the statute to provide for three kinds of insurance, unless each insurer is to stand in the same position, with equal liability and responsibility. The payments under the act are to be the same, without regard to the kind of insurance furnished. If an extra burden is placed upon the self-insurer and the mutual association, solely because they are such, it is an illegal discrimination and without effect. When United States 4½ per cent bonds are selling at a discount when the best railroad companies in the country cannot borrow money at 6 per cent, and, as a favor and in the interest of the public, the government is advancing necessary money to them at 6 per cent, there can be no question but that computing the value of the award on a basis of 3½ per cent interest, and requiring cash payment within a few days, is a heavy burden. Weekly payments of a small amount are not a serious burden upon a self-insurer, but the requirement that the present value of all future payments shall be made in cash at once would be ruinous. Laying aside all other considerations, if a sum is payable each week by a business to a woman during her widowhood, it is a grievous burden to compel it to pay the present value of such payments at once in cash. A government, a bank, insurance company, corporation, or individual, cannot ordinarily pay at once the cash present value of all its obligations payable in the future. Credit is the life of business. The extent of the burden cast upon the appellant as a self-insurer, by the determination, is not the only consideration; an important fact is that it is required to liquidate its liability in a manner different from that required of other employers and insurers, and such requirement is based solely upon the fact of self-insurance. "If the commission may be justified, in any case, in casting such a burden upon an employer, there must be facts and circumstances in the case, and shown in the findings, which move and compel its discretion in that respect. Its action cannot be arbitrary."

In Thornton v. Duffy (1920) 254 U. S. 361, 65 L. ed. 304, 41 Sup. Ct. Rep. 137, affirming (1918) 99 Ohio St. 120, 124 N. E. 54, a ruling of a state industrial commission, justified or demanded by a change in the state laws, by which the commission revoked its previous discretionary action, and declared that no employers should be permitted to pay or furnish directly to injured employees, or to the dependents of killed employees, the compensation and benefits provided for in the state Workmen's Compensation Law, if such employers, by contract or otherwise, should provide for the insurance of the payment by them of such compensation and benefits, or should indemnify themselves against loss sustained by the direct payment thereof, was held not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of insurance contracts entered into upon the faith of the previous ruling of the commission, or as a violation of the due process or equal protection provisions.

NATIONAL SURETY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

LEFLORE COUNTY, Mississippi, et al.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit — December 16, 1919.

Principal and surety — bonds of county depository — effect of invalid designation of depository.

1. A surety on the bond of a depository of county funds cannot contest its liability for breach of the bond on the ground that the depository was not properly designated, because of want of the required vote by the supervisors, since the loss of funds was due to the execution of its bond.

Appeal — joinder of parties — when necessary.

2. The principal need not be joined in an appeal from a decree dismissing a suit brought by the surety to cancel a bond, or a severance had as to it, where it joins the obligee in contesting the right to cancellation.

Principal and surety — liability in excess of penalty of bond.

3. Damages and counsel fees cannot be assessed against the surety of a county depository in excess of the penalty of its bond, under a statute rendering the depository liable for such charges.

— liability for penalty and counsel fees.

4. The legislature may make a depository of county funds liable for penalty for delay in returning funds deposited, and for counsel fees for services in compelling payment, and a surety on the bond will accept such liability to the extent of the bond.

Depository — necessity of demand for funds.

5. Demand on a depository of county funds is not necessary to put it in default, where it refuses to pay county warrants and closes its doors.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi (Holmes, J.), dismissing a bill filed to cancel a bond executed by plaintiff as surety, and granting relief to defendant on its cross bill. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Walker, Circuit Judge, and Grubb and Erwin, District Judges.

Mr. John R. Tyson for appellant.
Messrs. A. F. Gardner and R. C. McBee, for appellees:

The county, being a governmental agency, can transact its own business only through its agents, and any act of its officers, acting in and about the county's business, cannot estop the county.

Under § 10 of the County Depository Act, providing that, when a county depository fails to pay over money when demanded, the board of supervisors may employ counsel for its collection, and that counsel fees may be allowed, and a penalty of 1 per cent per month for delay in paying over funds, the allowance of such penalty and counsel fees is not improper, as depriving the surety of the depository of property without due process of law.

Mr. E. V. Hughston also for appellees.

Grubb, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a final decree, dismissing appellant's bill of complaint, which was filed to cancel a bond executed by appellant as surety in favor of Leflore county, in the state of Mississippi, a municipal corporation, appellee, and also by the Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company, as principal, and granting to appellee Leflore county relief on its cross bill, which sought the enforcement of the bond against the appellant and its codefendant, the Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company. The Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company had acted as depository of the public funds of Leflore county, under a designation claimed by appellant to have been void because its selection was by a bare quorum of the board of supervisors, one of whom was incapacitated to act because he was a director and stockholder of the Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company.

It was called to the attention of the court, upon the hearing of the appeal, that the Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company had not joined in the appeal, and that there had been no summons and severance as to it. This court has held, in the case of The Bylands, 145 C. C. A. 289, 231 Fed. 101, that the failure of a codefendant, where the judgment is joint, to join in the appeal, in the absence of a summons and severance, was fatal to the jurisdiction of the court, and would be noticed by it, though no motion to dismiss the appeal had been made, following the case of Estis v. Trabue, 128 U. S. 225, 32 L. ed. 437, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58. In that case, however, the Supreme Court stated that the rule would not apply if the judgment or decree was distributive, so that it could be regarded "as containing a separate judgment against the claimants and another separate judgment against the sureties." Judgments and decrees, under the law of Mississippi, are joint and several, and not merely joint.

It has also been held that, on proper application, the writ of error or appeal may be amended by the insertion of the omitted parties. Inland Seaboard Coasting Co. v. Tolson, 136 U. S. 572, 34 L. ed. 539, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1063; The Mary B. Curtis, 162 C. C. A. 181, 250 Fed. 9; The Seguranca, 162 C. C. A. 191, 250 Fed. 19. In the case of Winters v. United States, 207 U. S. 564, 52 L. ed. 340, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207, the Supreme Court, speaking of a case in which five of the defendants, who had defaulted, were not joined in the appeal of other defendants, who had answered and defended the bill, said: "The rule which requires the parties to a judgment or decree to join in an appeal or writ of error, or be detached from the right by some proper proceeding, or by their renunciation, is firmly established. But the rule only applies to joint judgments or decrees. In other words, when the interest of a defendant is separate from that of other defendants, he may appeal without them."

The Supreme Court held that the default of the defendants, who did not join in the appeal, separated their interest from that of the defendants who answered and defended the bill, and, for that reason, excused the appellant from joining them in the appeal. The Supreme Court in that case said: "Joinder in one suit did not necessarily identify them. Besides, the defendants other than appellants defaulted. A decree pro confesso was entered against them, and thereafter, according to Equity Rule 19 [29 Sup. Ct. Rep. xxvii.], the cause was required to proceed ex parte and the matter of the bill decreed by the court. Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104, 29 L. ed. 105, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788. The decree was in due course made absolute, and, granting that it might have been appealed from by the defaulting defendants, they would have been, as said in Thomson v. Wooster, absolutely barred and precluded from questioning its correctness, unless on the face of the bill it appeared manifest that it was erroneous and improperly granted. Their rights, therefore, were entirely different from those of the appellants: they were naked trespassers, and conceded by their default the rights of the United States and the Indians, and were in no position to resist the prayer of the bill. But the appellants justified by counter rights, and submitted those rights for judgment. There is nothing, therefore, in common between appellants and the other defendants. The motion to dismiss is denied, and we proceed to the merits."

In the case of Orleans-Kenner Electric R. Co. v. Dunbar, 134 C. C. A. 152, 218 Fed. 344, this court said, in overruling a motion to dismiss an appeal for nonjoinder of appellants: "The interest of the railway company which was affected by the decree rendered was so separate and distinct from that of the other defendant that the former is entitled to maintain an appeal in which the latter does not join. Obviously, the pecuniary or proprietary interest acquired or claimed by the grantee of such a privilege is very different from that of the public governmental body which undertook to confer the privilege. . . . The beneficial proprietary interest which the latter has in the privilege which it claims to have acquired entitles it to maintain an appeal from a judgment or decree adversely affecting its interest, though the official body which undertook to confer the privilege, and which also was a party defendant to the cause, does not join in the appeal. Where the respective interests of several defendants, which are affected by a judgment or decree against all of them, are separate and different, one of them may appeal without joining the others."

In this case the Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company answered appellant's original bill of complaint by denying the facts stated in it, and that appellant was entitled to the relief asked in it; i. e., the cancellation of the bond. There was, therefore, no identity of interest between appellant and the Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company in the subject-matter of the decree upon the original bill. The Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company did not answer or defend the cross bill of the appellee Leflore county, and was in default upon the cross bill. There was nothing, therefore, in common between its position and that of appellant, even upon the decree upon the cross bill, for it had arrayed itself on the other side of the litigation from appellant. It was not, therefore, necessary that it be joined in the appeal, or a severance had as to it.

The question on the merits of the appeal is whether the invalidity of the proceeding through which the Itta Bena Banking & Trust Company was selected as a depository for the funds of Leflore county avoided the bond executed by appellant as surety, for the purpose of securing the funds of the county deposited with the bank. It may be conceded that the appointment was void, and that the interested supervisor, whose vote, was necessary to the designation, was guilty of an offense in casting his vote, according to the Constitution and laws of the state of Mississippi. It is, nevertheless, undisputed that the depository was commissioned, entered upon the discharge of its duties, and received funds of the county under color of its office, which it failed to account for. It was enabled to do these things by virtue of the bond which the appellant, as surety, had executed with it. But for the filing of the bond, it could neither have been commissioned as depository nor received the county's funds in that capacity. In view of these undisputed facts, we think the appellant cannot assert, as against the county, the invalidity of the appointment of the depository and of the fidelity bond; this, not merely because the bond recited the appointment, but because, by reason of the execution of it, and its delivery to the county, in consideration of a premium paid to the appellant, the loss of the funds deposited was brought about. We think the weight of reason and authorities supports this conclusion. Of the many cases so holding we cite and quote from one only. In the case of United States v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 96, Fed. Cas. No. 15,747, Chief Justice Marshall said: "Admitting the appointment to be irregular,—to be contrary to the law and its policy,—what is to be the consequence of this irregularity? Does it absolve the person appointed from the legal and moral obligation of accounting for public money which has been placed in his hands in consequence of such appointment? Does it authorize him to apply money so received to his own use? If the policy of the law condemns such appointments, does it also condemn the payment of money received under them? Had this subject been brought before the legislature, and the opinion be there entertained that such appointments were illegal, what would have been the probable course? The Secretary of War might have been censured; an attempt might have been authorized to make him ultimately responsible for the money advanced under the illegal appointment; but is it credible that the bond would be declared void? Would this have been the policy of those who make the law? Let the course of Congress in another case answer this question. It is declared to be unlawful for any member of Congress to be concerned in any contract made on the part of the United States, and all such contracts are declared to be void. What is the consequence of violating this law, and making a contract against its express provisions? A fine is imposed on the violator, but does he keep the money received under the contract? Far from it. The law directs that the money so received shall be forthwith repaid, and, in case of refusal or delay, 'every person so refusing or delaying, together with his surety or sureties, shall be forthwith prosecuted by law, for the recovery of any such sum or sums of money advanced as aforesaid.' If then, this appointment be contrary to the policy of the law, the repayment of the money under it is not, and a suit may, I think, be sustained, to coerce such repayment on the bond given for that purpose."

We conclude that the district court correctly entered a decree dismissing the original bill, and in favor of the appellee on its cross bill in some amount. The penalty of the bond was $15,000. The statute of Mississippi (Miss. Laws 1912, § 10, chap. 194), provides that the board of supervisors is authorized to employ counsel to enforce the payment and collection of funds deposited under its authority, and to charge such counsel fees against the depository, and, in addition thereto, that the "depository shall be liable for damages at the rate of 1 per cent per month for any delay in paying over any county funds when lawfully demanded, and the bond of any depository shall be liable for said expenses and damages." The district judge awarded damages by way of delay, and counsel fees, in excess of the penalty of the bond and legal interest on it from the date the liability was incurred, upon the theory that the penalty and counsel fees were, by the statute, inflicted primarily upon the surety, as well as upon the depository. We think the statute imposes damages by way of penalty for delay, —liability in and counsel fees for excess of penalty of bond. collection, primarily only upon the depository, and not upon the surety. The defaults punished by the statute are those of the depository alone, by the very terms of the statute, and the damages and counsel fees are imposed upon the depository, and it alone.

The statute, however, makes the bond of the depository stand as security for such damages and counsel fees, just as it does for the moneys deposited and unaccounted for. Clearly, the total liability for the acts of the depository secured by the bond, and recoverable from the surety, cannot exceed the penalty of the bond. We think, therefore, the district court erred in awarding damages and counsel fees which, together with the moneys deposited and lost, exceeded the penalty of the bond and legal interest from date of accrual of liability. We think the proper rule to be applied would limit the entire damages for which the surety was liable to the appellee for the defaults of his principal, to the amount of the penalty of the bond. If the surety failed to pay the amount of the liability when it was incurred, the utmost for which it could be held liable for its own delay, as distinguished from that of its principal, the depository, would be interest at the legal rate from the date the liability was incurred (in this case May 28, 1913) until the rendition of the decree, upon an amount not in excess of the penalty of the bond.

We think it was competent for the Mississippi legislature to provide that public depositors should be liable, in case of default, for penalties for delay, and for counsel fees. The terms of the statute in this respect enter into the contract between the county and the depository. The depository was free to accept or reject this added liability. For a like reason it was competent for the legislature to provide that the depository's bond should secure the penalties and counsel fees to the extent of the penalty of the bond.

The surety accepted the added responsibility voluntarily, by executing the bond with knowledge of the terms of the statute. Fidelity & D. Co. v. Wilkinson County, 109 Miss. 879, 69 So. 865; Fidelity Mut. L. Asso. v. Mettler, 185 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 922, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 662.

The refusal of the depository to pay the warrants of the appellees and the closing of its bank excused a demand on the depository. Fidelity & D. Co. v. Wilkinson County, 109 Miss. 879, 69 So. 865. It was, therefore, liable for the statutory penalty and counsel fees, and as the counsel fees alone, in addition to the moneys deposited and unaccounted for, exceeded the penalty of the bond, the entire penalty of the bond was a liability of the depository secured by the bond on which appellant was surety. The cross bill averred the employment of counsel by the county, and this averment was not put in issue or denied by appellant, and required no proof to sustain it.

Evidence of the reasonableness of counsel fee was not objected to by appellant, when offered by the appellee. It could have been material only in the event the employment of counsel was authorized, and failure of appellant to object to it constituted a tacit admission of authority.

We think the decree of the District Court, as far as it related to appellant, was erroneous in amount only, and should have been for the sum of $13,636.13, with interest thereon at the rate of 5½ per cent, the stipulated rate before default, from March 31, 1913, until May 28, 1913, the date of default, and thereafter, and until the decree is finally rendered, at the rate of 6 per cent, the legal rate in Mississippi, and that there should be added to the amount and interest so calculated for counsel fees the sum of $1,363.87—the difference between the penalty of the bond and the amount of moneys deposited and unaccounted for. No interest before final decree is to be allowed upon the counsel fees.

The decree is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree conformably to this opinion; and it is so ordered.

ANNOTATION.

. Invalidity of designation of officer, fiduciary or depository as affecting liability on bond.

I. Scope of note, 274.

II. Officer or fiduciary, 275.

III. Depository, 276.

I. Scope of note.

This annotation reviews the cases discussing the liability of the obligors on the bond of a public officer, fiduciary, or depository, where the appointment or designation of the principal is invalid. It excludes the estoppel of the obligors, by recitals in the bond, to deny the validity of the appointment or designation, and also excludes the liability on the bond of an elected public officer as affected by the invalidity of his election.

II. Officer or fiduciary.

The general rule is that the sureties on a bond given by a designated officer or fiduciary, to enable him to exercise the functions of his office, will not be relieved from liability on the bond because of the invalidity of his appointment.

Virginia. — Cecil v. Early (1853) 10 Gratt. 198.

Thus, in United States v. Maurice (Fed.) supra, it appeared that the defendant executed a bond conditioned to reimburse the government in a certain sum, in case of the failure of an officer, who had been appointed by the Secretary of War, to discharge his duties. The officer failed to account for a certain sum belonging to the government, which had been received by him, and in an action on the bond the defendant contended that he was not liable, as the appointment to the office was void. It was held that, although the appointment was irregular, the defendant was nevertheless liable, since the bond was valid as a contract to secure the performance of the duties of the office.

The same rule was applied in Iredell v. Barbee (N. C.) supra, wherein it appeared that a bond was given by a guardian who had been illegally appointed.

See to the same effect, Griffin v. Collins (Ga.) and Doner's Estate (Pa.) supra. In the case first cited the court said: "As to the sureties, their liability is determined by the Civil Code, § 2554, where it is provided that even if the appointment of the guardian, for any cause, is declared void, they shall nevertheless be responsible on the bond for any property which may have been received by him by virtue of his appointment as guardian. It is idle, therefore, to discuss the authority of the ordinary to appoint a guardian for Harriet A. Lane as affecting the liability of the obligors of the bond now sued on."

So, in Reid v. Humphreys (N. C.) supra, an action on a bond purporting to be a constable's bond, the court said: "Public officers or agents who are not such 'de jure' by reason of a want of authority in the appointing power or defect in the mode of appointment, but who have acted in the office under such defective appointment, are precluded from alleging the informalities as a defense for misconduct. Neither can the sureties, who have voluntarily joined him in a bond for the performance of his duties, and put him forward as an authorized officer, allege such informalities."

Likewise, in Com. v. Teal (Ky.) supra, it was held that, although the appointment of a constable was void, nevertheless, where he gave a bond and incurred liability thereunder, his sureties were liable on the bond as a common-law bond.

In Taylor v. State (Miss.) supra, it was held that the sureties on the bond of a tax collector, who was illegally appointed, could be held liable where he failed to pay over money collected by him as required by law, although the bond was given voluntarily.

The same rule was applied in Mc-

Chord v. Fisher (Ky.) supra, wherein it was held that, although the appointment of an administrator was void, yet a bond given by him was binding on him and his sureties, as to the estate which came into his hands by virtue of the appointment.

In Cecil v. Early (Va.) supra, it was held that the official bond of a person who had been appointed and acted as deputy sheriff was not avoided by the fact that the deputy had not taken the several oaths, etc., as required by the state.

So, in the case of McConomy's Estate (Pa.) supra, it was held that the sureties on a bond given by a person who had been appointed trustee of an estate would not be relieved from liability on the bond because the trustee had been appointed by a court which had no jurisdiction.

But in Olds v. State (Ind.) supra, it was held that the sureties on the bond of a constable could not be held liable for a default of the constable, where the appointment was made by a justice of the peace at a time when there was no vacancy to fill, and as a result the appointment and the bond were both void.

III. Depository.

The sureties on an official bond given by a designated depository, who receives and holds public funds, will not be relieved from liability because of the invalidity of the designation of the depository. Buhrer v. Baldwin (1904) 137 Mich. 263, 100 N. W. 468; Meeker County v. Butler (1879) 25 Minn. 363; Hennepin County v. State Bank (1896) 64 Minn. 180, 66 N. W. 143; Henry County v. Salmon (1907) 201 Mo. 136, 100 S. W. 20; Western Casualty & G. Ins. Co. v. Muskogee County (1916) 60 Okla. 140, L.R.A. 1917B, 977, 159 Pac. 655. See also Snattinger v. Topeka (1909) 80 Kan. 341, 102 Pac. 508. And see the reported case (NATIONAL SURETY CO. v. LEFLORE COUNTY, ante, 269).

Thus, in Hennepin County v. State Bank (1896) 64 Minn. 180, 66 N. W. 143, it appeared that a bank was designated as a depository of the county funds by the board of county commissioners, and not, as the statute required, by the board of auditors. The county funds were deposited pursuant to the designation, and subsequently the bank defaulted in payment. In an action on the bond executed by the bank, conditioned on the proper fulfilment of its duty as depository, the sureties defended on the ground that the designation was invalid. It was held that, although the designation of the bank was absolutely void, the sureties were liable, the court saying: "Public interests would be seriously jeopardized if the sureties upon a county depository bond could exonerate themselves from liability by showing that he was not such de jure. It is true, the condition of the bond is that, if the principal shall be designated a depository pursuant to the statute, the sureties shall be liable for its default; but the regularity or legality of the designation is not of the substance of the condition, for its substance is that, if the funds of the county are deposited with the principal as a depository, it shall pay over the money on demand."

So, in Meeker County v. Butler (1879) 25 Minn. 363, an action against the surety on a bond executed by the defendant as a depository, the court said: "If Butler [defendant] has been duly designated as such depository in the manner provided by law, his sureties are clearly liable for any breach in the condition of the bond; and if he has not been so duly designated, they are equally liable, because they are, as against the public, i. e., the county, estopped to deny such designation, by the consideration that to permit such denial would be to allow them to take advantage of their own wrong in unlawfully getting possession of the county moneys."

Likewise, in the reported case (NATIONAL SURETY CO. v. LEFLORE COUNTY), the sureties are held liable on the official bond of a depository, although the designation of the depository was void. See to the same effect, Western Casualty & G. Ins. Co. v. Muskogee County (Okla.) supra.

In Henry County v. Salmon (1907) 201 Mo. 136, 100 S. W. 20, it was held that the sureties were liable on a bond given by a banker, which was conditioned on the performance of his duty as county depository, although the county judge made no preliminary order designating the banker as depository, as was required by a statute. The court said: "By signing and delivering the bond in suit the sureties intended Salmon & Salmon should be county depository. That act enabled them to get hold of the county moneys. Under such conditions it becomes immaterial whether there was any formal order designating Salmon & Salmon county depository. Such order was not intended for the benefit of the sureties; it was no concern of theirs. Its office was to give authority to the depository to demand the county funds from the treasurer, and its force is spent in that direction. . . . The engagement of these sureties was to stand sponsor for Salmon & Salmon—to answer for their default."

And see Burher v. Baldwin (1904) 137 Mich. 263, 100 N. W. 468, wherein it was held that a surety who guaranteed the payment of county funds to be deposited in an unincorporated bank, was liable, although the contract of the county board of auditors to deposit in such a bank was prohibited by statute. APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Maricopa County (Gibbons, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due upon an account for supplies alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendants. Modified.

Statement by Ross, Ch. J.:

The Pabst Brewing Company sued the Arizona Mercantile Company, alleging it to be a partnership consisting of Sawyer, Olney, and Wolpe. The Mercantile Company and Wolpe defaulted. Defendants Sawyer and Olney joined in an answer to the complaint, in which they alleged that the goods for the value of which plaintiff sued were sold and delivered to the Arizona Mercantile Company, a duly organized and existing corporation doing business in Arizona. They also alleged that they were not partners with the Mercantile Company, or with Wolpe; that they had, at the special insistence and request of the Mercantile Company and its president, Wolpe, made, from time to time, advances to the Mercantile Company for the purpose of carrying on its business, and, to the extent of such advances, were creditors of such Mercantile Company.

The case was tried before a jury, which found the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and thereafter judgment was entered thereon. At the close of the evidence, both plaintiff and defendants asked for an instructed verdict. The defendants assign as error the refusal of the court to instruct the jury to return such verdict, and also the giving of certain instructions.

The facts, briefly stated, are: Defendant Wolpe, prior to April, 1917, had been engaged in the selling in Arizona of a drink known as "Pablo," which he had bought from the plaintiff. About that time he solicited the other defendants to join him in the business of buying and selling soft drinks, including "Pablo," to which they consented. It was agreed among them that their operations would be carried on by a corporation. They went together to the office of Mr. George S. Stoneman, a practising attorney of Phoenix, and submitted to him the matter of making proper arrangements, and while in his office Wolpe suggested that he was president and treasurer of the Arizona Mercantile Company, an already organized and existing corporation, and it was thereupon mutually agreed that they would take over that corporation and carry on their business enterprise through it. There was some discussion as to the shares that each of the parties would receive, and how the business was to be managed. Wolpe was to take to Stoneman's office the minutes and by-laws of the Arizona Mercantile Company, and a meeting of the stockholders was to be arranged for the purpose of reorganization. Stoneman advised them that they could not issue stock or elect a new board of directors until a meeting of the stockholders had been called, and that he would attend to the issuing of the stock to the three of them in proper proportions as soon as such meeting was had. They were advised by Stoneman that they could conduct the business under the name of the Arizona Mercantile Company pending the reorganization, although, as he says, "I expressed some disapproval." The Arizona Mercantile Company had theretofore been engaged in the wholesale liquor business under the management and control of Wolpe, who was its president and treasurer. It had liquidated its business, and at the time had no assets and owed no debts. At this meeting it was definitely settled that defendants Sawyer and Olney would invest in the enterprise $1,500 each, and that Wolpe would put into the concern whatever stock he had on hand, estimated to be worth $1,500 or $1,600, and that stock of the corporation would be issued to them later on. Sawyer and Olney thereupon deposited in the bank to the credit of the Arizona Mercantile Company $1,500 each. The business was thereafter conducted under the management of Wolpe in the name of the Arizona Mercantile Company. In that name it bought goods from plaintiff from April, 1917, to September, valued at $12,128, and paid it all except $1,212.80. The corporation was not reorganized, and no certificates of stock were ever issued to defendants, Sawyer, Olney, or Wolpe. The plaintiff knew no one in its dealings except the Mercantile Company and Wolpe, and did not learn of Sawyer's or Olney's connection with the business until sometime in August, when it discovered that the Mercantile Company was in failing condition. When this fact became known, Olney, who was on the ground, took steps, along with an agent of plaintiff, in investigating, collecting, and conserving the assets of the concern, and it is in evidence that he on one occasion stated that he, Sawyer, and Wolpe were partners in the soft drink business. Wolpe owned or had in his name one share of stock of the par value of $100. There were outstanding, besides the Wolpe share, two other shares. Wolpe had been in charge of and controlled the Arizona Mercantile Company for some seven years before the soft drink business started. While it appears that the Arizona Mercantile Company was a subsidiary corporation to Melczar Brothers, who had formerly carried on business in Phoenix, Wolpe testified he was in fact the owner of the Mercantile Company. It is in evidence that Wolpe, Olney, and Sawyer never intended to form a partnership, but believed they were operating as a corporation.

Ross, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the contention of defendants on this appeal that the above facts clearly show that they were not a partnership, and that the court, therefore, erred in its refusal, at the close of the evidence, to instruct the jury to return a verdict in their favor.

"As to ability to transact business, corporations may be divided into three classes: First, de jure corporations, or those where the organization is entirely and legally perfected; second, de facto corporations, where there has been a bona fide attempt to organize a corporation and a user of corporate powers, but the organization is defective; third, corporations not sufficiently organized to come within the latter class." Alder Slope Ditch Co. v. Moonshine Ditch Co. 90 Or. 385, 176 Pac. 593.

In cases where parties associated together to carry on a business have been sought to be held as partners, notwithstanding they have thought themselves to be a corporation, the decisive question is always as to whether what they have done, or caused to be done, toward organization, is sufficient to constitute them a corporation de facto or de jure. The courts are not agreed as to what acts will constitute a de facto corporation, largely, we think, because the incorporating laws of the states differ; but they unite in agreeing, when the acts done, although falling short of constituting a de jure corporation, are sufficient to constitute a de facto corporation, the associates are not individually liable on contracts entered into by the corporation. In the present case we are not bothered with incomplete organization—liability as

the question as to whether the Arizona Mercantile Company was a de facto or a de jure corporation. It is conceded by both parties to be of the latter character. It was properly and legally chartered, fully organized, and, under its articles of incorporation, empowered to carry on the business undertaken; and, had the board of directors or the stockholders authorized the stock subscriptions that its president and treasurer accepted, the transaction could not be questioned. Appellee asserts that what was done did not effect a merging of the defendants into the dormant corporation; that there was not even a de facto or colorable reorganization, and the defendants merely used the Arizona Mercantile Company as a tradename in anticipation of gaining control of the dormant corporation.

As we gather it, the dominant idea in this proposition is that, because there was no reorganization of the Arizona Mercantile Company by the defendants, they had no right to do their business under that name as a corporation. It cannot reasonably and fairly be said that the defendants arbitrarily assumed to use the name of the Arizona Mercantile Company, for the reason that its president and treasurer, who seemed to be its alter ego, and who at least had been in control of it, assumed the right and authority to accept subscriptions of stock from the defendants, and did on behalf of the corporation receive from them $3,000, which, together with his contribution, constituted the entire paid-in capital of the company.

Wolpe was not a stranger to the Mercantile Company. He was its chief executive officer, and, as its treasurer, held its purse strings. If he did not own it, as he claimed, his relation to it was of such an intimate and commanding nature as to cause Sawyer, Olney, and Wolpe, under the advice of their lawyer, to assume to carry on the business in its name pending a reorganization and the issuing of their stock. They did not adopt the name and carry on their business in it with the intention of later incorporating, as is common in so many of the cases cited by plaintiff. On the contrary, they, in good faith and under legal advice, paid hard cash into an existing body corporate, and in its name thereafter the business was transacted. They may have expected—in fact, we know they expected—to reorganize the Arizona Mercantile Company; but their failure to do so did not make it any the less a de jure corporation, and did not in the least mislead the plaintiff.

Whether the company was regularly, or in strict compliance with law, prepared to accept stock subscriptions and enter into the business of buying and selling soft drinks, or not, it unquestionably did so through the offices of its president and treasurer, and presumably with the acquiescence and consent of all of its officers and stockholders. In such circumstances, the corporation, having received the benefits from the stock sale, would not be permitted to retain those benefits and repudiate its obligations thereunder. This, we think, is the universal rule. Weathersby v. Texas & O. Lumber Co. 7 A.L.R. 1440, and note at page 1446, 107 Tex. 474, 180 S. W. 735.

Our research, which has been somewhat extensive, has not brought to light, nor has counsel's industry called our attention to, any cases wherein the facts were as they are in the present case. Wesco Supply Co. v. Smith, 134 Ark. 23, 203 S. W. 6, we think is of sufficient similarity to be referred to as authority. In that case the Arkansas Public Service Company was organized by U. S. Bratton and others, Bratton being the principal owner of the proposed corporation, and its president. He sold practically one-half interest in the concern for $20,500, to one Smith, to be paid at various times thereafter. Smith paid in part of the purchase money, and took control of and managed the business for a while. For debts contracted during this time, the Arkansas Public Service Company gave its notes to the Wesco Supply Company. The service company becoming insolvent, the supply company sued Bratton and Smith as partners. The lower court gave judgment in favor of Smith, and, upon appeal, the judgment was affirmed; the court using this language: "The undisputed facts here show that appellant dealt with the service company as a corporation. Such being the case, there is no good reason why the appellant should be permitted to hold the appellee individually liable as a partner for the debts of the service company. Appellant did not deal with the appellee, but dealt with the corporation, and appellant would get all that it was entitled to in justice, according to its contract, if it maintained a liability against the corporation or its individual stockholders. Appellee, under the evidence, was certainly not one of the original incorporators, and did not undertake by his supposed purchase of stock to become liable as a partner for the debts of the corporation, nor assume any other liability than would be incumbent upon him as a shareholder in proportion to his interest.

. . . But neither does it follow that, because the incorporators or the individual stockholders might be liable under a given state of facts, one who had contracted for the purchase of stock, but to whom no stock in fact, has been transferred, would also be liable as a partner. Here the undisputed evidence shows that Smith was not an original incorporator, and that he had in fact only entered into a contract for the purchase of stock."

In the present case plaintiff had been selling its product to defendant Wolpe, and when the Arizona Mercantile Company took over the business plaintiff simply transferred its account from Wolpe to the Arizona Mercantile Company, with a $4,500 or $4,600 capital, as against the $1,500 or $1,600 stock of goods that Wolpe then had on hand. It had the benefit of this increased financial ability of its creditor, and dealt with it with absolutely no knowledge that defendants Sawyer and Olney were in any way at all identified with the corporation. It appears to us that, in equity, the plaintiff would secure all that it was entitled to, if the obligation sued upon be held to be that of the Arizona Mercantile Company, a corporation. If Olney stated on one occasion—and this he denies—that the business was a partnership, it would not make it so, if, under the facts, it was a corporation. The ordinary layman is hardly able to determine so involved and intricate a question, when lawyers so radically differ.

Appellee cites the case of Bank of De Soto v. Reed, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 102, 109 S. W. 256, as sustaining its position, but in that case the question involved was as to whether the proposed corporation was in fact a de facto corporation, and the court held that it was not under the laws of Texas. Appellee also relies upon Forbes v. Whittemore, 62 Ark. 229, 35 S. W. 223. In that case the purchasers of the Southwestern Arkansas College's real and personal property, after taking possession, contracted some debts and gave notes in the name of the Southwestern Arkansas College. It was held that the parties who purchased the property of the college were personally liable on the notes, and that the college was not. The court said these parties were not the agents of the college, or members of the college. "In their contract with it, each party preserved its individuality, neither being merged into the other."

And further observed that there was no organization of the purchasers into a corporation, that they were not a de facto corporation, and that the assumption of the name of the corporation did not constitute them a corporation, or give them the right to act in a corporate capacity. The facts in the case are not parallel to the facts of the present case, for several reasons; the principal one being that in the agreement it was stipulated the property should revert to the Southwestern Arkansas College, on default of payments as provided therein. The contract was not made by the president of the Southwestern Arkansas College, and did not purport to be for its benefit. On the contrary, it was an effort to charge its property without its consent and to its damage.

We conclude that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to return its verdict in favor of defendants Sawyer and Olney, upon their motion at the close of the evidence. The cause is therefore remanded, with directions that judgment be modified by striking out any recovery against defendants Sawyer and Olney.

ANNOTATION.

Personal liability of persons doing business in the name of a dormant corporation.

There is no direct authority other than the reported case (SAWYER v. PABST BREWING Co. ante, 277) upon the state of facts there involved, as to the liability of those doing business in the name of a dormant corporation. In Cummings Mfg. Co. v. Smith (1915) 113 Me. 347, 93 Atl. 968, persons (apparently directors) who became the owners of a mortgage upon the corporate property, and who upon its foreclosure became the purchasers, and after the expiration of the redemption were the absolute owners of every item of property of which the corporation had been possessed, and during this time proceeded to do business in the name of the corporation, and contracted the whole account for which the suit was brought, except one item, were held liable to the person thus selling goods, as partners. The court says: "The defendants were the absolute owners of every conceivable item of property of which the F. J. Smith Company had been possessed. During this time they proceeded to do business in the name of the F. J. Smith Company, as they had a right to do, and contracted the whole account for which the plaintiff brings this suit except one item. But doing business in its name did not alter the fact that this company was out of business, and was dead in law and in fact. . . . So far as financial responsibility was concerned, they might just as well have done business in the name of the F. J. Jones Company. But it is said although they owned the property they did not take possession of it, but continued the business in the name, and obtained credit on the responsibility, of the corporation, and that the plaintiff, having given credit upon this theory, should now be confined for redress to the corporation to which he gave credit. This might be true if the plaintiff had known or had been informed of the true condition of the corporation. But had it known that this company had been stripped of every vestige of property, and was utterly worthless, it may be fairly assumed that it would not have given any credit whatever. The case shows that the plaintiff believed it was giving credit to a going concern, possessed of the apparent assets and good will of the business, and acted upon this understanding. It follows that the plaintiff cannot as a matter of law, under those circumstances, be held to have given credit to the F. J. Smith Company, although its account is charged to that company. . . . The remaining question is, In what capacity was the credit obtained by the defendants as partners or tenants in common? The broadest definition of partnership should be invoked to cover the relation of the defendants to the plaintiff in this case. At least technicality of definition should not be allowed to defeat the plaintiff's suit. It should be observed that a partnership is not what the associated parties say it is, nor what they think it is, nor does it depend upon any particular agreement, but is an inference of law from existing facts. . . . Therefore, what the defendants intended or thought does not necessarily control. The question is whether the plaintiff, when it discovered the true state of affairs, was authorized to regard the relation of the defendants to the credit it had given as that of a partnership in this particular case." It further appears in this case that, after the goods had been obtained, these, together with all the other property of the defunct corporation, were sold to a new corporation organized by the defendants. The fact that the defendants thus obtained possession of the goods is a determinative factor in the decision. On this point the court said: "There was a community of interest among the defendants. They had the benefit of the credit. They, not the corporation, had the benefit of the profits, if any. They sold them to themselves, by the vote of purchase. The inference of law is, in this particular transaction, that they were partners in obtaining the credit which they received from the plaintiff."

Cases passing upon the liability of those transacting business as a corporation after the expiration of the charter may be useful in this connection, and some are included, but no exhaustive discussion of these cases is attempted.

Where the stockholders of a corporation which had become extinct by the expiration of the time limited for its existence by its charter agreed to furnish, in proportion to the stock respectively owned by them, the necessary capital to carry on the business carried on by the corporation, and appointed one of their number as agent or superintendent for that purpose, the parties being entitled under the agreement to participate in the profits in proportion to their interest therein, and being liable in the same proportion, as between each other, for any loss that might be incurred, such parties are partners as to third persons. National Union Bank v. Landon (1871) 45 N. Y. 410. The argument was advanced in this case that, as the plaintiff did not know of the existence of the partnership at the time of discounting the drafts and notes sued upon, it could not recover against the members as partners. In answer to this contention the court, admitting its truth, says: "He [the cashier of the plaintiff's bank] testified that the plaintiff had discounted paper for the corporation, and that he was unaware of its dissolution, and supposed that this was corporation paper. But this furnishes no answer to the claim of the plaintiff. The latter believed the paper to be that of the corporation from the fact that the firm did their business in the same name, but this did not affect the right of the plaintiff to proceed against the real makers of the note upon discovering who were transacting business under that name." It does not seem to have been contended in this case, however, that the liability was that of the corporation. The liability of the defendants as partners was sought to be avoided, on the theory that the relation of the defendants to each other was not that of partners, but that the transaction was a joint adventure merely, without interest in the profit and loss resulting therefrom; that the agreement entered into between the defendants defined the extent of the agent's powers, and that he could not bind them by any obligations made by him in which they did not all assent.

But in Central City Sav. Bank v. Walker (1876) 66 N. Y. 424, the stockholders in a corporation were held not liable as partners, where, after the expiration of the company's charter, its business was continued and conducted the same as before, by an agent who had theretofore managed and conducted it, in the name of the corporation, the agents being ignorant of the expiration of the charter, as were also the stockholders sued. The obligation sued upon was a note given for money borrowed after the expiration of the charter, for the use of, and to carry on the business of, the company. The court says: "The defendants did not hold themselves out as copartners; neither did they, by word or act, assent to the making of the note in suit, or to the transaction of any business in the name of the corporation in their behalf, or with knowledge that its legal existence had terminated. Some six months after the expiration of the charter a dividend was paid to the defendants, as from the earnings of the corporation, by the check of the treasurer, as annual dividends had been paid in former years, but without notice to them that it was not paid from the earnings of the corporation, or that the corporation had ceased to exist; and there was no proof that it was paid from the earnings of the business transaction in the name of the company after the lapse of the twenty years from its organization. The claim to recover is based solely on the fact that the agent of the corporation, without any authority other than that conferred by resolution of the trustees, and under an appointment by them during the existence of the corporation, continued to carry on the business and contract debts, including that in controversy, in the name of the corporation, after the term for which it was created had expired."

The case of National Union Bank v. Landon (N. Y.) supra, is referred to, and is held to be distinguishable by the fact that in the Landon Case there was a special agreement between the stockholders, under which the business was conducted after the legal expiration of the charter, by which they made themselves partners in fact as well as in law. See Wilson v. Brown (1919) 107 Misc. 167, 175 N. Y. Supp. 688, affirmed in (1919) 190 App. Div. 926, 179 N. Y. Supp. 958.

In Ewald Iron Co. v. Com. (1910) 140 Ky. 692, 131 S. W. 774, (1911) 142 Ky. 465, 134 S. W. 481, a case involving the question whether the property of a corporation, which continued to do business after its charter had expired, should be taxed to the corporation or to the sole stockholder thereof, the court, after referring to the statute which provides that, when any corporation expires by the terms of the articles of incorporation, it may thereafter continue to act for the purpose of closing up its business, but for no other purpose, says: "The statute provides that the corporation shall continue to act for the purpose of closing up its business, but for no other purpose. When, as in this case, the corporation continues to act and carry on its business as before, taking no steps to close up after the articles of incorporation have expired, the stockholders are simply doing business as partners. They are personally liable for all debts made; and acts done are not the acts of the corporation, but the acts of the stockholders."

According to the court in Wasson v. Boland (1909) 136 Mo. App. 622, 118 S. W. 663, under the law as administered in Iowa, stockholders of a corporation which continued to do business after its charter had expired cannot be held as partners, in the absence of a statute imposing such liability.

Michigan Supreme Court—June 6, 1921.

Workmen's compensation — injury out of state — application of statute.

Where the provisions of a workmen's compensation act are optional the relation between master and servant is contractual, and, where the parties have accepted the provisions of the act, the right to compensation exists in cases of injury out of the state as well as in those arising within its borders, and it is immaterial that the statute restricts the right to compensation to such as is provided by this act, and provides that the hearing shall be held at the locality where the injury occurred.

Fellows, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff's husband, George M. Crane, was in the employ of defendant Leonard, Crossette, & Riley, an Ohio corporation authorized to do business in this state. It was engaged in buying and shipping produce, and operated at about forty points in Michigan, among the points being Greenville, where Mr. Crane was employed. It had elected to come under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Comp. Laws 1915, chap. 101), and defendant Southern Surety Company carried the risk. On December 11, 1919, the company shipped out three cars of potatoes, one to Chicago and the others to St. Louis. It was the custom of the company at that time of year to have an employee accompany the shipment, for the purpose of keeping up a fire in the cars to prevent the freezing of the potatoes. Mr. Crane was employed for this purpose. The car arrived in Chicago the following day. In the evening of December 13th, Mr. Crane was found unconscious in one of the cars with a badly crushed skull. He was hurried to a hospital, but died soon after. The evidence is convincing that he must have received his injury after the cars arrived in Chicago. The board awarded compensation upon the theory that the act applied, whether the death occurred within or without the state.

We, therefore, have submitted to us for the first time the question—and it is the only question in the case—of whether the employer who has elected to become subject to the Workmen's Compensation Act is liable, where the employee, who has also elected to become subject to the act, receives his injuries outside the state while in the course of the employment. The case has been ably briefed, and the labors of the court materially lightened by the research of counsel.

The contention of defendants' counsel that the act does not apply where the accident occurs outside the state finds support in the English cases. See Hicks v. Maxton, 1 B. W. C. C. 150; Tomalin v. S. Pearson & Son [1909] 2 K. B. 61, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 863, 100 L. T. N. S. 685, 25 Times L. R. 477, 2 B. W. C. C. 1; Schwartz v. India-rubber, G. & Teleg. Works Co. [1912] 2 K. B. 299, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 780, [1912] W. N. 98, 106 L. T. N. S. 706, 28 Times L. R. 331, [1912] W. C. Rep. 190, 5 B. W. C. C. 390. These cases unequivocally hold that no liability exists where the accident occurs outside the British Empire.

Undoubtedly the earliest case in this country is Gould's Case, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372, 4 N. C. C. A. 60. This is a case of first impression so far as the rule in this country is concerned. In it the Massachusetts court followed the English holdings, and found insuperable difficulties in holding otherwise. We shall not attempt to distinguish this case from the holdings in other states where the same question has arisen, nor is there such a difference between the Massachusetts act and our own as to justify us in saying that it is not applicable. If we accept it as controlling authority, it would necessarily follow that defendants' contention must be sustained. That it has not been followed in many states, and that its doctrine has met much adverse criticism, will be demonstrated by an examination of the authorities to which we shall presently refer. Mr. Bradbury followed it in the first edition of his work (see Bradbury, Workmen's Comp. 1st ed. p. 44), but when the second edition was prepared he had modified his views (see 1 Bradbury, Workmen's Comp. 2d ed. pp. 50, 51), and in the third edition (see Bradbury, Workmen's Comp. 3d ed. p.

92), he said: "Therefore, now, as in the second edition of this work, partially receding from the position taken in the first edition of this work, although that position has been sustained by eminent authority, it is believed that the doctrine which must be established finally will be, in effect, that the law of the place where a contract of employment is made will govern the rights and liabilities of employees and employers to claim and to pay compensation."

That Mr. Bradbury was convinced that the weight of authority was against the Massachusetts holding, and that it should not be followed, is evidenced by a note prepared by him to the case of Spratt v. Sweeney & G. Co. 168 App. Div. 403, 153 N. Y. Supp. 505, found in 9 N. C. C. A. 918. After citing the Gould Case and early holdings of our board and the Wisconsin commission, he said: "Upon more mature deliberation, however, other courts came to a contrary conclusion. They held that, inasmuch as the liability of an employer to pay compensation for injury to an employee was essentially a contractual one under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, such statutes had extraterritorial effect, to the extent that where the employer and the employee were both residents of the state where the contract of employment was made, the law of that state would be applied, even though the accident happened without the state."

After considering some of the authorities, he continues: "If, however, a claim under a compensation act is based on a contract, either express or implied, then there is no more reason why such a claim should not be so decided in accordance with the law of the place where the contract is made, any more than there would be for a claim for wages in accordance with the law where the contract was made, even though the employee performed the services in several states."

The Illinois court also sustains the contention of defendants' counsel. Union Bridge & Constr. Co. v. In- dustrial Commission, 287 Ill. 396, 122 N. E. 609. While it is true that by the title to the Illinois act (Laws 1913, p. 335) it is limited to "accidental injuries or deaths suffered . . . within the state," the court did not rest decision on this fact alone, but followed the doctrine of the Gould Case.

The supreme court of California in North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury, 174 Cal. 1, L.R.A.1917E, 642, 162 Pac. 93, held that the act of that state did not cover accidents occurring outside the state. But the California act is a compulsory one—not optional, as is ours. This undoubtedly had much to do with the result in this case, which was disposed of on rehearing.

Mr. Honnold, treating of this subject (1 Honnold, Workmen's Compensation, § 8), says: "In view of the conflict of authority and differences between the various acts, it is difficult to formulate a precise rule relative to the extraterritorial operation of these laws; but it may be stated on the weight of authority that acts not construed to be contractual in character do not, in the absence of unequivocal language to the contrary, apply where the injury occurs outside the state, while, on the other hand, acts construed to be contractual protect one injured outside the state, where the contract of employment was made within the state and is governed by the laws of the state."

We shall now consider the decision of some of the states sustaining the contention of plaintiff's counsel. The gist of the later decisions is quite well stated by the supreme court of Colorado in Industrial Commission v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 64 Colo. 480, 3 A.L.R. 1336, 174 Pac. 589, where this question was before that court. After considering the Gould Case and quoting from Bradbury's 2d edition, it is said:

"The later authorities in this country base the conclusion chiefly on the proposition that, under voluntary compensation statutes such as ours, the cause of action of petitioner is ex contractu, and that lex loci contractus governs the construction of the contract and determines the legal obligations arising under it.

"The provisions of the Compensation Act are to be construed as written into the contract, and therefore a part of it."

The question has been before the courts of New Jersey on several occasions. In Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 371, 94 Atl. 392, it was said: "We are now dealing with the simpler question whether a New Jersey court will enforce a New Jersey contract according to the terms of a New Jersey statute. The question hardly calls for an answer. The place where the accident occurs is of no more relevance than is the place of accident to the assured in an action on a contract of accident insurance, or the place of death of the assured in an action on a contract of life insurance."

In Deeny v. Wright & C. Lighterage Co. 36 N. J. L. 121, where the question was before the court, it was said: "It appears that there is an implied contract to compensate for injuries arising out of and in the course of the employment, and under it all other methods and rights to any other form of compensation are relinquished. The statute can have no extraterritorial effect, but it can require a contract to be made by two parties to a hiring that the contract shall have an extraterritorial effect. The contract is binding on the employee himself and upon the employer, and it is conclusively presumed that the parties have accepted the provisions of § 2 and have agreed to be bound thereby. The method of termination of the contract is provided for in ¶ 10. It would seem that the reasonable construction of the statute is that it writes into the contract of employment certain additional terms. The cause of action of petitioner is ex contractu. The lex loci contractus governs the construction of the contract and determines the legal obligations arising from it."

And in Foley v. Home Rubber Co. 89 N. J. L. 474, 99 Atl. 624, compensation was awarded for the death of an employee who went down with the Lusitania on his way to Europe in the master's service.

Plaintiff's contention is supported by Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. 89 Conn. 367, 94 Atl. 372. This is an exhaustive opinion. We shall not quote from it. It will be found in L.R.A.1916A, 436, accompanied by a note having reference to the authorities.

We shall not consider the earlier New York cases disposed of by courts other than the court of last resort, as the court of appeals of that state has had the question before it, and has determined it in accordance with plaintiff's contention in the case of Post v. Burger & Gohlke, 216 N. Y. 544, 111 N. E. 351, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 158, 10 N. C. C. A. 888. It was there said: "The act, in view of its humane purpose, should be construed to intend that in every case of employment there is a constructive contract between the employer and the employee, general in its terms and unlimited as to territory, that the employer shall pay as provided by the act for a disability or the death of the employee, as therein stated. The duty under the statute defines the terms of the contract."

The supreme court of Rhode Island fully considered the question in an exhaustive opinion in Grinnell v. Wilkinson, 39 R. I. 447, L.R.A. 1917D, 767, 98 Atl. 103, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 618, and concluded: "We are of the opinion that the reasoning of the cases above cited from New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut is quite applicable to the case at bar; that under the Workmen's Compensation Act of Rhode Island the relation of employer and employee is contractual, and the terms of the act are to be read as a part of every contract of service between those subject to its terms; that on principle and in reason, and in view of the purpose, scope, and character of the act, it should be construed and held to include injuries arising out of the state as well as those arising within it; and that the weight of authority upon acts similar to our own gives full support to our conclusion."

The question was before the supreme court of Iowa in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. 185 Iowa, 1346, 172 N. W. 191. We quote quite extensively from what was there said:

"We hold that we are not precluded from finding that our own statute covers injuries sustained in another state because the act does not, in terms, declare that the statute shall have such effect, and that we may find it has such effect, because its language is broad enough to cover such injuries, and that to construe it as covering them effects the broad, beneficial object of the enactment.

"Our statute is confessedly elective. We are told that no distinction in construction is to be based upon whether the act is compulsory or elective. That is true as to some provisions of Compensation Acts. But that the statute is elective has controlling bearing on one thing that is most highly important. Where the statute is elective as to both employer and employee, payment of compensation is not the performance of a statute duty, but the performance of conditions in the contract of hiring, which conditions are in the contract by means of reading the Compensation Statute into the contract. . . . The entire structure of the Iowa act not only fails to prohibit such a contract, but, by being elective, creates a contractual relation under a contract providing for settlement on a standard fixed by the Iowa act. Such a contract is no more objectionable than one providing for a common-law arbitration. See Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Iowa, 245, L.R.A.1917D, 15, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 803, 11 N. C. C. A. 886. Under such a contract, the employee could not refuse to obey if the master directed him to leave the state to perform an act in the course of the employment. If he did obey, there is no reason why the master should be allowed to repudiate that part of the contract of employment which provided how compensation should be made if the servant suffered an injury while obeying this direction. Such a contract protects both, and defines the rights of both. The master is assured of the limitations of his liability. The servant is assured of definitely fixed compensation, mutually agreed upon as adequate, and that he will receive the same promptly, and without the vexation or expense of litigation.

We hold that the employee in this case has a valid contract, which allows him to recover compensation according to the terms of the statute for an injury suffered in Nebraska; that the case stands precisely as if it had been expressly contracted that, for an injury suffered outside of the state, the compensation due should be determined by the terms of the Iowa statute."

The West Virginia court was called upon to consider the question in Gooding v. Ott, 77 W. Va. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 637, 87 S. E. 862, where the court said: "A distinction has been noted in some of the authorities between cases arising under compulsory statutes, and those controlled by statute, as in New Jersey, and we think in this state, which are optional. Where the statute compels submission by the employer and employee, there is no contract, as a general rule, enforceable outside the state. But where, as in New Jersey and in this state, the statute makes acceptance optional, and the parties freely enter into the contract of employment with reference to the statute, the statute should be read into the contract as an integral part thereof, binding the parties, and enforceable in any jurisdiction the same as any other contract."

This case was followed in Foughty v. Ott, 80 W. Va. 88, 92 S. E. 143, 15 N. C. C. A. 919.

The supreme court of Minnesota in State ex rel. Chambers v. District Ct. 139 Minn. 205, 3 A.L.R. 1347, 166 N. W. 185, had this question before it. It called attention to the diversity of authorities, and tersely stated: "The weight of authority supports the view that under an elective act like ours, and with facts such as are present, an accidental injury, though it occurs outside the state, is compensable. This view we adopt."

The supreme court of Wisconsin considered the question in the very recent case of Anderson v. Miller Scrap Iron Co. 169 Wis. 106, 170 N. W. 275, 171 N. W. 935, and there said: "As has been said, the Workmen's Compensation Act is based upon the economic theory that it is in the interest of the general welfare that damages arising from injuries sustained by persons engaged in a particular industry shall be borne by that industry. The liability of the employer at common law was limited to cases where negligence could be established. Where negligence was established, the burden was borne in the first instance by the employer, who ordinarily had an opportunity to pass all or a part of the burden on. In cases where negligence could not be established, the injured employee bore the entire burden, with no opportunity to pass it on. Under the Workmen's Compensation Act the burden falls upon society at large, and is not borne entirely either by the employer or by the employee. If the application of the law be limited to injuries occurring within this state, then in the case of injuries sustained without the state the employer will not be liable except he be negligent, and where he is not negligent the whole loss must be borne by the employee, and the whole legislative purpose is, as to injuries sustained without the state, defeated. We have extensive borders; thousands of employees are passing out of and into Wisconsin daily, and almost hourly, in the discharge of their ordinary duties. Can it be that the legislature intended that every time these employees crossed the state line their right to compensation for injuries incidental to and growing out of their employment should be changed, and that as to injuries which occur beyond the state line the old system instead of the new should apply?

"If the Workmen's Compensation Acts of the several states are to be given effect so as to make them general in their application, they must be held to apply to injuries to employees wherever they occur. If accidents occurring without the state are to be in one class and accidents occurring within the state are to be in another class, every state might have a workmen's compensation act, and yet both the old and the new systems would still be in force and the legislative purpose would not be accomplished. The construction here placed upon the act will give the legislative intent full effect, and, if recognized by the courts of sister states, will give every employee the remedy provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act under which his contract of employment was made."

The authorities, and particularly the later ones, lead irresistibly to the conclusion that where the act is an optional one, as is ours, the relations are contractual, and the provisions of the act become a part of the contract of employment, the employer agreeing to pay, and the employee agreeing to accept, compensation, in case of accident, in accordance with the provisions of the act. That the relation under our act is contractual has been recognized by this court. In Mackin v. Detroit-Timkin Axle Co. 187 Mich. 8, 153 N. W. 49, it was said: "In some states the law is made compulsory upon both parties, or upon one with choice to the other, giving rise to questions which need not be considered here, since the law in this state, as applied to this case, becomes operative upon neither employer nor employee who does not

compensation—injury out of state—application of statute.

expressly or implied consent; but, if the employer so elects, and the employee does not give written notice to the contrary, he is conclusively presumed to have consented, and comes under the act."

And in Dettloff v. Hammond, S. & Co. 195 Mich. 117, 161 N. W. 949, 14 N. C. C. A. 901, it was said: "On the other hand, the liability of the creamery company, by virtue of the Workmen's Compensation Act, rests solely upon contract."

Reliance is placed on Willis v. Oscar Daniels Co. 200 Mich. 19, 166 N. W. 496, 16 N. C. C. A. 510, to sustain defendants' position. But that case dealt with an accident on government land to an employee in the employ of a government contractor. It did not involve the question here before us. Commenting on this case, we said in Oscar Daniels Co. v. Sault Ste. Marie, 208 Mich. 363, 175 N. W. 160: "Willis v. Oscar Daniels Co. supra, may, and should, rest upon the ground that the state legislation sought there to be enforced affected the United States in a matter over which it had exclusive jurisdiction, namely, the building of a lock in the ceded territory."

But it is insisted by defendants' counsel that the act, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed; that certain provisions of the act show a legislative intent that it shall not apply to accidents occurring outside the state. Manifestly, if the act shows such intent, it is our duty to so hold. It is first pointed out that the concluding words of the title are: "And restricting the right to compensation or damages in such cases to such as are provided by this act."

We cannot feel that the legislature in the use of this language intended to limit the locus of the accident, or to intend that compensation for injuries should only be allowable where the accident occurred within the state. If such had been the intent of the legislature, a few simple words would have clearly expressed it. The other provisions which are thought to be persuasive are the provisions in § 8 of part 3 (§ 5461, Comp. Laws 1915), providing that the hearings of the committee of arbitration "shall be held at the locality where the injury occurred," and the provision found in § 13 of part 3 (§ 5466, Comp. Laws 1915), providing for presentation of a certified copy of the award "to the circuit court for the county in which such accident occurred," and providing for judgment "without notice." Similar provisions to these were deemed persuasive to the Massachusetts court in the Gould Case, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372, 4 N. C. C. A. 60, but, as already indicated, we do not follow that holding. The provision for the hearings of the committee of arbitration need not be literally followed; the hearing need not be held at the very spot the accident occurred. It was designed that it should be held at a convenient place for parties and their witnesses, and does not make void a result reached at some other place, in the absence of rights being prejudicially affected. It does not convince us that compensation should be refused where it is impracticable to hold the hearing on the very place of the accident. The other provision, it will be noted, permits rendition of judgment "without notice." We are not persuaded that this provision is exclusive. As pointed out by plaintiff's counsel, if judgment is desired without notice to the other party, it may be entered under the provisions of this section, but if these provisions are not applicable, there is nothing in the act which prevents suit upon the award as upon a common-law arbitration. Both of these provisions are found in the part of the act dealing with "Procedure," and not in the parts of the act dealing with liability. We must decline to follow defendants' counsel in this contention.

To recapitulate: Plaintiff's husband was employed in Michigan to work for defendant. The contract of employment was a Michigan contract, and the Workmen's Compensation Act became and was a part of it. Both parties agreed to be bound by its terms. The contract was to be performed within and without the state. Deceased met his death within the ambit of his employment. The rights, being contractual, accompanied the employee wherever he went within the ambit of his employment. This construction is within the legislative intent when we consider the purposes of the act. And this is the construction it must receive at our hands.

The award is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Extraterritorial operation of workmen's compensation statutes; conflict of laws.

II. Extraterritorial operation of statutes:

- a. Extraterritorial operation necessary to carry out purposes of statutes, 292.
- b. Acceptance of elective acts as constituting contract effective in other states, 293.

This annotation supplements that in 3 A.L.R. 1351, on the above question.

I. Introductory.

In Quong Ham Wah Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1920) — Cal. —, 12 A.L.R. 1190, 192 Pac. 1021, in considering the constitutionality of the California Compensation Act, it was held that a state might extend the provisions of the act to residents working abroad under contracts entered into within the state.

(The question of constitutionality of provisions of workmen's compensation acts which are limited to residents of the state is covered in the annotation accompanying this case in 12 A.L.R. 1207.)

(1919) 169 Wis. 106, 170 N. W. 275, set out in the prior annotation, at page 1352, was denied without opinion in (1919) 169 Wis. 119, 171 N. W. 935.

In Stansberry v. Monitor Stove Co. (1921) — Minn. —, — A.L.R. —, 183 N. W. 977, it was held that an Ohio corporation, whose northwestern business was localized at a Minneapolis branch, was, as to employees of that branch, within the Minnesota Compensation Act, and a traveling salesman, employed in connection with that branch, was held to be within such act, although he was injured by an accident outside of the state.

In Pickering v. Industrial Commission (1921) — Utah, —, 201 Pac. 1029, a resident of Utah, who was hired in that state by a partnership whose place of business was also located there, was held entitled to compensation under the Utah Compensation Act, for an injury sustained in another state while superintending work there, where the act referred to provided that, if a workman who had been hired in that state should receive an injury by accident, he should be entitled to compensation according to the law of Utah, "even though injury was received outside of this state," and this conclusion was reached although the employer carried compensation insurance in the state where the injury occurred, as well as in Utah.

In State Industrial Commission v. Barene (1919) 107 Misc. 486, 177 N. Y. Supp. 689, it was held that the State Industrial Commission of New York had jurisdiction to make an award for an injury sustained by an employee in Connecticut, where he was hired in New York to perform work in Connecticut by a company which, at the time of the hiring, was not performing any work within New York that was considered hazardous by the Workmen's Compensation Laws.

In Baggs v. Standard Oil Co. (1920) 180 N. Y. Supp. 560, it was held that, although there may be liability under the Compensation Act where the employer and employee are both residents of New York, notwithstanding the fact that the accident occurs on the high seas, and although the act applies where the contract of employment is made in New York, notwithstanding it is to be performed outside that state, yet, where the injured employee is not a resident of New York, and is not hired in that state, and renders no services within such state, but is injured in another state, the New York Compensation Act does not apply.

And in Thompson v. Foundation Co. (1919) 188 App. Div. 506, 177 N. Y. Supp. 58, it was held that the claimant was entitled to compensation under the Pennsylvania Workmen's Compensation Act, and not under the New York act, where it appeared that the employer was a New York corporation, having its principal office in that state, and was engaged in construction work in both states, and that the claimant, while in New York, received a letter from a boss carpenter of the employer engaged in construction work in Pennsylvania, and that the claimant went to the latter state, and there entered into a written contract of employment with such boss, and began working, and that while so employed he received an injury, the court holding that the contract of employment was made in Pennsylvania, apparently assuming that, had it been made in New York, the Compensation Act of that state would have governed.

b. Acceptance of elective acts as constituting contract effective in other states.

The court, in Anderson v. Miller Scrap Iron Co. (1919) 169 Wis. 119, 171 N. W. 935, without opinion, denied a rehearing of (1919) 169 Wis. 106, 170 N. W. 275, set out in the prior annotation at page 1356.

It will be observed that in the reported case (CRANE v. LEONARD, CROSSETTE, & RILEY, ante, 285) it was held that under the provisions of the Michigan Workmen's Compensation Act, which were optional, the relation of master and servant is contractual as to parties who have accepted the provisions of the act, and that the right to compensation exists in cases of injury out of the state, as well as in those arising within its borders, and that it was immaterial that the statute restricted the right to compensation to such as was provided by the act, and provided that the hearing should be at the locality where the injury occurred.

See also Carl Hagenbeck & G. W. Show Co. v. Randall (1920) — Ind. App. —, 126 N. E. 501, and Barnhart v. American Concrete Steel Co. (1920) 227 N. Y. 531, 125 N. E. 675, infra, III.

c. Effect of miscellaneous provisions in statutes.

In Home Life & Acci. Co. v. Orchard (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 227 S. W. 705, where an insurer, in its policy issued to an employer operating in Texas and Louisiana and insuring the holder's Texas employees, contracted "to pay in the manner provided by the laws of such states or commonwealths of the United States as are in force at the time this policy takes effect, or any subsequent amendments thereto," and subsequently, before an injury occurred, the Texas Workmen's Compensation Act, which gave no extra-territorial effect to the policy, was amended by a clause providing that, if an employee who had been hired in that state sustained an injury in the course of his employment, he should be entitled to compensation according to the law of that state, even though the injury was received outside the state, it was held that this amendment came within the terms of the policy, and gave extraterritorial effect thereto as to one who was injured in Louisiana, but who was hired by the employer in Texas to act as foreman in the employer's oil fields, located in Louisiana and Texas, it appearing that his permanent home was retained in Texas, the court holding that he was a Texas employee and within the protection of the policy.

d. Doctrine that statutes do not have extraterritorial operation.

In Perlis v. Lederer (1919) 189 App. Div. 425, 178 N. Y. Supp. 449, where the claimant entered into a contract of employment in New York for services to be performed in Pennsylvania, and was injured in the latter state while performing the services contemplated by the contract, it was held that she was not entitled to compensation under the New York act. The court said: "The state industrial commission, on the supposed authority of Post v. Burger & Gohlke, 216 N. Y. 544, 111 N. E. 351, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 158, has made an award for such injuries. In that case the hazardous business was conducted in the state of New York, and the employee was injured while temporarily employed away from the plant of the employer in New Jersey; but it was not held that the mere fact that the contract was made in New York was the controlling factor. It was based upon the proposition that the hazardous employment carried on by the employer was within the state of New York, the employment within the state of New Jersey away from the plant of the employer being merely incidental. The recent case of Smith v. Heine Safety Boiler Co. (1918) 224 N. Y. 9, 119 N. E. 878, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 316, puts the matter clearly, and there is no doubt that a contract made within the state of New York for services to be performed wholly in a sister state is without the police power of the state of New York, and does not give a right to compensation under our Workmen's Compensation Law."

In Farr v. Babcock Lumber & Land Co. (1921) — N. C. —, 109 S. E. 833, where the contract of employment was made in Tennessee and the employee was injured while working in North Carolina, it was held that the Tennessee Compensation Act did not interfere with the jurisdiction of the superior court in the county in North Carolina where the injury occurred, to entertain actions for the employer's failure to keep a physician at the camp to attend the employee after he was injured, or for its employment of an incompetent physician, or for its negligent failure to provide the employee transportation to his home.

III. Conflict of laws.

In Carl Hagenbeck & G. W. Show Co. v. Randall (1920) — Ind. App. —, 126 N. E. 501, where an Indiana corporation gave no notice of election not to be bound by the Workmen's Compensation Act, and by the terms of the act was presumed to have accepted its provisions, it was held liable to pay compensation under the act for injuries to an employee in Indiana, the industrial board not lacking jurisdiction by reason of the contract of employment, which was entered into in Ohio, and which provided that the parties agreed that the place of the contract was the District of Columbia, and that the laws of that District should control, the court holding that the employer could not relieve itself of the statutory obligation by a foreign contract, its obligation under the Indiana Compensation Act being superimposed upon the Ohio contract as a condition of performance in Indiana. And the decision in the Hagenbeck Case was held decisive in Carl Hagenbeck & G. W. Show Co. v. Ball (1920) — Ind. App. —, 126 N. E. 504, upon a like state of facts.

The decision in Barnhart v. Ameri- can Concrete Steel Co. (1917) 181 App. Div. 881, 167 N. Y. Supp. 475, set out in the prior note, p. 1362, was affirmed in (1920) 227 N. Y. 531, 125 N. E. 675, the court holding that a judgment for personal injuries received in New York should be reversed, where the defendant was a New Jersey corporation, and the contract of hiring was entered into in the latter state, and the employee had exercised the option to accept the provisions of the Compensation Act. The court pointed out that there was a fundamental difference between the Workmen's Compensation Acts of New Jersey and New York, one being optional and the other mandatory, and said: "The New Jersey statute is different. Under that statute the rights which it creates and the duties which it imposes are contractual in the strict sense. It is optional with the employer, as well as the employee, whether or not the compensation, in case of injury or death, shall be paid. If a servant prefers to retain his common-law remedies he may give notice within a certain time after his employment, and the remedies will be retained. If he chooses to renounce them in return for the statutory scheme of compensation, his voluntary choice is the source and origin of his right. The plaintiff's intestate, having the right to accept or reject the statutory scheme of compensation, exercised the option to accept it, and contracted accordingly with the defendant. Such contract became binding upon him, and, like any other valid contract, enforceable in the state of New York, unless opposed to its public policy."

In Rorvik v. North Pacific Lumber Co. (1920) 99 Or. 58, 190 Pac. 331, 195 Pac. 163, where the employee of a California steamship company was killed while the vessel was being loaded at defendant's plant in Oregon, it was held that his widow did not divest herself of the right to bring an action under the Oregon Employers' Liability Law, by presenting a claim under the California Workmen's Compensation Act against her husband's employer, although such act provided that the commission should have jurisdiction over all controversies arising out of injuries suffered without the territorial limits of the state, where the injured employee was a resident of the state at the time of the injury, and the contract of hire was made within the state, and further provided that the making of a lawful claim against an employer for compensation under the act for an injury to or death of an employee should operate as an assignment to the employer of any right to recover damages which the injured employee, or his representatives, have against any other party for the injury or death, the court holding that a right of action for tort was not assignable in Oregon, and that it would be contrary to the policy of the laws of that state to give effect to the California act.

In Lennon v. Montreal Transp. Co. (1917) Rap. Jud. Quebec 53 C. S. 239, where the claimant was hired in Ontario as a deck hand on a steamship, and was injured in the port of Montreal, Quebec, in which place the employer had its head office, it was held that the Workmen's Compensation Act of Quebec applied, and not that of Ontario, it appearing that there had been no election to claim under the latter act, which provided that, where by the law of the place in which an accident happens the workman or his dependents are entitled to compensation, they shall be bound to elect whether they will claim compensation under this act, and to give notice of such election, and if such election is not made, and notice given, it shall be presumed that they have elected not to claim under this act.

In Smith v. Heine Safety Boiler Co. (1921) 119 Me. 552, 112 Atl. 516, the industrial accident commission of Maine was held to have jurisdiction to hear the claim of the widow of an employee who was accidentally killed while working in that state, although the employer was a foreign corporation, and the decedent was not a resident of Maine, and the contract of employment was made in a third state.

v.

EASTON TRANSIT COMPANY, Appt.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court — April 19, 1920.

Automobile — negligence of guest — effect on recovery.

1. When dangers which are either reasonably manifest, or known to an invited guest, confront the driver of a vehicle, and the guest has an adequate and proper opportunity to control or influence the situation for safety, if he sits by without warning or protest and permits himself to be driven carelessly to his injury, this is negligence which will bar recovery.

Trial — question for jury — negligence of automobile guest.

2. Unless the facts of a collision injuring a guest in an automobile are manifest, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom clear beyond peradventure, the jury must determine the question of the negligence of the guest.

Automobile — negligence of guest in taking a chance with driver.

3. The mere fact that a guest in an automobile, injured by collision with a street car at a highway crossing, states that she was willing to take a chance with the driver in going across the track without stopping or slowing up to see if a car was coming, does not, as matter of law, indicate that she joined with the driver in testing the danger, where he had the car under full control, indicated a sense of care and responsibility by sounding the horn, and the driver and guest were keeping a lookout for danger while an approaching car with passengers for that stop would make the stop before crossing the street.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Northampton County (McKeen, J.) denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding a verdict for plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Robert A. Stotz, for appellant:

The plaintiff can recover, if at all, only if she brings herself within the rule that, being a gratuitous passenger riding in the automobile by mere invitation, the negligence of the driver cannot be imputed to her, and that she herself was free of negligence.

Carlisle v. Brisbane, 113 Pa. 544, 57 Am. Rep. 483, 6 Atl. 372; Carr v. Easton, 142 Pa. 139, 21 Atl. 822; Walsh v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. 232 Pa. 479, 81 Atl. 551; Wachsmith v. If the danger is as open, obvious, and well-known to the passenger as it is to the driver, and the passenger, without protest, permits herself to be driven into such patent danger, and joins the driver in taking a chance and testing the danger, the plaintiff, although only a gratuitous passenger, cannot recover.

Moschzisker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On Sunday, April 9, 1916, a little before noon, at a point about three city blocks from the place where the collision giving rise to this case occurred, Jerome Garr invited plaintiff, Margaret B. Minnich, into an automobile, which he owned and was at the time driving upon the streets of Easton, Pennsylvania. She accepted and took the right-hand front seat as a gratuitous guest.

The motor proceeded south along Twelfth street toward Ferry street, which crosses the former highway at right angles. On Ferry street there is a single-track line of defendant's trolley road, on which suburban cars are operated in both directions, according to a regular hourly schedule; east-bound cars being due at Twelfth street, about five minutes before the hour, and west-bound five minutes after the hour. Ferry street is 69 feet 2 inches wide between house lines, and the first rail of the trolley tracks is 27 feet 4 inches from the north house line. Both Garr and plaintiff were well acquainted with the general character of the crossing, the location of the track, and the trolley time schedule.

The automobile was running at a speed of 10 to 12 miles an hour, on the right of the middle of the street, 6 feet from the west curb line. The speed was not appreciably checked as the cross thoroughfare was approached, and, due to the construction of the buildings on both highways, no extended view could be had along Ferry street in either direction, before the house line was reached. The driver, however, gave warning by frequently sounding a "good, loud" electric horn; and at the first available place looked east, then west.

Thirty-seven feet north of the Ferry street house line at a point 6 feet from the west curb of Twelfth street, it is possible for one to see 88½ feet to the west along Ferry street, owing to the first story of the corner building being cut at an angle, and, at the house line, a view of two or three blocks can be had in that direction.

Defendant's car, approaching from the west, was nearing Twelfth street at twenty-five miles an hour, but, in all probability because of the rate of speed, neither the driver of the machine nor the motorman of the car saw the other in time to avoid a collision; the latter gave no warning whatever, and the former either could not or did not so control his machine as to bring it to a stop before reaching the track. In an effort to prevent a collision, Garr swung sharply to the left, and the motorman applied the air brake; but the two vehicles crashed together, the "left front point" of the car striking the automobile a glancing blow.

As they were drawing near the intersection of the streets, Miss Minnich, who was then "looking west for the car," saw it at the first possible moment—when, seated in the automobile, she was about 30 feet, and the car at least 70 feet, from the place of collision. Plaintiff at once made an outcry, exclaiming, "Oh, the car!" and that is all she did to avoid the accident.

The automobile was not seriously damaged, but Garr's passenger suffered personal injuries. She brought suit against defendant, and the case was submitted to the jury in a manner which is not complained of. Plaintiff obtained a verdict, upon which judgment was entered, a motion for judgment n. o. v. was denied, and this appeal followed.

When dangers, which are either reasonably manifest or known to an invited guest, confront the driver of a vehicle, and the guest has an adequate and proper opportunity to control or influence the situation for safety, if he sits by without warning or protest and permits himself to be driven carelessly to his injury, this is negligence which will bar recovery. Although a guest is not required to exercise the same degree of care and watchfulness as the driver, and the carelessness of the latter is not imputed to the former, yet a passenger must bear the consequences of his own negligence, when he joins in testing a danger; but the extent to which one in the position of a guest should appreciate an impending peril, and act in relation thereto, depends upon the facts peculiar to each case; unless these are manifest and the inferences to be drawn therefrom

clear beyond peradventure, the issues involved must be submitted to the jury for determination. Moreover, the authorities recognize the fact that, in measuring the adequacy of the opportunity for control, there are occasions when any pronounced effort in that direction might do more harm than good.

Cases on the governing principles just stated are cited in Hardie v. Barrett, 257 Pa. 42, 46, 47, L.R.A. 1917F, 444, 101 Atl. 75, 16 N. C. C. A. 485, but, since the writer of that opinion occupies the same position here, he takes the opportunity to say that, while the rule there laid down is appropriately put for purposes of the case then under consideration, it is somewhat too narrow and limited for a guiding statement of general principles. We refer to the following additional authorities: Proctor v. Lehigh Valley Transit Co. 235 Pa. 373, 83 Atl. 1019; Sission v. Philadelphia, 248 Pa. 140, 93 Atl. 936; McLaughlin v. Pittsburgh R. Co. 252 Pa. 32, 97 Atl. 107; Lancaster v. Reese, 260 Pa. 390, 103 Atl. 891; Laudenberger v. Easton Transit Co. 261 Pa. 288, 104 Atl. 588; Azinger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 262 Pa. 242, 105 Atl. 87; Martin v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 265 Pa. 282, 108 Atl. 631.

While not so deciding, we shall, for present purposes, assume Garr's contributory negligence; but it by no means follows plaintiff can be held, as a matter of law, to have joined therein, or that she in any way contributed toward the accident which caused her injuries. On the evidence, the court below very properly submitted these issues to the jury, and they were found against defendant; but appellant contends that plaintiff confessed she willingly joined the driver of the automobile in testing a known danger, which, in itself, should put her out of court. Let us see how far this is true.

On cross-examination, Miss Minnich testified she knew a trolley car was "about due at that time." Defendant's attorney then said, "But you were willing to take a chance with him in going across there without stopping or slowing up to see if there was a car coming," adding the query, "Weren't you?" to which she answered, "Yes, sir." This incident in the examination was called to the attention of the jurors by the trial judge, who told them to consider it. In so doing, however, they, no doubt, very properly took into consideration the fact that the words of plaintiff's so-called confession of fault were really those of her cross-examiner, and that Garr, who was driving at a moderate speed, not only had his machine under apparent control, but was indicating a sense of care and responsibility by sounding his horn, while Miss Minnich was also keeping a lookout for danger. Furthermore, the jurors had a right to regard the fact that the intersection in question is not peculiarly disadvantageous, so far as opportunities for view are concerned, nor, like a railroad crossing, inherently perilous. Plaintiff was not obliged to anticipate she was taking a chance on a trolley car advancing upon her without warning, at the negligent rate of 25 miles an hour (Simon v. Lit Bros. 264 Pa. 121, 107 Atl. 635), particularly when the near side of the street was a designated and usual stopping place; and we cannot say, as a matter of law, she meant to suggest a willingness so to do —that was for the jury to decide. When all the elements present are given due weight, it is in no way apparent that plaintiff, in any real sense, joined the driver in testing a danger, or that, on cross-examination, she expressed a willingness to take any other or greater chance than every automobile passenger must take when traveling upon built-up city streets, in approaching a trolley line.

The assignments of error complain only because defendant was not given binding instructions in its favor, or granted judgment n. o. v. They are overruled, and the judgment for plaintiff is affirmed.

NOTE.

The subject of personal care required of one riding in an automobile driven by another, as affecting his right to recover against a third person, is the subject of an extended annotation following BEUBAKER v. IOWA COUNTY, post, 309. Specifically, as to injury by street car, see subd. III. of that note.

KANSAS CITY, KAW VALLEY, & WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

Kansas Supreme Court—January 10, 1920.

Negligence — of guest in automobile — failure to look at railroad crossing.

A mature person, who attempts to cross an interurban railroad track without taking any precautions for his own safety, while riding in an automobile with another, who is driving, cannot recover damages for injuries sustained in a collision with a car on the track, when by looking he could have seen the approaching car in time to have warned the driver of the danger.

Headnote by MARSHALL, J.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Wyandotte County (Fisher, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. E. McFadden and O. Q. Claffin, Jr., for appellant.

Messrs. J. O. Emerson and D. J. Smith, for appellee:

Whether Hart was negligent is immaterial. He was the driver of the car, and the plaintiff a mere guest, and the negligence of the driver of a vehicle is not imputable to his guest, who does not have or exercise any control over the driver.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant appeals from a judgment against it for injuries sustained by the plaintiff in an accident at a crossing of a public highway and the defendant's railroad. The evidence showed that the defendant operated an interurban railroad from Kansas City to Lawrence through a station known as Grinter Heights, where a public road crossed the railroad almost at right angles; that a macadam road ran along the south side of the railroad; that A. H. Hart with an automobile was standing east of the road which crossed the railroad on the north side of the macadam road, but south of the railroad track; that the plaintiff went to Hart and, after a little conversation, got into the automobile with Hart and started to ride with him to Hart's house; that in doing so it was necessary to cross the railroad track; that Hart drove the automobile; that they started across the track without looking for an approaching car; that, after they got on the track, they saw a car coming from the west, about 100 feet away; that the plaintiff jumped out of the automobile and was injured; that Hart remained in the automobile and went across the track and was not injured; and that the automobile was not struck. There was evidence which tended to show that the automobile stopped about 4 feet south of the track, then started across, and stopped again on the track, and then went across, and that the automobile jumped in crossing the track. The evidence also tended to show that there was a grade in the road from the south up to the track, and that the plank on the side of the track was about 4 inches thick and about 4 inches above the ground. The plaintiff at that time was twenty-six or twenty-seven years old.

The jury made special findings of fact as follows:

"(1) When plaintiff got into the automobile with Mr. Hart, was it with intention to ride to Mr. Hart's home for the purpose of visiting with him during a part of the day?

"A. Yes.

"(2) Was the plaintiff familiar with the location of defendant's tracks at the time and place in question when he got into the automobile to go to Hart's home?

"A. Yes.

"(3) Did plaintiff know that in going to Mr. Hart's home in the automobile they would have to cross the track of the defendant?

"A. Yes.

"(4) Did plaintiff know that cars, both passenger and express, were operated on and along the tracks of defendant at different intervals during the day, and over the crossing in question?

"A. Yes.

"(5) From the time the automobile in which plaintiff was riding started until it reached a point where the front wheels were upon defendant's track, did he look to see if there was a car approaching the crossing from the west?"

"A. No.

"(6) If plaintiff or the driver of the automobile had looked toward the west at any time after the automobile was started and before it reached the railroad track, could they, or either of them, have seen the approaching car in time to have stopped before going upon the track?"

"A. Yes.

"(7) When the automobile got upon defendant's track, what distance was the approaching car from the crossing?"

"A. On or about 100 feet.

"(8) Did Mr. Hart tell the plaintiff to remain in the automobile when he saw that plaintiff was preparing to get out?"

"A. Yes.

"(9) If the plaintiff had remained in his seat in the automobile, would he have been injured?"

"A. No.

"(10) Was plaintiff struck by defendant's car at the time in question?"

"A. Yes.

"(11) If you answer question No. 10, 'Yes,' then state on what witness's testimony you base such answer.

"A. Mr. Kirby, H. C.

"(12) After the motorman saw the automobile start to cross the track in front of his car from the place where he testified it had stopped immediately south of the track, did he do all he could properly do to stop his car before reaching the crossing?"

"A. Yes."

"(14) Did the automobile in which plaintiff was riding pass over the railroad track without being struck by the car?"

"A. Yes."

For the purpose of discussion, it is assumed that the defendant was negligent in some one or more of the particulars alleged.' The defendant argues that the court erred in overruling its demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, in refusing to give defendant's peremptory instruction for a verdict in favor of the defendant, in overruling the motion of the defendant for judgment on the special findings and to set aside the general verdict, in entering a judgment for the plaintiff, and argues that the judgment is contrary to law and without evidence to support it. The decision turns on the contributory negligence of the plaintiff.

Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence? He and the driver of the automobile started across the railroad track without looking to see if a car were approaching. The driver of the automobile was clearly guilty of negligence. If he had sustained any injury, he could not recover therefor. *Jacobs v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. In Corley v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 90 Kan. 70, 133 Pac. 555, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 764, this court said: "One who, while riding in an automobile as the guest of the driver, is injured by a collision at a railroad crossing, caused by the negligence of the company, is not precluded from recovering damages therefor by the fact that the failure of the driver to exercise due caution was a contributing cause of the injury." In Schaeffer v. Arkansas Valley Interurban R. Co. 104 Kan. 394, 179 Pac. 323, the court used the following language:

"Persons in complete and independent control of their own movements, who are about to cross a railway track, like pedestrians and drivers of horse vehicles and automobiles, will not be permitted to recover against a negligent railway company unless they themselves are free from negligence.

While such persons are charged with the duty of looking out for their own safety as far as practicable (Bush v. Union P. R. Co. 62 Kan. 709, 64 Pac. 624; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Bussey, 66 Kan. 735, 71 Pac. 261; Bressler v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 74 Kan. 256, 86 Pac. 472; Fair v. Union Traction Co. 102 Kan. 611, 171 Pac. 649; and note in L.R.A. 1915B, 955 et seq.), yet they are not necessarily negligent merely because their driver is negligent (Williams v. Withington, 88 Kan. 809, 129 Pac. 1148; Denton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 90 Kan. 51, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 820, 133 Pac. 558, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 639; Denton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 97 Kan. 498, 155 Pac. 812; Corley v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 90 Kan. 70, 133 Pac. 555, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 764; Burzio v. Joplin & P. R. Co. 102 Kan. 287, L.R.A.1918C, 997, 171 Pac. 351)." 104 Kan. 398.

The following language is found in Bush v. Union P. R. Co. supra: "Where one person is riding with another for the mutual pleasure of both, with equal opportunity to see and ability to appreciate the danger, and is in fact looking out for herself, but makes no effort to avoid the danger, she is chargeable with the want of care which results in injury." Syl. ¶ 3.

The plaintiff was under some obligation to look out for his own safety. He should not have attempted to cross the railroad track, relying completely upon the driver of the automobile to take the necessary steps for their safety. The plaintiff ought to have looked for the approaching car, and, if he had seen one, he should have notified the driver. That much he ought to have done for his own protection. When he saw the defendant's car approaching, he did undertake to protect himself by jumping out of the automobile, doing that contrary to the request of the driver that he remain. Probably that appeared to the plaintiff as the safest thing to do. That was not contributory negligence on his part; but, because of his failure to look for a car before going upon the railroad track, he was guilty of such negligence. That prevents his recovery.

The judgment is reversed, and judgment is rendered for the defendant.

NOTE.

The personal care required of one riding in an automobile driven by another and affecting his right to recover against a third person is the subject of the annotation following *BRUBAKER v. LINDA LEE BRUBAKER, Resp.,
v.
IOWA COUNTY, Appt.

Wisconsin Supreme Court — July 13, 1921.

Automobile — negligence of passenger — failure to control movement of car.

1. A passenger on the back seat of an automobile cannot be charged with negligence in failing to see signals along the road, warning of danger, when there is no evidence that any existed which would warn an ordinarily prudent traveler, or in failing to control the speed of the car when there is nothing to show that he could have formed any intelligent estimate of the rate of speed.

Negligence — imputed — husband's to wife — joint enterprise.

2. The mere fact that a man and his wife are journeying together in a motor car from one city to another for the purpose of changing their abode, with the intention on his part to teach and on her part to prepare for and take a business position, does not constitute their journey a joint enterprise so as to impute to her his negligence in handling the car.

3. The negligence of a man is not imputed to his wife, riding with him in an automobile, from the mere fact of the marital relationship between them.

Automobile — duty to watch for imperfections.

4. A passenger on the back seat of an automobile traveling over a road in apparently good condition is not bound to pay constant attention to the management of the car, or to keep constant lookout for imperfections in the road.

Highway — liability of county for defect — statutory duty.

5. A county attempting to repair a defect in a trunk highway is liable for injury to a traveler caused by insufficiency and want of repair within the meaning of the statute.

— when closed to travel.

6. A highway under repair cannot be regarded as closed to travel if there are no barriers and the public is using it to the knowledge of the public officials.

Appeal — instruction — immaterial error.

7. In an action by a passenger in an automobile for injury due to a defect in the highway, where there is nothing to show that she knew or had any reason to know that the car was being driven at excessive speed, it is not reversible error to instruct that a stranger driving upon a public highway has a right to presume that it is in reasonably safe condition for ordinary travel, even though the instruction is incorrect.

— reversal to permit defendant to secure contribution.

8. A judgment in favor of a wife against a county, for injury caused by a defect in the highway and negligence of her husband in driving the automobile in which she was riding, will not be reversed to permit the county to implead the husband so as to secure contribution from him, but the county will be left to its independent action against him.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Iowa County (Bancroft, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the insufficiency of a certain highway in the defendant county. Affirmed.

Statement by Jones, J.:

On August 25, 1919, plaintiff, her husband, and her sister were proceeding from Oshkosh, Wisconsin, to Sioux City, Iowa, where plaintiff and her husband intended to reside. They were traveling in the husband's automobile. He was driving, and plaintiff and her sister sat in the rear seat. The car was relatively heavy, had good brakes, and good lights. They were traveling, at least in the main, on the state trunk highway between Madison and Dodgeville. As they approached the latter city, it was between twilight and dark, and the lights on the car were lighted. The driver testified that he was keeping good watch of the road ahead and was going not over 20 miles per hour. Plaintiff was paying no attention to the driving, but both she and her sister testified that they were going slowly. There was no other direct testimony on the question of speed. It was undisputed that the road at this point was commonly traveled, and was in good shape for travel, up to the place of the accident.

While thus proceeding the driver suddenly noticed a sharp incline over a culvert which crossed the road. He stated that he noticed this condition only when very close, about two or three car lengths, probably 40 or 50 feet, from the place. Plaintiff testified she first noticed it when it was right in front of the car. The driver attempted to stop the car, but was unable to do so until he had passed over the culvert and some 45 feet beyond, all distances, presumably, being measured from the front of the car. In passing over the incline plaintiff was thrown out of the car upon the ground and received the injuries complained of. The highway was being relocated in places, and repairs and construction were being made on parts of the old road. The diagram used at the trial does not appear in the record, and it is difficult for this court to exactly locate all the roads and points mentioned in the testimony, and to determine which are new and which are old.

There was much testimony to the effect that the road was closed to travel and that signs were posted to that effect. The testimony regarding these signs was confusing. It appeared they were sometimes in place and sometimes out of place, that at least one was in place the night of the accident, and that there were none near the culvert itself. Some things appeared clearly: There was no sign or barrier across or upon the traveled track, no lights were placed, none of the signs were of very large size or great prominence, and it was well known to authorities, and expected, that persons would continue to use the road despite the signs. None of the occupants of the car saw any signs. The road beyond the signs and up to the culvert was in good repair and without evidences of incomplete construction.

There was a traveled turnout at the culvert, by which cars could pass around instead of over it, and it seemed that this was customarily used by persons acquainted with the situation. The occupants of the car did not notice it, however. The culvert was covered with a layer of dirt, and it formed an elevation of 18 or 20 inches in a slope of 6 feet; the slope being steeper on the side from which the car approached than it was on the side beyond. Several travelers on the highway came along shortly after the accident. One of these testified that there was just enough dirt over the culvert so that a person who did not know the situation would drive on it; that there was a track over it, presumably the track of plaintiff's car, but no indicated travel over the top. Another of these testified that a stranger who did not know the road would drive over the culvert, and not look to the side of the road, for there had been several cars passing over it. There was no testimony as to the space required to stop plaintiff's car from a speed of 20 miles per hour or less.

The jury found that the highway at this place was not in a reasonably safe condition for public travel by persons in the exercise of due care, and that this condition was the proximate cause of the accident. They found that there were no signs or barriers, such as would attract the attention of an ordinarily prudent traveler, to notify him that the highway was not open to travel; that there was want of care on the part of the driver, which proximately contributed to the injury; and fixed damages at $1,200. The trial court changed the finding of negligence on the part of the driver, and ordered judgment for the plaintiff.

Jones, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is earnestly argued by appellant's counsel that the court erred in changing the answer of the jury in which they found that the driver of the car was guilty of contributory negligence. There is undoubtedly some force in the claim that he should have sooner seen the elevation in the road, and that he should have sooner stopped the car. But, in view of the rule which now obtains in this state it becomes unnecessary to decide whether the ruling of the court complained of was erroneous. Under the rule which long prevailed in Wisconsin, as declared in Prideaux v. Mineral Point, 43

Wis. 513, 28 Am. Rep. 558, one voluntarily in a private conveyance voluntarily trusts his personal safety in the conveyance to the person in control of it. Voluntary entrance into a private conveyance adopts the conveyance for the time being as one's own, and assumes the risk of the skill and care of the person guiding it. As pointed out by Mr. Justice Vinje in a recent case, this rule of imputed negligence has never received extended judicial approval, and has been adhered to in only a few states. Since it was not a rule of property, this court felt at liberty to change it in the interests of justice, and to conform to the overwhelming majority rule. The opinion closed with this language: "Only so much of the Prideaux Case is overruled as imputes the negligence of the driver to an occupant in a private conveyance, who has no control over the driver, is not engaged in a joint undertaking with him, is guilty of no negligence himself, and stands in no other relation to him requiring his negligence to be imputed to the occupant." Reiter v. Grober, 173 Wis. 493, post, 362, 181 N. W. 739.

Thus we are squarely confronted with the question whether the facts of this case are such that negligence of the driver would have defeated a recovery by the plaintiff. Appellant's counsel argue that plaintiff and her husband were engaged in a joint undertaking. The argument is based on the fact that they were moving their home from Oshkosh to Sioux City. The husband intended to teach, and the plaintiff to attend college to improve her stenography, and obtain a position. There is no evidence that the journey was undertaken merely at the request of the wife, or of any fact showing that the husband was acting as her agent, or that they were jointly operating or controlling the movements of the car at the time of the accident. Nor is there any proof that they were engaged in any joint financial undertaking. As fellow travelers they were going from Oshkosh to Sioux City to pursue their several avocations. In one sense, husbands and wives in their journey through life are always engaged in joint enterprises, sometimes successful, sometimes disastrous. But the mere fact that they terprise.

travel in the same car, whether for pleasure or to change their abode, does not constitute a joint enterprise within the meaning of the rule under discussion.

Doubtless there may be such special facts showing agency, or such joint financial interest in the undertaking, as to make the negligence of the husband imputable to the wife and to defeat a recovery on her part. But no such facts are found in this case, and there is certainly no presumption that any such relation existed. It was merely the ordinary social and domestic relationship involved when husband and wife are traveling together. There are numerous cases which hold that when a wife is traveling with her husband, when they are not engaged in any joint enterprise, and when she has no direction or control over his movements, she is marital relationship.

In other words, from the mere marital relationship the contributory negligence of the husband is not to be imputed to the wife. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Creek, 130 Ind. 139, 14 L.R.A. 733, 29 N. E. 481; Louisville R. Co. v. McCarthy, 129 Ky. 814, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 230, 130 Am. St. Rep. 494, 112 S. W. 925; Finley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 71 Minn. 471, 74 N. W. 174; Bailey v. Centerville, 115 Iowa, 271, 88 N. W. 379; Reading Twp. v. Telfer, 57 Kan. 798, 57 Am. St. Rep. 355, 48 Pac. 134, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 138; Dudley v. Peoria R. Co. 153 Ill. App. 624; Kokesh v. Price, 136 Minn. 304, 161 N. W. 715, 16 N. C. C. A. 1050.

It is argued by appellant's counsel that the court erred in refusing to submit to the jury the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff herself. Doubtless the plaintiff was bound to use such care as a reasonably prudent person would exercise under similar circumstances. It cannot be successfully claimed that plaintiff should have seen signals warning him of danger, since the jury found on sufficient evidence that there were none which would warn an ordinarily prudent traveler. It is claimed that the rate of speed was excessive, and that plaintiff should have known it and remonstrated. There was no direct evidence that they were going faster than 20 miles per hour, but it is argued that the physical facts show a much greater speed. In this argument there is the weakness that no testimony was offered to show within what distance such a car, going at the rate of 20 miles per hour, could have been stopped. Even if plaintiff had been intent upon the subject, it is doubtful whether, under the conditions she could have formed any intelligent estimate of the rate of speed. There is no evidence that she had any reason to doubt the care or skill of the driver of the car.

Automobile—negligence of passenger—failure to control movement of car.

There is no evidence that she had any reason to doubt the care or skill of the driver of the car.

It is true that she was not paying attention at the time to the operation of the car. But we do not understand that a wife, sitting in the rear seat, when her husband is driving a car over a road apparently in good condition, is bound to pay constant attention to the management of the car, or to —duty to watch

tions.

keep a constant lookout for imperfections in the road. Much advice and many suggestions to the driver by one sitting in the rear seat are not conducive to the best management of the car. If the occupant sees the driver is driving at a dangerous rate of speed, or in violation of the law, reasonable care would require that the passenger protest.

This was illustrated in the recent case of Howe v. Corey, 172 Wis. 537, 179 N. W. 791, cited by appellant, where the plaintiff, a guest, testified that they were going at least 50 miles per hour in a city; he was sitting on the front seat, keeping no watch, and merely remarked that they were going pretty fast. They ran into a railroad train standing on a crossing, and it was held that plaintiff could not recover. Other cases might be cited where the passenger knew, or ought to have known, of the danger, and, failing to remonstrate, was denied recovery; but they do not seem to us controlling under the facts of the present case. The trial judge, after hearing the testimony and seeing the witnesses, held that there was no credible evidence to be submitted to the jury on this question, and we agree.

Appellant's counsel urge that the highway, at the point where the accident occurred, was not part of the trunk system of highways for the maintenance and repair of which the county was responsible. The complaint alleged that the highway in question was part of the trunk highway system. The answer set up that the highway had never been adopted by the county, nor had it become a part of the county highway system, but expressly alleged that the place where the accident occurred was and is on the state trunk highway, and set up that at the time of the accident it was closed, owing to repairs being made thereon. That the scene of the accident was a point on a part of the trunk highway system going through the county seems established by the admission in the answer, as well as by the testimony of one of the county officers. The testimony was undisputed that the culvert and grading at this point were ordered by the county authorities as part of the permanent construction of the trunk highway, and that the work was performed under the supervision of the state authorities. Since the work of grading the culvert was done by the defendant, and since it was left in an unsafe condition, as found by the jury, we are convinced that defendant had notice of the defect, and that there was insufficiency and want of repair within the meaning of § 1317, subsec. 5, for which defendant was liable.

liability of defect—statutory duty.

We do not think that there is merit in the claim that the road was closed for travel. As appears from the statement of facts, there were no barriers, and the road at this point was being used by the public, as defendant's officers knew. The finding of the jury as to want of proper signals was sustained by the evidence. If defendant intended to close the road for travel, more effective means should have been taken.

—when closed to travel.

Appellant claims error in giving the following instruction: "In that connection I further instruct you that a stranger, driving upon a public highway, has a right to presume that such highway is in reasonably safe condition for the ordinary travel passing along and over the same."

Since we have held that the negligence of the husband, if any, was not imputable to plaintiff, and that the court properly refused to submit the question of plaintiff's negligence to the jury, it seems unnecessary to discuss the merits of this contention. Of course, the existence or nonexistence of this presumption would have a bearing on the question of how great a speed might be attained, without raising a duty on the part of the passenger to remonstrate. But the evidence does not show that the plaintiff knew, or had reason to know, of such a speed, even if it be assumed that the instruction was incorrect.

instruction—immaterial error.

It is suggested by appellant's counsel that, if the court should be of the opinion that the negligence of the driver cannot be imputed to the plaintiff, a new trial should be granted, in order that the defendant might have the privilege of interpleading the plaintiff's husband as a defendant in this case, in order that appellant might have contribution. If so advised, the county may, of course, bring its independent action against the driver of the car, on the ground that his alleged negligence jointly contributed to the plaintiff's injuries. But in our judgment the interests of justice would not be served by requiring the plaintiff to await the delay which would be caused by the proceeding suggested by appellant.

—reversal to permit defendant to secure contribution.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Personal care required of one riding in automobile driven by another as affecting his right to recover against third person.

II. At railroad crossings:

a. Steam railroads, 315.

b. Interurban railroad, 334.

I. In general.

The related question as to the liability of a guest for injury to a third person, due primarily to the negligence of the driver, is treated in the annotation following Relter v. Grober, post, 365.

It will be observed that the question under annotation is distinct from the question whether the negligence of the driver is imputable to one riding with him. The question also presupposes that there is no other relationship between the driver and the person injured, which would charge the latter with the former's negligence.

A person riding in an automobile driven by another, even though not chargeable with the driver's negligence, is not absolved from all personal care for his own safety, but is under the duty of exercising reasonable or ordinary care to avoid injury, i. e., such care as an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under like circumstances.

The law fixes no different standard of duty for a passenger in an automobile than for the driver. Each is bound to use reasonable care. What conduct on the passenger's part is necessary to comply with this duty must depend upon all the circumstances, one of which—and unquestionably an important one—is that he is merely a passenger, having no control over the management of the automobile in which he is riding. Clarke v. Connecticut Co. (1910) 83 Conn. 219, 76 Atl. 523.

The failure of a passenger in an automobile to use due care will not prevent a recovery by him against a third party, unless such failure contributed to the injury. Carter v. Brown (1918) 136 Ark. 23, 206 S. W. 71; Pine Bluff Co. v. Whitlaw (1921) 147 Ark. 152, 227 S. W. 13; Clarke v. Connecticut Co. (Conn.) supra; Griffin v. Hustis (1919) 234 Mass. 95, 125 N. E. 387; Labrecque v. Donham (1920) 236 Mass. 10, 127 N. E. 537; Kalland v. Brainard (1918) 141 Minn. 119, 169 N. W. 475; Davis v. City Light & Traction Co. (1920) 204 Mo. App. 174, 222 S. W. 884.

And the same is true as to passengers in other vehicles. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Biddinger (1915) 61 Ind. App. 419, 109 N. E. 953.

The question of the contributory negligence of one injured while riding in an automobile driven by another is usually for the jury. Carpenter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1921) — Cal. App. —, 195 Pac. 1073; Clarke v. Connecticut Co. (Conn.) supra; Bradley v. Interurban R. Co. (1921) — Iowa, —, 183 N. W. 493; Waring v. Dubuque Electric Co. (1922) — Iowa, —, 186 N. W. 42; Schaefer v. Arkansas Valley Interurban R. Co. (1919) 104 Kan. 394, 179 Pac. 323, rehearing denied in (1919) 104 Kan. 740, 181 Pac. 118; Washington, B. & A. R. Co. v. State (1920) 136 Md. 103, 111 Atl. 164; McDonald v. Mesaba R. Co. (1917) 137 Minn. 275, 163 N. W. 298; White v. Portland Gas & Coke Co. (1917) 84 Or. 643, 165 Pac. 1005; Coughlin v. Rhode Island Co. (1921) —

R. I. —, 115 Atl. 323; Sadler v. Northern P. R. Co. (1922) — Wash. —, 208 Pac. 10.

And the same may be said as to passengers in other vehicles. Fujise v. Los Angeles R. Co. (1919) 12 Cal. App. 207, 107 Pac. 317; Denver City Tramway Co. v. Armstrong (1912) 21 Colo. App. 640, 123 Pac. 136; Odett v. Chicago City R. Co. (1911) 166 Ill. App. 270.

And, as well put in Washington, B. & A. R. Co. v. State (1920) 136 Md. 103, 111 Atl. 164, while there are cases in which the guests or occupants of vehicles have been held guilty of such contributory negligence as to preclude recovery as matter of law, it will be found, by examination of the numerous cases on the subject, that generally the question must be submitted to the jury.

Unless the evidence is all one way, the question whether a passenger in an automobile exercised ordinary care for his own safety is a question of fact, and must be submitted to the jury. Drouillard v. Southern P. Co. (1918) 36 Cal. App. 447, 172 Pac. 405.

And it was held in Ilardi v. Central California Traction Co. (1918) 36 Cal. App. 488, 172 Pac. 763, an action for injury to one riding in a wagon, that, unless the evidence showed beyond question that such passenger or guest failed to exercise such care as was necessary for his own safety, the question whether he was remiss in that respect, or was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury, was primarily for the jury.

It was held in Carpenter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1921) — Cal. App. —, 195 Pac. 1073, that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that a passenger in an automobile did everything that a reasonably prudent man would have done under the same circumstances for the protection of his own safety. This holding is based upon provisions of the California Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that the presumption that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns may be controverted, but, unless controverted,

And, in an action for injury to a passenger in a buggy, it was held in Cotton v. Willmar & S. F. R. Co. (1906) 99 Minn. 366, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643, 116 Am. St. Rep. 422, 109 N. W. 835, 9 Ann. Cas. 935, that the primary duty of caring for the safety of the vehicle and passengers rests upon the driver, and unless the danger is obvious, or is known to the passenger, the latter may rely upon the assumption that the driver will exercise proper care and caution in approaching a place of danger. But if the passenger knows that the driver is incompetent and careless, or sees that the driver is not aware of the danger and is not taking proper precautions, it is his duty to notify him of the danger, and a failure to do so is negligence.

To aid in determining whether one injured while riding as a passenger in an automobile was guilty of contributory negligence, the courts of Pennsylvania have laid down in striking form a rule—probably, in principle, in force in other states—to the effect that, if a passenger voluntarily joins the driver in testing a known or manifest danger, the former is chargeable with such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery. Wachsmith v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1912) 233 Pa. 465, 82 Atl. 755, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 679; Senft v. Western Maryland R. Co. (1914) 246 Pa. 446, 92 Atl. 553; Carbaugh v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1918) 262 Pa. 25, 104 Atl. 860; McLaughlin v. Pittsburgh R. Co. (1916) 252 Pa. 32, 97 Atl. 107; Hardie v. Barrett (1917) 257 Pa. 42, L.R.A. 1917F, 444, 101 Atl. 75, 16 N. C. C. A. 485; Azinger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1918) 262 Pa. 242, 105 Atl. 87; MINNICH v. EASTON TRANSIT Co. (reported herewith) ante, 296; Farquhar v. Webster, M. B. & F. C. S. R. Co. (1912) 50 Pa. Super. Ct. 536.

The same rule was laid down by the same courts, and by the supreme court of Colorado, in reference to persons riding in other vehicles. Colorado & S. R. Co. v. Thomas (1905) 33 Colo. 517, 70 L.R.A. 681, 81 Pac.

801, 3 Ann. Cas. 700, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 316; Walsh v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (1911) 232 Pa. 479, 81 Atl. 551; Trumbower v. Lehigh Valley Transit Co. (1912) 235 Pa. 397, 84 Atl. 403; Kirschbaum v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. (1920) 73 Pa. Super. Ct. 536.

And, in an action for injury to one while riding in a buggy, it was held in Atwood v. Utah Light & R. Co. (1914) 44 Utah, 366, 140 Pac. 137, that a passenger in a vehicle, in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence to avoid injury to himself, must, in case of imminent danger, leave the vehicle in case such a course is practicable and necessary to avoid injury, and may not sit silently by and permit the driver of the vehicle to encounter or enter into open danger without protest or remonstrance, and take the chances, and, if injured, seek to recover damages.

It is no less the duty of one riding in an automobile, where he has the opportunity to do so, than of the driver, to use reasonable care to learn of and avoid danger. Opp v. Pryor (1920) 294 Ill. 538, 128 N. E. 580; Barrett v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1920) — Iowa, —, 175 N. W. 950, rehearing denied in (1920) — Iowa, —, 180 N. W. 670.

And the same has been held in reference to persons riding in other vehicles. Farley v. Wilmington & N. C. Electric R. Co. (1902) 3 Penn. (Del.) 581, 52 Atl. 543; Campbell v. Walker (1910) 2 Boyce (Del.) 41, 78 Atl. 601; Pienta v. Chicago City R. Co. (1918) 284 Ill. 246, 120 N. E. 1; Storm v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (1910) 156 Ill. App. 88; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Boyts (1897) 16 Ind. App. 640, 45 N. E. 812; Vincennes v. Thuis (1902) 28 Ind. App. 523, 63 N. E. 315; Smith v. Maine C. R. Co. (1895) 87 Me. 339, 32 Atl. 967; Whitman v. Fisher (1904) 98 Me. 575, 57 Atl. 895; Meenagh v. Buckmaster (1898) 26 App. Div. 451, 50 N. Y. Supp. 85.

In Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Barranco (1920) 203 Ala. 639, 84 So. 839, the principle governing the duty of a passenger in an automobile is stated as follows: "There rests upon even a mere guest, normal with respect to the senses, in a vehicle over whose operation or its operator (not shown to be incompetent for any reason) such guest has no right of control, and toward whom the guest bears no relation of agency, the duty to observe ordinary care—the care an ordinarily prudent person, in like circumstances, would observe—in respect to dangers or perils known to such guest, or suggested by attendant circumstances that would have advised a reasonably prudent person likewise situated that danger or peril was imminent or impending; but there is no duty on such guest to anticipate that the independent driver of the vehicle in which such guest is riding will enter the sphere of danger or peril ahead, or will omit to exercise commensurate care to sense the approach, or the probable approach, of other agencies of transportation with reference to which the ordinarily prudent driver should, in due observance of his duty, govern the movement of the vehicle he controls. Where, however, such guest knows of the danger or peril into or toward which the vehicle is being driven, or the circumstances of realized speed of the vehicle, and known location, and its surroundings ahead are such as to suggest, to a reasonably prudent person likewise situated, the probability that a sphere of danger or peril may be created thereby, or may be entered in course of the vehicle's movement, it is the duty of such guest to warn the driver in the premises, and to protest a continuance of a movement so actually or probably fraught with danger or peril to such occupant of the vehicle. In other words, the duty imposed upon such person, whatever his seat in the vehicle, is created by either known dangers or perils that the attendant circumstances reasonably suggest or foreshadow. The duty is, therefore, not original with respect to the operation of the vehicle, but resultant, and that only from known and appreciated circumstances capable of bringing it into effect. Otherwise, the law would be held to sanction this irrational result: Such person would be allowed to close his senses to known dangers, or to perils reasonably suggested by the attendant circumstances indicated, in blind reliance upon the unaided care of another, independent of such person's control though that other is, without assuming the consequences of the omission of such ordinary care as the attendant circumstances or known perils create."

Generally, a passenger in an automobile should sit still and say nothing, because any other course is fraught with danger. Interference by laying hold of an operating lever, or by exclamation, or even by direction or inquiry, is generally to be deprecated, as in the long run the greater safety lies in letting the driver alone. Southern P. Co. v. Wright (1918) 160 C. C. A. 339, 248 Fed. 261; Clarke v. Connecticut Co. (1910) 88 Conn. 219, 76 Atl. 523.

And in Bradley v. Interurban R. Co. (1921) — Iowa, —, 183 N. W. 493, the court said: "Within reasonable limits, the invited passenger in an automobile may reasonably and lawfully rely on the skill and judgment of the driver. He cannot physically interfere with the driver's control of the car without peril of disaster. He may, under proper circumstances, sound an alarm if he sees danger ahead of which the driver seems oblivious, but even then he must still, to some extent, place his reliance upon the driver to avoid it. There is no rule of law which obligates him to forcibly seize the steering wheel and wrest it from the hands of the owner, or to jump from the rapidly moving vehicle to certain injury or death. The appearance of danger of this character, in almost every case, comes in an instant of time; the peril is immediate—imminent—and, if a collision occurs, the destruction is accomplished in a twinkling."

And as to whether a guest or passenger in an automobile had exercised reasonable care for his own safety, the court stated in Hermann v. Rhode Island Co. (1914) 36 R. I. 447, 90 Atl. 813: "It cannot be said as a matter of law that such guest or passenger is guilty of negligence because he has done nothing. In many such cases the highest degree of caution may consist of inaction. In situations of great and sudden peril, meddlesome interference with those having control, either by physical act or by disturbing suggestions and needless warnings, may be exceedingly disastrous in its results. While it is true that it is the duty of such guest or passenger not to submit himself and his safety solely to the prudence of the driver of the vehicle, and that he must himself use reasonable care for his own safety, nevertheless he should not, in every case, be held guilty of contributory negligence merely because he has done nothing. If there be threatened danger which is known to the passenger and unobserved by the driver, the passenger would be guilty of negligence if he failed to notify and warn the driver; also, if the driver be careless or reckless in his conduct, and this is known to the passenger, and there be reasonable opportunity to do so, it would be the passenger's duty to caution the driver and remonstrate with him, and, if he persisted in his improper conduct, to leave the vehicle; but manifestly that would not be possible, nor could it be required, in every case."

It was held in Gersman v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1921) — Mo. —, 229 S. W. 167, to be the rule in Kansas that where one person is riding in an automobile with another for a common purpose, with equal opportunity to see and ability to appreciate the danger, and is in fact looking out for himself, and makes no effort to avoid danger, he is chargeable with a want of care which results in injury.

The fact that one injured while riding in an automobile had employed an unlicensed person to operate it, contrary to statute, will not of itself prevent holding the one responsible for the accident liable for the injuries, but it is some evidence that the injured person was not in the exercise of due care. Conroy v. Mather (1914) 217 Mass. 91, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 801, 104 N. E. 487; Griffin v. Hustis (1919) — Mass. —, 125 N. E. 387.

II. At railroad crossings.

a. Steam railroads.

In general.

A passenger does not have the right to rely wholly on the driver for protection, but is obliged to look out for himself, in approaching a railroad crossing in an automobile. Virginia & S. W. R. Co. v. Skinner (1916) 119 Va. 843, 89 S. E. 887.

And it has been held, in reference to passengers in other vehicles, that the fact that one is a passenger does not relieve him from the duty of looking and listening for himself in approaching a railroad crossing, and doing all that a careful and prudent man would do under similar circumstances. Hoag v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1888) 111 N. Y. 199, 18 N. E. 648; Flanagan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1902) 70 App. Div. 505, 75 N. Y. Supp. 225, affirmed without opinion in (1903) 173 N. Y. 631, 66 N. E. 1108.

It is the duty of one riding in an automobile, though drunk, to exercise, in approaching a railroad crossing, the same degree of care for his own safety that is required of a sober person under the same circumstances. Graham v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1919) 185 Ky. 370, 215 S. W. 60.

And the occupant of an automobile, in approaching a railroad crossing where he knows there is danger, is under the duty of looking and listening, both being effective. Morris v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1917) 101 Neb. 479, 163 N. W. 799.

Where there was no eyewitness to a railroad accident in which a passenger in an automobile was killed, the jury may infer, from the instinct of self-preservation, that he used due care in looking and listening for approaching trains. Barrett v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1920) — Iowa, —, 175 N. W. 950, rehearing denied in (1920) — Iowa, —, 180 N. W. 670.

And it was held in East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Markens (1891) 88 Ga. 60, 14 L.R.A. 281, 13 S. E. 855, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 313, that where there is no evidence that a female passenger in a public hack knew of danger from an approaching train at a public crossing, the court may state to the jury that there is no evidence of any failure of duty on the part of such passenger to avoid the injury.

A passenger in an automobile, in approaching a railroad crossing, should exercise the care usually exercised by ordinarily prudent persons under the circumstances to ascertain the approach of trains and keep out of their way, and to warn the driver of the approach of a train, and prevent him from driving on the crossing in the way of the train, if it can be done before the automobile gets upon the tracks, or to leave it, if by the use of ordinary care it can be done before the automobile is struck by the train. Graham v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1919) 185 Ky. 370, 215 S. W. 60.

And in Roach v. Western & A. R. Co. (1894) 93 Ga. 785, 21 S. E. 67, where a passenger in a buggy was injured when it was struck by a railroad train at a crossing, the court said that the duty of self-preservation, the omission to guard which would amount to negligence on the part of the passenger, would arise, if from drunkenness or other cause the driver was obviously incompetent to exercise the proper care, and the passenger failed to interpose, or else leave the vehicle in time to escape the collision.

The mere sight of a railroad crossing by a passenger in an automobile approaching such crossing, where there is then present no apparent danger in making it, does not make it his duty to warn the driver of the crossing, or of the mere approach of the automobile thereto, and a passenger has the right to assume that the driver will, in such a case, exercise due care to avoid the usual ordinary dangers of the road. Ellis v. Central California Traction Co. (1918) 37 Cal. App. 390, 174 Pac. 407.

And a female passenger in a public hack is under no duty to supervise the driver at a public railroad crossing, or to look or listen for approaching trains, unless she has some reason to distrust the diligence of the driver himself in respect to these matters. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Markens (1891) 88 Ga. 60, 14 L.R.A. 281, 18 S. E. 855, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 313.

A guest on the rear seat of an automobile owes a very limited degree of care, and is not expected to direct the driver, or to keep a lookout at a railroad crossing, but of sudden dangers, known to him, he must warn the driver, and, for his failure to do so, he is chargeable with having proximately contributed to the accident, unless a reasonable person, under all the circumstances, would not have given the warning. Weidlich v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1919) 93 Conn. 438, 106 Atl. 323.

But where a guest is sitting on the front seat of an automobile with the driver, and enjoys opportunities for seeing and listening for approaching trains at a railroad crossing equal to those of the driver, his duty, in the exercise of ordinary care for his own protection, to keep a vigilant lookout for approaching trains when about to pass over the railroad crossing, does not exact a less degree of care in these respects than is required of the driver. Barrett v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1920) — Iowa, —, 175 N. W. 950, rehearing denied in (1920) — Iowa, —, 180 N. W. 670.

And in Beemer v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1917) 181 Iowa, 642, 162 N. W. 43, where a woman was riding in an automobile with her husband, who drove, without looking, in front of a passenger train, it was held that the wife, who sat on the front seat beside her husband, with the same knowledge of the approach to the crossing and the danger thereof, was as much under the duty of lookout and discovery as he was.

And where one is sitting at the right of the driver in front, with at least equal opportunity to observe danger and the approach of trains, being bound to prove that he exercised ordinary care, it is no less his duty than that of the driver of the automobile to observe and avoid danger, if practical, and to warn the driver thereof. Opp v. Pryor (1920) 294 Ill. 538, 128 N. E. 580.

And a guest in a cutter, if he has the opportunity to do so, is under no less duty than the driver, when approaching a railroad crossing, to look and listen, and to learn of danger and avoid it, if practicable. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Boyts (1897) 16 Ind. App. 640, 45 N. E. 812.

But it was held in Thomas v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1915) 169 Iowa, 337, 151 N. W. 387, an action for the death of a passenger in an automobile caused by its collision with a fast passenger train, that a passenger is not under the same duty as the driver of the automobile in approaching a railroad crossing, but that the passenger has a right to rely upon what the driver of the machine is doing, and upon his care for the safety of himself and the passenger.

And that there is a difference in the amount of care required to be exercised by a passenger and a driver, in approaching a railroad crossing in an automobile, is recognized in the case of Drouillard v. Southern P. Co. (1918) 36 Cal. App. 447, 172 Pac. 405. The court, in answering the question as to whether the passenger had exercised that care which the law exacts of everyone in a similar position, said that, in deciding that question, they must, of course, distinguish between the driver and the guest; that, while for the purposes of the case it might be conceded that, within the rule often announced in reference to railroad crossings, the driver was chargeable in this case with such negligence that no action in his behalf would lie against the railroad company, this concession would not militate against the view that the same defense was not available in an action by the passenger; that, in other words, certain things are sometimes required of the driver, to satisfy the requirements of ordinary care and prudence, that it would be unreasonable to demand of the guest, who has no control over the driver and who is not directing the movements of the machine.

One who is traveling in another's carriage on a mission in which both are interested, having as much right as the owner of the carriage, who is driving the horse, to control the course, is bound to take precautions to avoid injury upon approaching a railroad crossing, and cannot absolve himself of the charge of negligence on the theory that he relied on the driver to do so. Davis v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1907) 88 C. C. A. 488, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 424, 159 Fed. 10.

And it was held in Morel v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1921) 238 Mass. 392, 131 N. E. 175, an action by a helper in a motor truck for injuries sustained in a railroad crossing accident, under § 245 of N. Y. Laws 1906, chapter 463, making a railroad company liable for injuries caused by failure to give the statutory signals required from those in charge of locomotives at grade crossings, that there was no presumption in favor of the plaintiff that he was in the exercise of due care under chapter 553 of the Statutes of 1914, since such statute was inapplicable to actions for injuries, under § 245.

Matter of law.

Under the Pennsylvania rule that it is contributory negligence, as a matter of law, to fail to stop, look, and listen before crossing a railroad track at a highway crossing, a guest in an automobile, who knowingly and without protest suffers the chauffeur to drive upon a railroad track without stopping to look and listen, has been held guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Brommer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1910) 103 C. C. A. 135, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 924, 179 Fed. 577, writ of certiorari denied without opinion in (1911) 223 U. S. 718, 56 L. ed. 628, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522; Eline v. Western Maryland R. Co. (1918) 262 Pa. 33, 104 Atl. 857; Martin v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1919) 265 Pa. 282, 108 Atl. 631. While in all these cases the driver and the guest were said to have been engaged in a common purpose, with a common object in view, and in the first and last cases the holding appears to be based partly upon this fact, it is clear that the court did not mean to imply that the negligence of the driver was imputable to the persons riding with him, but apparently the thought was to distinguish the case from one where the relation is that of a passenger and a quasi carrier for hire.

Contributory negligence on the part of one riding on the front seat of an automobile driven by another whose negligence is not imputable to the former has been held to be shown as a matter of law in the following circumstances:

—where one, on approaching, in broad daylight, a railroad crossing in plain sight for 300 feet, though not familiar with the locality, permitted, without protest, the automobile to be driven, at the rate of about 10 or 12 miles an hour, upon and over the crossing, without stopping, or even hesitating, to ascertain the movements of trains, and only called the attention of the driver to the train when the collision was inevitable, where he saw, or, by the exercise of reasonable care, should have seen, the crossing, in time to have warned the driver of the danger, Martin v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Pa.) supra;

—where, in approaching a railroad crossing, plaintiff saw and observed the train when about 60 or 70 feet from the track, but remained in the automobile, which neither stopped nor checked its speed, but, after passing the open space, ran on behind obstructions to sight and sound, blindly relying on the chance that it would beat the train to the crossing, when plaintiff, even if the driver had refused to stop at his request, was in a position to avoid injury by jumping from the automobile, its speed not being so great as to offer a serious hindrance to such an attempt, Coby v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co. (1913) 174 Mo. App. 648, 161 S. W. 290;

—where the only inference permissible from the evidence was that the regular warnings and signals were given by the train before reaching the crossing, which was familiar to the plaintiff, and his failure to hear one or more of them, and to observe the smoke issuing from the engine, or to hear the rumble and noise of the fast-moving train, in time to have avoided the accident, could not, in the face of the undisputed evidence, be accounted for or explained on any other theory than that of indifference, inattention, and lack of ordinary care and caution on his part, Lawrence v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (1918) 52 Utah, 414, 174 Pac. 817;

—where plaintiff did not look or listen when approaching a railroad crossing, being engaged in conversation with another passenger, but relied exclusively upon the open gates at the crossing, and where, if he had looked, he must have seen the train, and, if he had listened, he must have heard the bell and the other noises of the train, in time to have warned the driver and to have requested him to stop, Blanchard v. Maine C. R. Co. (1917) 116 Me. 179, 100 Atl. 666;

—where one approached a railroad crossing without looking for the approaching train, which was in plain sight, when, if he had looked in time, he would have had an abundance of opportunity to have called the attention of the driver to the approaching engine, or to have jumped from the motor truck in time to have avoided the collision, La Goy v. Director General (1921) 231 N. Y. 191, 131 N. E. 886;

—where had plaintiff looked up the track, of which he had an unobstructed view of 1,000 feet, on his side of the automobile, at any time after it started, from a point 100 feet away, up the incline toward the track, at a speed of 3 miles per hour, he could not have avoided discovering the train, and observing its rapid approach, and the slightest warning to the driver would have caused him to stop in time, and, at the rate the automobile was moving, plaintiff could have left it without danger to himself. Sadler v. Northern P. R. Co. (1922) — Wash. —, 203 Pac. 10.

—where one, riding on the side from which a regular train, then due to his knowledge, was approaching a crossing with which he was familiar, failed to keep a continuous and vigilant outlook for approaching trains, and could have seen the train, if he had looked, in time to have warned the driver of the danger, Hoyle v. Northern P. R. Co. (1919) 105 Wash. 652, 178 Pac. 810; —where one who knew the dangerous character of the railroad crossing, and that he could not see in the direction in which the train came, because of obstructions, and whose opportunity to be on the lookout was better than that of the driver, failed to caution the latter of the impending danger before they reached the tracks, and made no effort to induce the driver to slow down or stop the machine, Morris v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1917) 101 Neb. 479, 163 N. W. 799.

And, likewise, contributory negligence on the part of one riding on the front seat of a buggy or wagon driven by another, with whose negligence he was not chargeable, has been held to be shown as a matter of law in the following circumstances:

—where, knowing that a train was approaching, one joined with the driver in testing the danger of attempting to cross the tracks in front of the train, Colorado & S. R. Co. v. Thomas (1905) 33 Colo. 517, 70 L.R.A. 681, 81 Pac. 801, 3 Ann. Cas. 700, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 316;

—where plaintiff had a better opportunity than the driver for discovering dangers, and, before reaching the first track, discussed the situation with the driver, and they agreed in guessing that everything was all right, and the driver was ready and willing to act upon any information or suggestion from the plaintiff, and the latter instinctively felt that there was a responsibility resting upon him as well as upon the driver, as he knew that they were crossing railroad tracks, and, within 70 feet of the point of collision, he voluntarily assumed the duties of a lookout, and saw the headlight of the engine, which the driver did not appear to have seen, but did not mention the fact to him, or ask him to stop the horses, or to hurry them forward, Smith v. Maine C. R. Co. (1895) 87 Me. 339, 32 Atl. 967;

—where plaintiff was in full possession of all her mental faculties, and could have seen the train at any time when within 42 feet of the point of the collision, but did not see it until immediately before the collision, which she did nothing to avoid, Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Bussey (1903) 66 Kan. 735, 71 Pac. 261;

—where plaintiff approached the point of collision without paying the least heed to the fact that he was about to cross a railroad track, and neither looked nor listened for approaching trains, although, if he had done so, he would have been warned of the danger in time to have averted the injury, Southern R. Co. v. Jones (1916) 118 Va. 685, 88 S. E. 178;

—where plaintiff, whose opportunity for observation was equal, if not superior, to that of the driver, failed to look and listen, on a dark and windy night, for the train, while they were passing over a distance of 90 to 100 feet before reaching the crossing, during which time the train could have been plainly seen, and moved about half a mile, Hajsek v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1903) 5 Neb. (Unof.) 67, 97 N. W. 327;

—where one, on approaching a railroad crossing in a buggy with the top raised, on a day on which it had been snowing and was very windy, failed to look and listen for trains, or to warn the driver, though possessed of the same knowledge of the road, the crossing, and the environment, and with at least the same, if not better, opportunity of discovering dangers, than the driver, and without any embarrassment in communicating them to him, Brickell v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1890) 120 N. Y. 290, 17 Am. St. Rep. 648, 24 N. E. 449;

—where the railroad crossing was known by plaintiff to be dangerous, and she approached it when a train was in full view, but took no precaution to warn her husband, or to avert the sudden danger, although slight care might have avoided it, Miller v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (1891) 128 Ind. 97, 25 Am. St. Rep. 416, 27 N. E. 339.

One who hires a vehicle and driver, with whom he takes passage, is bound to check or remonstrate with the driver in case the latter attempts to cross a railroad track without stopping or listening for approaching trains, and his representative cannot recover in case he is killed by the driver's attempt to cross the tracks, heedless of an approaching train, when he is in an open carriage and can readily discover the peril of the driver's act. Illinois C. R. Co. v. McLeod (1900) 78 Miss. 334, 52 L.R.A. 954, 84 Am. St. Rep. 630, 29 So. 76.

And it was held in Fogg v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1916) 223 Mass. 444, 111 N. E. 960, that the evidence of due care on the part of a woman riding with her husband in an automobile which was struck by a train was insufficient for the consideration of the jury, where there was no evidence that she did anything for her own safety, and there was evidence that, as she neared the railroad crossing, she was looking in a different direction from that from which the train which struck the automobile was approaching.

There is a dictum in Dixon v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. (1916) 139 La. 329, 71 So. 527, to the effect that a passenger having an equal opportunity with the driver to exercise his faculties, and failing to do so, cannot recover damages from a railroad company for injury sustained in a collision between the automobile and a train.

And the failure of a passenger on the rear seat of an automobile to look and listen upon approaching a railroad crossing was held in Read v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1908) 123 App. Div. 228, 107 N. Y. Supp. 1068, to be contributory negligence as matter of law, where it appeared that he was a man of thirty-six, in full possession of his faculties, and seated on the side from which the train was approaching, that for a distance of 175 to 200 feet he had an unobstructed view of 2,000 feet of the railroad tracks, that he was acquainted with the locality, that the automobile was proceeding very slowly, and that any information or a word to the chauffeur would have caused him to stop the automobile and the accident would have been avoided.

And the failure of one in possession of all her faculties, seated in a buggy in such a position that she could have looked for the approach of the train, and, had she looked, would have seen it, to look for approaching trains, upon nearing a railroad crossing, until just before she was struck by the train, renders her guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Pennsylvania Co. v. Stahl (1912) 34 Ohio C. C. 157.

It was held in Sackett v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 174 N. W. 658, where one riding on the rear seat of a motorcycle was injured at a railroad crossing, that, under the circumstances, plaintiff was as much under the duty of lookout and discovery as was the driver, and that where, being familiar with the crossing and knowing that they were approaching railroad tracks, and that trains might be crossing the street at any time, he did not look for approaching trains, he was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

And the failure of an occupant of a wagon to look and listen for approaching trains when he knows he is approaching a railroad crossing is contributory negligence as matter of law. Toledo & O. C. R. Co. v. Eather-ton (1896) 20 Ohio C. C. 297, 11 Ohio C. D. 253.

And the failure of the occupant of a wagon to look and listen before going over a private railroad crossing, when, if he had looked and listened, he must have observed the approaching train which struck the wagon, renders him guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Johnston v. Delano (1916) 100 Neb. 192, 158 N. W. 1034.

And one who might have seen the danger of a reckless attempt by the driver of the wagon in which she was riding, to cross railroad tracks, and who knew that a train was due about that time, but did not look or listen, or warn the driver, or ask to get out, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Dean v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1889) 129 Pa. 514, 6 L.R.A. 143, 15 Am. St. Rep. 733, 18 Atl. 718.

And it was held in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Boyts (1897) 16 Ind. App. 640, 45 N. E. 812, that one who was injured in a railroad crossing accident while riding in another's cutter was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where he did not look or listen before entering upon the crossing, and did not see the engine which struck the cutter until it was within 1 or 2 feet of it, when he attempted to jump out of the cutter, it appearing that he was familiar with the crossing and its surroundings, that he knew, when approaching the crossing, that a freight train was standing at the station near by, and that, when within 30 feet of the crossing, he had an unobstructed view of the sidetrack upon which the train came which struck the cutter, and he was held negligent, though it further appeared that, in approaching the crossing, he told the driver to look out, as there might be a train.

In the preceding case, where it appeared that the train came from the opposite side to that on which the plaintiff sat, the court, in reference to the duty of a passenger to look in both directions, said: "It is argued that the appellee was under no obligation to look to the south, as he was on the north side of the cutter, and, in support of this, counsel cite Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Grames (1893) 8 Ind. App. 112, 34 N. E. 613, 37 N. E. 421. But in that case the brother of the appellee, who was driving the team, spoke to the appellee, directing him to keep a watch on the north side while he looked and listened for engines and cars on the south side. The driver and the appellee in that case were making mutual arrangements for their joint protection, while in this case it appears the driver did not look at all, nor did he request the appellee to look. No excuse is given for his failure to look both ways as he approached the crossing. He was familiar with the crossing and the surroundings, and was bound to use more care than if he had not previously known it. In the case of Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Grames (1893) 136 Ind. 39, 34 N. E. 714, it is said: 'In approaching a crossing the law requires that the traveler shall listen for signals, must take notice of the signs put up as warnings, must look attentively up and down the track if the surroundings are such as to admit of this precaution, and he must not attempt to cross in front of a moving train. If he neglects these precautions, and by reason of such negligence is injured, the court will adjudge, as a matter of law, that he has been guilty of contributory negligence.' "

And where a passenger in an automobile, when it is 100 yards from a railroad crossing, looks for a train and does not see any, his failure to look again, and to continue to look until he is over the crossing, is contributory negligence as matter of law. Virginia & S. W. R. Co. v. Skinner (1916) 119 Va. 843, 89 S. E. 887.

And in Fluckey v. Southern R. Co. (1917) 155 C. C. A. 244, 242 Fed. 468, the court directed a verdict for the defendant upon the ground of contributory negligence, in an action by a woman for personal injury sustained while riding in an automobile with her husband, who, while driving over a railroad crossing, collided with a railroad gasoline motor car, because of his failure to exercise the care of a reasonably prudent man in driving upon the track in front of the approaching car. The court said that the case involved no question of imputing to a passenger the negligence of the driver, because the plaintiff testified that she had assumed the duty of looking out for danger at this crossing, and was undertaking to give any warnings that might be necessary.

One injured when the automobile, in which he was riding in broad daylight with the top down, was struck by a railroad train was held in Gersman v. 18 A.L.R.—21.

Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1921) — Mo. —, 229 S. W. 167, to be guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where he had an equal opportunity with the driver to see and the ability to appreciate the danger, and was not, in fact, relying on the driver to protect him from the danger that might be encountered at the railroad crossing, but was himself looking ahead for approaching cars as they came toward the track, but at no time made a suggestion of any kind to the driver as to the precautions that should be taken before attempting to cross the tracks, and acquiesced both in what the driver did and in what he failed to do, and, even when he saw the cars which struck the auto coming towards them, said nothing, where, if he had instantly called to the driver to stop, he would in all probability have avoided injury.

And one riding in a buggy with another, for the mutual pleasure of both, with equal opportunity to see and ability to appreciate the danger of crossing a railroad, and who is in fact looking out for herself, but makes no effort to avoid the danger by looking and listening for approaching trains, is chargeable with contributory negligence as matter of law. Bush v. Union P. R. Co. (1901) 62 Kan. 709, 64 Pac. 624.

And it was held in Erie R. Co. v. Hurlburt (1915) 137 C. C. A. 477, 221 Fed. 907, that a woman riding with her husband in a buggy, who voluntarily enters upon the task of looking out for her own safety as they approach a railroad crossing, and continually, wholly independent of her husband, uses her eyes and ears to discover an approaching train until the buggy is struck by a train, is responsible for her own personal negligence, and that, where she would have seen the train in time to escape injury if she had looked and listened attentively, her contributory negligence will bar a recovery by her against the railroad company.

A member of an automobile party who had participated in the common dissipation indulged in by the whole party, and knew of the drunken condition of the driver in ample time before reaching a railroad crossing to have gotten out of the automobile, and thereby have avoided injury sustained when the automobile was driven into the side of a freight train, was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Kirmse v. Chicago, T. H. & S. E. R. Co. (1920) — Ind. App. —, 127 N. E. 837.

And in Cunningham v. Erie R. Co. (1910) 137 App. Div. 506, 121 N. Y. Supp. 706, where a railroad train struck a buggy the occupants of which were all intoxicated, it was held that if the plaintiff knew, or would have known if he had been sober, that the driver was in such a state as to be incapable of giving the attention to what he was doing which a man of prudent and reasonable intelligence would have given, he was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

Question of fact.

In order to charge conclusively a mere passenger in an automobile with contributory negligence in failing to see an approaching train which strikes the automobile, something more than ability to see and a failure to look must be shown. His failure to look is evidence to be considered on the question of his negligence, but it is not conclusive against him. In general, the primary duty of caring for the safety of a vehicle and its passengers rests upon the driver, and a mere gratuitous passenger should not be found guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, unless he in some way actively participates in the negligence of the driver, or is aware, either that the latter is incompetent or careless, or unmindful of some danger known to or apparent to the passenger, or is not taking proper precautions in approaching a place of danger, and, being so aware, fails to warn or admonish the driver, or to take proper steps to preserve his own safety. Carnegie v. Great Northern R. Co. (1914) 128 Minn. 14, 150 N. W. 164.

The mere fact that an occupant of an auto truck, killed at an unusually dangerous crossing, knew the condition of the crossing, and the danger involved in passing over it, does not make him guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Baker v. Fields (1921) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 236 S. W. 170.

And it was held in Zenner v. Great Northern R. Co. (1916) 135 Minn. 37, 159 N. W. 1087, where a passenger in an automobile was injured upon its collision with a railroad train, that it could not be said that he was negligent as matter of law, where it was not clear that he was in any sense to blame for the accident, or what he could have done to avoid it.

And in Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (1895) 62 Minn. 71, 30 L.R.A. 684, 54 Am. St. Rep. 616, 64 N. W. 102, involving a passenger in a wagon, it was held that the rule that it is negligence per se for one driving a team on a highway not to "look and listen" for trains, when approaching a railroad crossing, is not, as a general rule, applicable to a mere passenger in a vehicle, who has no control over the driver or his management of the team.

It was held in Chicago, R. I. & G. R. Co. v. Johnson (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 224 S. W. 277, that it could not be said as a matter of law that a guest in an automobile was guilty of contributory negligence in relying upon the driver to keep a proper lookout for a train at a railroad crossing.

And the failure of a passenger to have the driver either stop the automobile before reaching a railroad crossing, or so slacken its speed as to avoid a collision with a train, cannot be held to be contributory negligence as matter of law, where there is no testimony that the passenger discovered the approach of the train in time to warn the driver of the impending danger. Ibid.

And it was held in Black v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 174 N. W. 774, that one who was injured at a railroad crossing, by a collision between the auto truck in which he was riding and a train, was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where it appeared that, as soon as the truck reached a point where the track could be seen, he looked and saw the train which struck the truck, but that he did not tell the driver, because he saw that the driver noticed the train at the same time he did.

The question of the contributory negligence of one injured or killed in a collision at a railroad crossing, while riding upon the front seat of an automobile driven by another with whose negligence he was not chargeable, has been held to be one of fact for the jury under the following circumstances:

— where he was unfamiliar with the road, and did not know of the railroad crossing, and at the time of the accident was sitting with his back in the direction from which the train came, in a position enabling him to converse with his friends on the rear seat, and did not see the train until after the driver saw it, Wanner v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1918) 261 Pa. 273, 104 Atl. 570. The court said that, in the absence of notice or warning to apprise him of danger, no negligence could be charged to him because of the position in which he was sitting, and that whether he was negligent in failing to discover the presence of the crossing in time to give the driver warning of the approaching train was a question of fact for the jury;

— where one riding with a competent driver, in the open country, with which he was familiar, over flat land, in broad daylight, sat talking with a fellow passenger while they were approaching a railroad crossing, and paid no attention to approaching trains, Terwilliger v. Long Island R. Co. (1912) 152 App. Div. 169, 136 N. Y. Supp. 733, affirmed without opinion in (1913) 209 N. Y. 522, 102 N. E. 1114. The court stated that while he could not close his eyes to an obvious or well-known danger, he was not called upon to exercise any act of vigilance to guard against a danger which was not known to him, or which was not likely to befall one situated as he was in the car, and that he had the right to assume that the driver would exercise reasonable care in the operation of the automobile, and that unless he was aware of the railroad crossing, and had reason to apprehend that the driver would run the automobile into a position of danger, the jury might properly find that he was in the exercise of that reasonable degree of care which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under like circumstances, by merely sitting still in his seat and talking with a fellow passenger;

— where the passenger was cautiously looking ahead when approaching a railroad crossing with which he was not very familiar, and was the first to discover a train approaching, and gave immediate alarm which the driver heeded by instantly turning the automobile to one side, but not in time to avoid a collision, Eline v. Western Maryland R. Co. (1918) 262 Pa. 33, 104 Atl. 857;

— where an experienced chauffeur was demonstrating an auto truck to plaintiff, who failed to keep a lookout and warn the driver of an approaching train, or to interfere with the management of the truck, and the accident occurred under circumstances in which a reasonably competent, vigilant driver needed no assistance, and would in the long run be better off if left alone, Southern P. Co. v. Wright (1918) 160 C. C. A. 339, 248 Fed. 261.

And the negligence of one so riding in a carriage or wagon has likewise been held to be for the jury in the following circumstances:

— where he did not know that the driver was incompetent, or was not keeping a proper lookout for trains when approaching the crossing, notwithstanding the fact that, if plaintiff had exercised the degree of vigilance in "looking and listening" required of one having the control and management of a vehicle, he would have discovered the approaching train in time to have avoided injury, Howe v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (1895) 62 Minn. 71, 30 L.R.A. 684, 54 Am. St. Rep. 616, 64 N. W. 102;

— where plaintiff did not look for trains, because she saw the driver looking up and down the tracks, and an attempt upon her part to watch for the train, in the situation as it existed, might have interfered with the observations of the driver, Mittelsdorfer v.

West Jersey & S. R. Co. (1909) 77 N. J. L. 698, 73 Atl. 538;

— where the plaintiff was riding with his face toward the rear, and another passenger, who was riding in the back of the wagon with his face toward the front, when they were approaching the railroad crossing, saw the approaching train, gave the alarm, and jumped out of the rear of the wagon, and the plaintiff attempted to do likewise, but, when about to jump, the team gave a lurch and caused him to strike the ground between the rails and he was injured. Illinois Southern R. Co. v. Hamill (1907) 226 Ill. 88, 80 N. E. 745. It was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, as matter of law, because he sat with his face toward the rear of the wagon and did not look or listen for approaching trains, and the finding of the jury that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence was sustained;

— where one riding with the driver on the opposite side from which the train came which struck the wagon, and injured him, failed to look in such direction before the attempt was made to cross the tracks, Pyle v. Clark (1897) 25 C. C. A. 190, 49 U. S. App. 260, 79 Fed. 744, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 100;

— where a woman riding with her husband, was wrapped up, with a hood on her head, to protect her from the cold, and did not look toward the direction from which the train came, or observe whether he was looking, but did occasionally look in the opposite direction, which was the side on which she sat, because she believed that he was a careful driver, and that he was driving carefully at the time, Finley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1898) 71 Minn. 471, 74 N. W. 174;

Great Northern R. Co. (1901) 82 Minn. 120, 84 N. W. 728, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 322;

— where plaintiff was riding with a young baby in her arms, and seated upon the opposite side from which the train came which struck the carriage, and the accident occurred on a stormy and sleety night, at a railroad crossing with which she was unfamiliar. It was held that it could not be said as matter of law that she was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to look around her husband, the driver, to observe the approach of a train which could only be seen for about 60 feet before the track was reached, Heater v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1904) 90 App. Div. 495, 85 N. Y. Supp. 524;

— where the plaintiff was riding with her husband, the driver, in a funeral procession, and for a space of about 200 feet from the crossing to a point about 100 feet therefrom a passing train could be seen, and the plaintiff looked during the journey through such space, and, during the space of 100 feet immediately adjacent to the railroad tracks, paid attention for passing trains, and when the head of the procession reached the tracks the funeral director descended from the hearse and walked ahead of it across the tracks, and when the carriage in which the plaintiff was riding came to the tracks, the flagman motioned for its driver to proceed, Peirce v. Jones (1899) 22 Ind. App. 163, 53 N. E. 431. It was held that it could not be said as matter of law that the plaintiff was bound to try to prevent her husband from obeying the flagman, or to get out of the carriage;

— where plaintiff was a young girl between fourteen and fifteen years of age, and the carriage was stopped at a point about 50 feet from the crossing, where the view was obstructed, and she listened for approaching trains, and immediately prior to going upon the track, within about 15 feet of the rail, leaned forward over the dashboard and looked and listened a second time to ascertain if a train was approaching, Connor v. Wabash R. Co. (1910) 149 Mo. App. 675, 129 S. W. 777;

The trial judge submitted the question of plaintiff's negligence to the jury, and the appellate court, in Sherris v. Northern P. R. Co. (1918) 55 Mont. 189, 175 Pac. 269, upheld the jury's finding that he was guilty of contributory negligence so as to defeat a recovery for damages sustained in a collision between the automobile in which he was riding, and a freight train, where it appeared that the plaintiff sat in the front seat of the automobile by the side of the driver, who drove into the railroad yards at a rate of 6 or 8 miles an hour; that, when it reached track 6, the driver shut off the power and allowed the automobile to drift along in high gear without making any noise; that, as they approached the main line, both he and the driver kept a constant lookout, glancing to the right and left; that the plaintiff could not see a train approaching from the west until he had passed the caboose track; that he heard no noise of any kind; that as they passed this track he glanced to the right, then to the left, and again to the right; that as he glanced to the right the second time he discovered the train coming from the west, at a rate about twice as fast as the automobile was going; and that, when he saw the train, the driver was looking to the left, and that he called to the driver, who at once put on the brake to stop, but the automobile, not having chains upon its wheels, skidded along until it came so near the track that it was struck by the step of the front car, and pushed around until it faced to the east, with the result that plaintiff, in the act of jumping to save himself, was thrown to the ground and injured.

And in Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Jones (1915) 195 Ala. 378, 70 So. 729, where a passenger, sitting on the front seat of a wagon with the driver, was injured when the wagon was struck by an engine, it was held that the trial court properly sustained the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's plea that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence because she could have seen the train approaching in time to have given the driver warning of its approach, or to have requested him to allow her to alight from the wagon, or for her to have alighted without the wagon having stopped; that she negligently failed to look or listen for the approach of the train; that she negligently failed to give the driver warning of its approach; and that she negligently failed to request the driver to allow her to alight from the wagon, and was unaware of the approach of the train until the horse was upon the track.

And, where one is riding on the single seat of a wagon, which is driven upon a railroad track before an approaching train, her failure to attempt to jump from the wagon while the driver is trying to avoid being struck by the train is not contributory negligence as matter of law. Fike v. Pere Marquette R. Co. (1913) 174 Mich. 167, 140 N. W. 592.

The negligence of one riding upon the rear seat of an automobile, driven by another whose negligence was not imputable to the former, has been held to be for the jury under the following circumstances:

— where he made no attempt to ascertain whether or not the railroad track could be crossed in safety, and there was nothing to show the construction of the vehicle, or that he knew of the proximity of the crossing, or could have known of it by the exercise of reasonable care, Brommer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1910) 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 924, 103 C. C. A. 135, 179 Fed. 577, certiorari denied in (1911) 223 U. S. 718, 56 L. ed. 628, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522;

— where she was wrapped up in a heavy cloak, with sacks of vegetables about her, with the curtains of the auto down, and did not look to the right or left, but only looked straight ahead for a train before coming to the crossing, Glanville v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1920) — Iowa, —, 180 N. W. 152;

— where a girl of sixteen, riding between two others, failed to look and listen for trains upon approaching a railroad crossing, and the automobile was in charge of a competent chauffeur, with her father, the owner, sitting beside him, and directing the movements of the automobile, which was proceeding very slowly up an incline towards the track, working its way alongside of a depot, through a crowd of people who were almost touching it upon all sides, Noakes v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1907) 121 App. Div. 716, 106 N. Y. Supp. 522, affirmed without opinion in (1909) 195 N. Y. 543, 88 N. E. 1126;

— where the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding was struck by a locomotive, killing both the driver and the passenger, at a railroad crossing at which the view of the occupants of the machine in the direction of the approaching locomotive was intercepted until they reached a point about 50 feet from the crossing, where they stopped and looked up the track, which could be seen for a distance of from 150 to 200 feet, and then proceeded, and within five seconds were struck by the locomotive, which was traveling at the rate of 50 miles an hour, Drouillard v. Southern Pacific Co. (1918) 36 Cal. App. 447, 172 Pac. 405. In holding that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law the court said: "What, then, within the interval of four or five seconds, should Drouillard have done to acquit himself in the eyes of the law? The contention of the appellants at the oral argument was that he should have looked up and down the track and discovered the approach of the locomotive, and warned the driver to stop. It may be debatable whether, under the circumstances, he was required to do even this much. It might be plausibly argued that he would be justified in believing that the driver would be apprised of the danger, and would stop his machine before attempting to cross the track. But granting that appellants' contention is not unreasonable,—even conceding that, when he became convinced that the driver did not intend to heed the warning, it was the duty of Drouillard to attempt to leave the machine,—then we must, for the purposes of this appeal, hold that Drouillard did just what appellants contend he should have done. The case would be no different if a witness had testified to such facts. This follows necessarily from the presumption—which is a rule of evidence—that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. Of course, this is a controvertible presumption, but until controverted it is evidence which the jury is bound to accept. . . . Herein there was no evidence that the deceased failed to do what the most stringent rule of ordinary care demands, and therefore there can be no contention that said presumption was overcome;"

— where two passengers were killed when an auto was struck by a train, and the evidence was conflicting as to whether the automobile stopped within a few feet of the railroad track before crossing, or whether it went right across without stopping. Praught v. Great Northern R. Co. (1919) 144 Minn. 309, 175 N. W. 998. The court said: "If it be true, as testified to by the engineer, that the automobile came to a full stop when within 8 or 10 feet of the railroad track, and, as the locomotive approached the crossing, suddenly started up and was instantly struck by the engine, it would be almost impossible to say that the passengers, having nothing to do with the driving of the car, could have been guilty of contributory negligence; but if, when the automobile approached the right of way, it slowed down to 8 or 10 miles and proceeded across the track at that rate, then, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the issue of contributory negligence on the part of the passengers became a question for the jury;"

— where one was injured while riding in her employer's automobile, which was struck by a train on the main track of a blind crossing, Bergert v. Payne (1921) — C. C. A. —, 274 Fed. 784. It was held that such employee, who had not seen or heard the train, could not be conclusively charged with negligence in not attempting to make her employer stop his automobile within the 8 or 9 feet between a sidetrack and the main track;

— where the plaintiff was in charge of a lunatic, and looked and listened for approaching trains, and gave such attention to his surroundings as could be spared from the man he had in charge, and observed what the driver was doing, and noticed that he was acting with care in reducing the speed so that apparently the automobile would come to a stop at a place near the tracks, where full view of them could be had, and when the driver, when within a few feet of the tracks, imprudently decided to go onto the crossing, it was too late for the plaintiff to check or warn him, or to escape the danger, Wachsmith v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1912) 233 Pa. 456, 82 Atl. 755, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 679;

—where a woman was riding with her daughter-in-law, with her husband and son in the front seat, the husband driving, and she failed to call her husband's attention to the conditions, and request him to exercise reasonable care, Denton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1916) 97 Kan. 498, 155 Pac. 812. The court said: "Why should the plaintiff have called her husband's attention to the conditions, and exhorted him to use due care? She had confidence in his ability as a driver. The conditions were just as obvious to him as to her. He could see and hear all she could see and hear. He was responsible for the operation of the automobile, not she, and she had no reason to doubt that he was exercising his faculties with diligence. Besides this, there was another observer in the front seat with the driver, who was in fact familiar with the crossing. His safety and his wife's safety were at stake, and there is no evidence of any fact indicating to the plaintiff that her son was not exercising his faculties of observation with diligence. Why ought the plaintiff to have arrogated to herself control over the automobile, and commanded it to stop? The finding is that she saw a track beyond the obstructions to her vision, and knew engines and cars were likely to pass over it at any time. There is no finding, and no evidence, that from her place in the back seat she could see this track was so close to the one on which the coal car stood that the automobile would be in danger before her husband on the front seat could see toward the north. Her opportunities of observation were not equal to those of her husband. She knew his ability as a driver and trusted him, and what is more, she had the right to trust him. In the case of Williams v. Withington (1913) 88 Kan. 809, 129 Pac. 1148, it was said: 'Common sense would dictate that, when a wife goes riding with her children in a rig driven by her husband, she rightfully relies on him not to drive so as to imperil those in his charge. The law does not depart from common sense by requiring her, under the circumstances shown here, to impugn her husband's ability to drive, and assume the prerogative to dictate to him the manner of driving.' This doctrine applies to the case of a wife riding in an automobile driven by her husband, unless she should know him to be incompetent or under some disability;"

—where plaintiff, when the automobile was about 100 feet from the crossing, heard a noise which seemed to him the noise of an approaching train, and called to the chauffeur to stop, and the next thing he knew the automobile, which was going about 15 or 20 miles an hour, was in collision with the train, Vocca v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1917) 259 Pa. 42, 102 Atl. 283;

—where plaintiff's husband and an experienced chauffeur were sitting on the front seat, and the latter stopped the automobile and looked and listened at a point 146 feet from the railroad crossing, but failed to discover an approaching train, which sounded no whistle and rang no bell, Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Emens (1916) 145 C. C. A. 522, 231 Fed. 636, writ of certiorari denied without opinion in 242 U. S. 627, 61 L. ed. 535. It was held not to be contributory negligence as a matter of law for her not to insist on the husband or chauffeur doing more than they actually did, when what the chauffeur did had been held not to be, as matter of law, contributory negligence.

It is not contributory negligence for a passenger on the rear seat of a closed automobile, when approaching a railroad crossing, to be asleep, or reading a book, or engrossed in talk with another than the driver, or in deep thought, as ordinary experience shows that such is not infrequently the conduct of the ordinarily prudent person when riding as a guest on the rear seat of an automobile. Weidlich v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1919) 93 Conn. 438, 106 Atl. 323.

And in Broussard v. Louisiana Western R. Co. (1916) 140 La. 518, 73 So. 606, 13 N. C. C. A. 910, where a recovery was had for the death of a passenger in an automobile struck by a train, it was unsuccessfully contended by the defendant that the plaintiff's intestate should have observed the crossing and warned the chauffeur, and that because of his failure to do so there should be no recovery—citing, in support of such contention, the case of Dixon v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. (1916) 139 La. 329, 71 So. 527, supra, under "Matter of law," this subdivision; but the court distinguished that case upon the ground that in the case at bar the plaintiff's intestate was not on the front seat, and said that it is a question whether it is good law in any case.

The negligence of one riding upon the rear seat of a wagon or carriage driven by another, with whose negligence he was not chargeable, has been held to a question of fact in the following circumstances:

—where the plaintiff was sitting facing the side of the wagon away from the direction from which the train came, and, when they reached a point several hundred feet from the crossing, warned the driver to look out for the cars, and looked and listened at that point, and did not hear or see the train approaching, and where the view was obstructed until they reached a point about 60 or 75 feet from the crossing, and, in going that distance, she looked two or three times in the direction from which the train came, and did not see it, and the only way the plaintiff could have seen the approaching train was by turning almost squarely around and looking directly behind her, Lewin v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1899) 41 App. Div. 89, 58 N. Y. Supp. 113. It was held that, considering the way she was seated in the wagon, and the facts that she was holding a young child in her lap, that she had warned the driver, who was a competent one, that they were approaching a railroad crossing, and that she looked in the direction from which the train came several times, while going the 50 or 75 feet after passing the point where the view was obstructed, it could not be said, as a matter of law, that she was guilty of negligence in not turning her body clear around in such a way as to enable her to see the approaching train;

—where a girl of nineteen, riding in a carriage driven by her brother-in-law, did not advise him with respect to the management of the team, on approaching a railroad crossing where obstructions prevented a view of the track from a greater distance than about 15 feet, although she was familiar with the surroundings and he was not, Angell v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1916) 97 Kan. 688, 156 Pac. 763, rehearing denied in (1916) 98 Kan. 268, 157 Pac. 1196.

It was held in Collins v. Hustis (1920) — N. H. —, 111 Atl. 286, that the plaintiff, who was riding in an automobile with a competent, skilful driver, and was injured by a train striking the automobile from the opposite side from that upon which she was sitting, was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, the court saying that, if some duty rests upon a passenger in an automobile approaching a crossing to look for approaching trains, it does not conclusively appear that she did not perform that duty, that no train was approaching from her side of the automobile, and if she looked down the tracks, she saw none, and that, even if she knew the train was approaching and understood the driver's purpose to pass in front of it, it does not conclusively appear that she could have taken the control from him and stopped the car, and that reasonable men might conclude that it was the part of prudence, in the emergency, for her not to interfere with the operation of the machine.

And in Lyon v. Phillips (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 196 S. W. 995, where it was held that the negligence of the plaintiff was a question for the jury, the court said that want of ordinary care on the part of the deceased, riding with another as his mere guest, would be measured by whether he failed in his duty to keep a lookout and to warn his companion operating the automobile when he discovered the approach of the train; that there was no direct evidence indicating the precautions taken by the deceased; that the circumstances arising out of the physical facts immediately preceding the collision alone spoke upon the question of contributory negligence of the deceased; and that those circumstances did not speak with sufficient weight to conclusively determine the question as a matter of law. It did not conclusively appear that the driver and the deceased were aware of the approach of the train at a time before they reached a storehouse along the highway, which was 93 feet from the tracks, but it did appear that the headlight of the engine shone directly upon them as they came out from behind the storehouse, and that this fact would go to show that they knew that the train was approaching the crossing; and it further appeared that the automobile, at the speed at which it was going, could have been stopped before it reached the tracks.

In an action for injuries to a passenger in an automobile struck by a freight train, the question of his contributory negligence was held to be for the jury, in Robinson v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. (1918) 90 Or. 490, 176 Pac. 594, the court saying: "Although even a guest, as he [plaintiff] neared the railway crossing it was his duty to look and listen according to his opportunity. If, with knowledge of the situation, but without protest or warning, he acquiesces in the negligence of the driver going into the danger by which he is injured, he adopts that negligence as his own. It is not imputed to him nolens volens, but, on the other hand, he assumes it. The duty to look from where he can see, and to listen from where he can hear, is incumbent upon him as well as upon the driver, where they have equal chance, and if he does nothing to carry out this direction of the law he is negligent on his own account."

And it was held in Carbaugh v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1918) 252 Pa. 25, 104 Atl. 860, that a passenger in an automobile could not be held guilty of contributory negligence upon the ground that because of her failure to look and listen for approaching trains, she joined with the driver in testing a danger which would have been apparent to her had she exercised due care, where it appeared that the driver stopped, looked, and listened before crossing the tracks, and that no train at the time was in sight or hearing, and that, therefore, there was no manifest danger to test. The court further held that, assuming that the passenger saw, or was bound to see, the approaching train when it rounded a curve in the tracks, and that the driver also saw it, there was neither occasion nor necessity for interference by the passenger in the operation of the car, and to have done so might only have served to increase the danger.

The contributory negligence of the plaintiff was held in Hines v. Wilson (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 225 S. W. 275, a question for the jury. It appeared in this case that the plaintiff, before entering upon the crossing, the automobile having slowed up and almost stopped, looked and listened for approaching trains.

And it was held in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Dukeman (1906) 180 Ill. App. 105, where both the driver and the passenger in a buggy were killed by a railroad train, that under all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, some of which tended to show that the passenger looked before the attempt was made to cross the track, the question of the decedent's contributory negligence was a question for the jury.

In McAdoo v. State (1920) 136 Md. 452, 111 Atl. 476, where an occupant of an automobile truck was killed when it was struck by a locomotive, the law as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was held to be correctly presented by an instruction as follows: "It was the duty of all the persons in the automobile, mentioned in the evidence, to look and listen carefully for the approach of a train after the automobile started over the crossing, even although the jury may find that the watchman lifted the gate for them to cross; and if the jury find from the evidence that the train or locomotive which struck the automobile in which the deceased was riding could have been seen by the deceased in time to have warned the driver of the automobile of the train's approach, in time for the said driver of the automobile to have stopped the automobile before reaching the track on which the train was approaching, and that the deceased did not do so, or attempt to do so, then the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant." It was held, however, in this case, that, upon the evidence, the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence was not a question of law, but one of fact to be determined by the jury.

And it was held in Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kephert (1916) 61 Ind. App. 621, 112 N. E. 251, that the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence was for the jury, where it appeared that he was sitting on the side of the auto from which the train came, that, as the auto approached the crossing, the flagman signaled for it to stop to let a train go by, that, as the rear end of the train was going past the crossing, the flagman signaled for the auto to go ahead, and that before going upon the crossing the plaintiff looked both ways, and did not see or hear any train, and, when the front end of the auto was on the first rail, the plaintiff saw the engine coming from the opposite direction and holloed, "Look out!" and the auto was immediately struck.

It was held in Griffin v. Hustis (1919) — Mass. —, 125 N. E. 387, where a passenger in an automobile was injured because the driver, in order to avoid a collision with a freight train, turned the auto off the road and ran it into a pole, that the issue of the personal care of the plaintiff was for the jury, where it appeared that, when the automobile came almost to a stop between 75 and 100 feet from the crossing, the plaintiff looked to the right and the left to see if there was any train coming, and did not see or hear anything to indicate the approach of one, and that when they had gone about 50 feet farther he again looked to the right, saw the engine, and holloed to the chauffeur that there was a train coming, the court saying that, considering that the train was moving more than 40 feet a second, that the plaintiff's view of the track was so limited, and that he had a right to rely somewhat on the skill and care of the chauffeur, his negligence was for the jury.

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scott (1919) 184 Ky. 319, 211 S. W. 747, where a passenger on a motor truck was killed when it collided with a fast train, it was held that the plaintiff's intestate, who had looked and listened for approaching trains, was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law because he failed to stop and listen before crossing the tracks. The court said in this case that Kentucky had not adopted the "Stop, look, and listen" doctrine. And it was further held in this case that the fact that the plaintiff's intestate was an employee of the railroad company and presumptively knew of the time of the arrival of the train which produced the injury did not make him chargeable with contributory negligence as matter of law, the court saying that, conceding that the fact that the employment gave him more accurate information of the time of the running of the train, and therefore imposed upon him a correspondingly greater duty to discover the approach of it to the crossing, the question of his negligence was one for the determination of the jury.

And the court in this case overruled the contention that the failure of the decedent to observe that a semaphore, located some distance to one side of the crossing, indicated that a train was within the block, made him guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, and, in this connection, said: "In answer to this it may be said that there is some evidence to show that decedent could not have seen the semaphore before he was in immediate danger, nor is it in proof, except by inference, that the semaphore on the particular occasion indicated that the train was within the block. Furthermore, the position of the semaphore would not indicate that a train was approaching the crossing. The only fact which the semaphore would positively establish was that a train was in the block, but whether it was running, and, if so, in what direction, or upon what track, or whether it was standing still, would not be indicated. So that, if it were in proof that the decedent saw and observed the indication made by the semaphore, we think it was then a question for the jury to say whether, in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, he should have stopped the truck before entering upon the track."

A passenger in a sleigh approaching a railroad crossing at night, who does not know of the immediate proximity of the crossing, and does not hear, although he is listening, the signals of the approaching train, cannot be said to be guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, because he does not request the driver to stop and look and listen to ascertain whether a train is approaching. Wilson v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1894) 18 R. I. 598, 29 Atl. 300.

And it was held in Senft v. Western Maryland R. Co. (1914) 246 Pa. 446, 92 Atl. 553, that a woman riding with her husband in a motor car, which was struck by an engine at a grade crossing, was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where it appeared that, when the automobile was 40 feet from the railroad tracks, she told him to look out for a train, that he threw out the clutch, and, while his car was drifting on an upgrade, rose from his seat to obtain a better view, looked at his watch to learn whether a train was due, and remarked to her that the train had passed, resumed his seat, and, when within 20 feet of the track, threw the clutch in, and his car ran in front of an engine, the plaintiff having continued all the time to look and listen for a train, and first seeing it when within 10 feet of the track. The court said that whether, in the few seconds after she saw he was going on the crossing,—she having testified that when the clutch was thrown out she expected he would stop his car,—more could have been required of her, was not a question that could have been withdrawn from the jury.

The failure of a guest in an automobile struck by a train to warn the driver, upon approaching a crossing, of the danger of approaching trains, does not render the passenger guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where, upon approaching the railroad track, the speed of the automobile was checked, and the passenger saw the driver stooping over with his hand on the lever, accompanied by a movement indicating to the passenger an intention on the part of the driver of stopping the automobile before going upon the tracks. Beck v. Director General (1920) 268 Pa. 571, 112 Atl. 34.

And in Toledo & O. C. R. Co. v. Fippin (1910) 32 Ohio C. C. 755, affirmed without opinion in (1912) 86 Ohio St. 334, 99 N. E. 1134, an action for the death of a woman as a result of a collision between a train and the wagon in which she was riding with her husband, where it appeared that his sight and hearing were good, and he was an experienced driver, using his own horses with which he was familiar, and she had no knowledge of the situation superior to his, it was held that she had a right to trust in her husband as the head of the family, and rely upon his judgment and skill as a driver, and that he would heed all apparent warnings and avoid all apparent dangers, and where, as soon as she realized that a collision with the train was imminent, she left her seat and prepared to jump from the wagon, a finding that she was free from contributory negligence was justified.

It was held in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State (1918) 133 Md. 219, 104 Atl. 465, that the negligence of a passenger in an automobile which was struck by a railroad train was a question for the jury, where, shortly before reaching a crossing, the automobile was stopped, and the plaintiff looked in both directions, and listened for approaching trains, and that it was not negligence as matter of law for him to fail to warn the driver to stop again just before crossing the tracks, since he may have thought that the driver was going to stop at such point, and, after reaching it, there was no time for him to warn the driver before the engine struck the automobile.

And in Hoag v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1888) 111 N. Y. 199, 18 N. E. 648, where both the husband and the wife were killed while riding across a railroad track in a wagon, and there was no evidence as to the manner of the accident, it was held that the contributory negligence was a question for the jury. The court said: "The strong probability is that she did see the train, and her husband did also, and that he, for some reason, undertook to cross in its front, miscalculating, perhaps, its distance and speed and his opportunity. She was not bound to suspect that purpose until she saw it being executed. Before that, she might reasonably expect him to stop and wait. When she saw that he was about to make the attempt they must have been very close to the track. She was not bound to jump from the wagon. That might seem to her as dangerous as to sit still. She could not be required to seize the reins, or interfere with the driver. That is almost always dangerous and imprudent. She might have begged her husband to stop, and we do not know that she did not; but if she did not, and sat silent, it does not follow, as matter of law, that she was negligent. Her husband seems to have been ordinarily a careful man. Having his wife with him, one would think, would make him more so. He stopped twice before he crossed the freight tracks. She was hardly blamable, when both saw the coming train, for thinking and expecting that he would stop again. When she saw that, instead of stopping, he meant to cross, she should have spoken, perhaps; but she may have been so near the engine as to have scarcely had time, or so paralyzed with fright at the impending danger as to have lost her judgment and prudence for the moment. The degree of care to be exercised varies with circumstances and emergencies. If the deceased was silent, it does not follow, as matter of law, that she was negligent. . . . Whether the surrounding circumstances sufficiently show that the deceased was not in fault were questions which, we think, should have gone to the jury."

It was held in Hines v. Johnson (1920) — C. C. A. —, 264 Fed. 465, where a passenger was killed when a freight train ran into the automobile in which he was riding, that the passenger was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, but that his freedom from contributory negligence was a question for the jury, and, in this connection, the court said: "It is said that Johnson was negligent because he was familiar with the crossing, had opportunity to observe the train moving, knew the speed of the machine, and that, although he gave no warning, he must have seen the string of box cars in ample time to have given warning to the driver, and thus the collision might have been avoided. Granting that upon the trial of the facts there was force in such an argument, the difficulty with it now is that it is built upon inferences which plaintiff in error draws from the testimony, but which are entirely at variance with those which the jury must have made, and which are by no means unreasonable."

And it was held in Birmingham Southern R. Co. v. Harrison (1919) 203 Ala. 284, 82 So. 534, where an automobile passenger was killed in a railroad crossing accident, that the trial court properly sustained a demurrer to defendant's plea alleging contributory negligence in plaintiff's failure to warn the driver of the automobile of the approach of the train, or in failing to make protest to the driver, or to make such other effort as he reasonably could have made to avoid being carried onto the tracks.

A passenger in an automobile struck by a train is not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, but his negligence is a question for the jury, where he saw the train at the earliest point at which it could have been seen, which was when the train was 200 feet away and the auto 20 feet from the crossing, and gave warning to the driver, but the driver was then unable to avoid the collision. Hurt v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. (1918) 140 Tenn. 623, 205 S. W. 437.

And assuming that deceased, when the automobile which he occupied as a passenger or guest reached a point 30 feet distant from the railroad crossing, traveling at a speed of only 4 miles an hour, saw, 300 feet away and approaching at a high rate of speed, the train which struck the automobile, it cannot be said as a matter of law that his failure to interfere with the driver's operation of the car, rather than to rely upon the latter's judgment in escaping the threatened danger, or his failure to leave the car, constituted contributory negligence, but the question of his contributory negligence was one of fact for the jury. Carpenter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1921) — Cal. App. —, 195 Pac. 1073.

It was held in Sherwood v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1907) 120 App. Div. 639, 105 N. Y. Supp. 547, that plaintiff, who was killed in a collision between the automobile in which he was riding and a train, was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where it appeared that he was a boy of sixteen years, without any knowledge as to automobiles, that the machine was driven by an older person who he knew was familiar with its operation, and was fully able to manage and control it, and that a carriage directly in front of him was making the crossing. In regard to his duty to jump from the machine, the court said that, while that might have been the best thing for him to have done, in the emergency, he was not required to choose at his peril what ultimately would prove the safer course, but was only called upon to use his best care and judgment as to the situation presented.

Where the automobile in which a passenger is riding comes almost to a standstill before crossing a railroad, and the passenger looks up and down the tracks for approaching trains, and, just as the automobile starts to cross the tracks, the flagman appears, and cries, "Stop! jump!" and the passenger immediately starts to get out of the automobile, and, with one foot upon the ground, and one foot upon the running board, is struck by a train backing noiselessly, and without a light or anyone upon it to give warning, it was held that such passenger was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, and that all that could be required of her was to look and listen, and to warn the driver of approaching danger. Parker v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (1921) — N. C. —, 106 S. E. 755.

And where employees of a railroad company placed a hand car in a public road near the railroad tracks at a public crossing, and buckets and coats were hanging upon the car, and, in driving a mule hitched to a buggy in which the plaintiff was riding as the guest of the owner and driver, it was necessary, in order to go over the crossing, that the mule be driven past the car and within a few feet of it, and the wind rattled the buckets and waved the coats on the car, thereby frightening the mule, and causing it to run away and upset the buggy and injure the plaintiff, and where, on the trial of an action for damages on account of the injury, it appeared that the driver saw the car, and the buckets and clothes thereon, when he was about 30 feet away, and that the mule stopped when about 6 feet from the car, and was looking at it and trembling, and the driver urged the mule on until it ran away and upset the buggy, it was for the jury to say whether the plaintiff had a reasonable opportunity to get safely out of the buggy after the mule showed symptoms of fright, and before it ran away, and whether his failure to do so amounted to a want of ordinary care on his part for his own safety. Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Reid (1919) 23 Ga. App. 694, 99 S. E. 235.

The fact that a passenger in an auto stage, who was sitting on the door of the machine with his feet on the inside thereof because of its crowded condition, upon observing the freight train, which struck the stage, moving toward the crossing, immediately jumped to the center of the machine and took hold of the back of the front seat, did not make him guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, but his negligence was a question for the jury. Ellis v. Central California Traction Co. (1918) 87 Cal. App. 390, 174 Pac. 407.

And it was held in Chicago, R. I. & G. R. Co. v. Wentzel (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 214 S. W. 710, that it was a question for the jury whether a passenger in a crowded jitney struck by a train was guilty of contributory negligence, the court saying that if a person of ordinary care would not have become a passenger in a five-passenger automobile occupied by eleven persons in violation of a city ordinance, and would not have committed herself to the care and custody of the driver so violating such ordinance, or would not have remained in the automobile while approaching the railroad crossing under the circumstances, or would have discovered the approach of the train with which the automobile collided, then such want of care would make the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence.

And the fact that the plaintiff, one of a party of six who engaged the owner of an automobile to take them for a trip, violated the act which provides that no person shall employ or hire as a chauffeur any person not specially licensed, is some evidence of contributory negligence upon his part, but it cannot be ruled that such negligence directly contributed to his injuries so as to preclude him, as matter of law, from recovering from the railroad company for injuries sustained by him because the driver of the auto, in order to avoid an imminent collision with a freight train, turned off the road and ran into a pole. Griffin v. Hustis (1919) — Mass. —, 125 N. E. 387.

b. Interurban railroads.

Matter of law.

A mature person who attempts to cross an interurban railroad track without looking for approaching cars, or taking any precautions for his own safety, relying completely upon the driver of the automobile in which he is riding to take the necessary steps for their safety, is guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, and cannot recover damages for injuries sustained in a collision with a car, when, by looking, he could have seen the approaching car in time to have warned the driver of the danger.

KIRBY v. KANSAS CITY, K. V. & W. R. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 299. In this case the court said: "When he saw the defendant's car approaching, he did undertake to protect himself by jumping out of the automobile, doing that contrary to the request of the driver that he remain. Probably that appeared to the plaintiff as the safest thing to do. That was not contributory negligence on his part."

And it was held in Cable v. Spokane & I. E. R. Co. (1908) 50 Wash. 619, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1224, 97 Pac. 744, that a passenger of years of discretion, in crossing an interurban electric railway, is subject to the rule of "stop, look, and listen," and, in the absence of a showing that she endeavored to stop the horse, or to have the driver do so, or to do anything for her protection equivalent thereto, and, in the absence of any evidence tending to show a purpose, intention, or attempt on her part to take any such precaution, or that she was prevented, or, without fault on her part, induced not to do so, she cannot escape the operation of the rule making her guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

A member of a party taking a pleasure ride in an automobile, who is injured when the auto runs into the side of an electric train while passing over a grade crossing, cannot recover, because of her contributory negligence, where, although she knew they were approaching a crossing, and, being upon the front seat, was in a position to observe and warn the driver of danger, she did not look for approaching trains, and only saw the train when they struck it. Hall v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. (1917) 156 C. C. A. 532, 244 Fed. 104, 16 N. C. C. A. 110.

And the failure of a passenger in an automobile stalled on an interurban railroad track to get out of the automobile before it was struck by a car is contributory negligence as matter of law, where there was ample opportunity for her to do so, and this is so, even though she thought that the driver, who was trying to start the automobile, would succeed and drive it out of danger before it would be struck by the car. Krouse v. Southern Michigan R. Co. (1921) — Mich. —, 183 N. W. 768.

But in McDonald v. Mesaba R. Co. (1917) 137 Minn. 275, 163 N. W. 298, where a passenger in an auto bus was injured when it collided with an electric trolley car, it was held that the evidence did not sustain a finding of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, or justify the submission of her negligence to the jury, where the plaintiff was not negligent in taking passage in the bus, and was not wanting in care in what she did or failed to do at the precise moment of the collision, was sitting inside of a closed bus which made it difficult and impracticable for her to maintain a lookout, and had no reason for mistrusting the skill or diligence of the driver, and there was no apparent need of her supervising the conduct of the driver, or disturbing him with suggestions or warnings, and she had no notice of impending danger.

Question of fact.

In Bradley v. Interurban R. Co. (1921) — Iowa, —, 183 N. W. 493, where a passenger in an automobile was injured in a collision with an interurban car, it was held that such a passenger is not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence, as matter of law, if he fails to see an impending danger in time to interfere and prevent it, and that ordinarily it is a question for the jury what constitutes reasonable care in such an emergency.

The contributory negligence of one injured by a collision between an interurban car and the automobile in which he was riding, and which was driven by another whose negligence was not imputable to him, has been held to be a question of fact in the following circumstances:

—where plaintiff was riding as a passive guest in the rear seat of an automobile which had the top up and the doors closed, Marion & B. Trac-tion Co. v. Reese (1919) — Ind. App. —, 124 N. E. 500; Marion & B. Trac-tion Co. v. Umphress (1920) — Ind. App. —, 127 N. E. 568;

—where plaintiff had no acquaint-ance with the crossing, or its surroundings, and did not know of its existence until just as the car reached the track, and was riding in the mid-dle of the car, so that his view to the front was necessarily obscured by the driver and another person sitting in front, and he discovered the crossing as he approached it closely, and al-most simultaneously caught sight of the interurban car, and immediately gave an outcry, Bradley v. Interurban R. Co. (1921) — Iowa, —, 183 N. W. 493;

—where plaintiff, on approaching the crossing, looked in both directions for approaching cars, and the car which struck the auto was not in sight when the auto stalled upon the tracks, and about half a minute later, while the plaintiff was endeavoring to unfasten the curtains and open the door of the automobile to get out, the interurban car struck the automo-bile, Fontana v. Ft. Dodge, D. M. & S. R. Co. (1917) 180 Iowa, 1183, 162 N. W. 777;

—where plaintiff was a grand-mother, and was holding a six-weeks-old baby in her arms, and sitting be-tween two other women in the rear seat of an automobile owned and op-erated by her husband, who had been driving a car for ten or twelve years, and who, she thought, was a perfect-ly capable driver, Corn v. Kansas City, C. C. & St. J. R. Co. (1920) — Mo. —, 228 S. W. 78.

It was held in Indiana Union Trac-tion Co. v. Love (1912) 180 Ind. 442, 99 N. E. 1005, that whether a pas-senger was negligent in remaining in the automobile, and not jumping therefrom as it proceeded to cross a railroad track in front of an ap-proaching interurban car, was a ques-tion for the jury under the rule that one in a position of peril not created by his own negligence has a right to make a choice of means to be used to avoid peril, and is not held to a strict accountability if he takes an unwise course. It was unsuccessfully contended in this case that the trial court erred in overruling a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that contributory negligence was affirma-tively shown by the allegations of the complaint, which alleged that the plaintiff, as they approached the crossing, looked and listened for approaching cars; that she did not see or hear any until just before the auto went upon the tracks, and that she, together with the other guests in the automobile, then called to the driver to stop the machine, but that he continued to go upon the tracks; that, after this car had passed, the driver turned on the power and started the automobile, and the plaintiff looked and listened for approaching cars upon both tracks, but saw or heard none until just as the driver started the automobile, when she saw a car coming from the opposite direction, the view in which direction had before been obstructed, and called to the driver, endeavoring to have him stop the automobile before going upon the second track; that it was impossible for the plaintiff to jump from the machine at the time without being threatened with instant death, and that she remained in the automobile when it went upon the second track and was struck.

And where a jury, in answer to special questions, found that the plaintiff could have seen the approaching interurban car; which struck the automobile, at 132 feet, and at 82 feet from the crossing, in time to warn the driver, but answered, "Can't say," and "Doubtful," in response to similar questions as to her range of vision at 15 feet, 25 feet, and 30 feet from the crossing, such findings, construed together, do not establish her contributory negligence as a matter of law, and a general verdict, which is consistent with such findings, must stand. Schaefer v. Arkansas Valley Interurban R. Co. (1919) 104 Kan. 394, 179 Pac. 323, rehearing denied in (1919) 104 Kan. 740, 181 Pac. 118. In this case the court said: "Was the deceased guilty of contributory negligence? Ordinarily, that, too, is a jury question. The court cannot say as a matter of law that because the deceased could have seen the trolley car while she was 132 feet from the crossing, and while she was 82 feet from the crossing, and failed to warn the driver, she was guilty of contributory negligence. Nor does the fact that she could have seen the trolley car at 11 feet from the track, and that the Ford car could have been stopped in 4 feet, make out a case of contributory negligence against the woman. It would take some slight interval of time, after getting within 11 feet of the track, to see the car, to recognize the danger, to determine what to do, to warn the driver, for the driver to realize the urgency of immediate action, and for him to stop the car. A jury could fairly conclude that there was insufficient time for such quick sequence of perception, thought, speech, and action."

In United R. & Electric Co. v. Crain (1914) 123 Md. 332, 91 Atl. 405, 10 N. C. C. A. 571, where a passenger in an automobile was injured when it collided with an interurban car, it was held that there was evidence tending to show a want of due care upon his part which should have been submitted to the jury, and that an instruction that there was no evidence legally sufficient to show any negligence upon his part was error, where it appeared that just before the accident the driver told the passengers in the automobile that there was a crossing along there somewhere, but that he did not know just where, and it appeared that there was a line of telegraph poles marking the railroad at its crossing over the highway, which could have been seen by the plaintiff in the automobile some distance from the crossing.

And in holding the contributory negligence of a passenger in an automobile struck by an interurban car to be a question for the jury, the court, in Stem v. Nashville Interurban R. Co. (1919) 142 Tenn. 494, 221 S. W. 192, said: "It is shown in the evidence here that at the time of, and immediately prior to, the collision, the deceased was exercising no care to ascertain the existence of the railway track or the approach of the car. This would, nothing else appearing, preclude any right of recovery by her administrator. There is, however, evidence in the record tending to show that, on account of obstructions along the route traversed by the automobile, to have looked and listened would not have warned her of peril. To look and listen for cars at crossings is a positive, fixed duty, when by such precautions they may be seen or heard, and in such cases a failure of observance will bar recovery. Where, however, in exceptional cases, because of conditions not created by, or under the control of, a traveler, these precautions would not apprise one of danger, their exercise may be excused."

And it was held in Montague v. Salt Lake & U. R. Co. (1918) 52 Utah, 368, 174 Pac. 871, that the question of the contributory negligence of a young girl under seventeen years of age, who was injured in a collision between the automobile in which she was riding and an interurban train at a public crossing, was for the jury, the court saying: "While it is true that it taxes one's credulity somewhat to believe that one riding in the front seat of an automobile, as plaintiff was, with every opportunity to see and hear what was going on around her, neither heard the whistle or noise of the train as it approached the crossing, nor saw the headlight from the train the moment the automobile passed into the open space after passing the barn or stable, . . . yet when her age, her lack of experience, the duty imposed on her by law, and all the other facts and circumstances are considered, the question of whether her conduct and inaction constituted negligence is not so positive and clear that all reasonable men must necessarily arrive at the same conclusion. . . . The question is not so free from doubt as to justify the court to declare her guilty of such negligence, as a matter of law, as will bar a recovery."

In Cowan v. Salt Lake & U. R. Co. (1920) — Utah, —, 189 Pac. 599, where a passenger in an automobile was injured when it was struck at a street crossing by a suburban train, it was held that the negligence of such passenger was a question for the jury, where it appeared that she was twenty years of age, was riding on the rear seat with two others, with a young man sitting on her lap and another young man sitting on the side door of the automobile, that the owner of the automobile was operating it at such a moderate rate of speed as would not cause the plaintiff to anticipate danger, that the plaintiff had only a casual and imperfect acquaintance with the surroundings, the railroad having only been in operation a short time, and that she was not aware that the automobile was approaching any railroad crossing, and did not keep an outlook for a crossing, and heard no signals or noise of the approaching train, and was not aware of any danger until at the very moment the automobile was struck. In this case the court adopted the rule that leaves it to the jury to determine whether, under the circumstances, a passenger in an automobile is justified in trusting his safety to the care of the driver, and not looking and listening for himself at a railroad crossing. The court refused to follow the doctrine, held by a number of the cases, that all occupants of a vehicle are charged with the absolute duty of keeping a lookout for themselves, and to exercise a constant care for their own safety, and thus may not, to any extent, trust to the care and rely upon the vigilance of the driver. The court stated that the cases which support this doctrine are based upon an entirely different rule, respecting the matter of establishing the plaintiff's negligence, from the one prevailing in the jurisdiction of the case at bar, and said in this connection: "In this state negligence is never presumed, and hence the plaintiff is not required to establish his freedom therefrom. The presumption that he is so is in his favor, and unless he makes his negligence apparent in proving his case the burden is upon the defendant to prove plaintiff's negligence. While we have repeatedly held—and such is the rule in this state—that it is the duty of everyone who is about to cross a railroad to exercise ordinary care and vigilance for his own safety, and that he is held responsible for his own negligence in that regard, yet we can conceive of no reason why the question of whether a passenger or an invitee riding in a vehicle was guilty of contributory negligence, in view of all the circumstances which would bar a recovery, should not be left to the jury, unless that question is free from substantial doubt."

And in deciding that a passenger in a wagon struck by an electric interurban car was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, but that his contributory negligence was a question for the jury, the court, in Ilardi v. Central California Traction Co. (1918) 36 Cal. App. 488, 172 Pac. 763, said: "The question here, then, is whether there was any justification for the implied finding of the jury that the deceased was not culpable in that respect. There is no evidence of any overt or affirmative act of negligence on the part of Ilardi, or that he participated in the negligence of Sansone,—assuming the latter to have been guilty of negligence,—by urging him, with knowledge of the near approach of a train, or with knowledge that he (Sansone) had not looked and listened to ascertain whether there was a train near at hand, to proceed on over the crossing. Nor is there any evidence that Sansone was an incompetent or careless driver, or that Ilardi had any reason to suppose that he was not competent to drive the horse properly, or to believe that Sansone was not doing his duty by looking for approaching trains. It is true, if we accept Sansone's testimony as to that matter, that Ilardi said nothing and did nothing, and looked neither to the north nor south before the horse was started by Sansone over the crossing; but this did not constitute negligence per se, or such acts of omission as to justify the conclusion or declaration, as a matter of law, that he failed to use due care for his own safety, since he was a mere guest of Sansone, riding with the latter by his permission and sufferance, and, having no interest in the plans or purposes for which Sansone was then using the horse and vehicle, and was without any right or power to exercise any control over the latter in the management of the vehicle. Moreover, the deceased knew that Sansone, having been accustomed for some time to driving over the Vina Vista crossing, knew as fully or as well as he did that trains passed frequently over the railroad track every day, and as there is, as stated, no evidence that Sansone was ordinarily a careless driver, or did not know how to manage a vehicle drawn by a horse, the deceased had the right to assume that Sansone would exercise reasonable care and caution in making the crossing."

III. As to street cars.

In general.

The failure of a passenger in an automobile struck by a street car to use due care to see or hear the approaching car will not prevent a recovery by her, unless such failure contributes to her injury. Clarke v. Connecticut Co. (1910) 83 Conn. 219, 76 Atl. 523.

And in Labrecque v. Donham (1920) — Mass. —, 127 N. E. 537, where a helper on a motor truck was struck by a street car as he was cranking the truck, which had become stalled on the track, it was held that, if he was intoxicated at the time of the accident, that fact alone would not prevent his recovery, but that if his intoxication contributed to the injury in any degree he could not recover.

Although the fact that one injured while riding in an automobile had employed an unlicensed person to operate it, contrary to the provisions of a statute, will not of itself prevent a recovery by him for injuries received in a collision between the automobile and a street car, it is evidence that the injured person was not in the exercise of due care. Conroy v. Mather (1914) 217 Mass. 91, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 801, 104 N. E. 487.

A plea that the plaintiff, who, while a passenger in an automobile, was injured by a collision with a street car, was guilty of contributory negligence in allowing herself to be driven at a high rate of speed along the street, and in taking no steps to secure a reduction of such speed to a safe rate, was held to be defective in Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Barranco (1920) 203 Ala. 639, 84 So. 839, because it contained no allegation of the plaintiff's knowledge of the excessive speed and of the dangerous situation.

And it was further held in the preceding case that contributory negligence cannot be predicated of an obligation on the part of a passenger to maintain an outlook, in the absence of special circumstances relating to the driver's incompetency, or known disregard of his duty in that connection, that would serve to impose the duty to maintain a lookout upon the passenger.

It was held in Vanek v. Chicago City R. Co. (1918) 210 Ill. App. 148, as stated in the abstract of the decision, that a passenger in an automobile, with which a street car collides, cannot sit inactive when danger is imminent and be regarded as having exercised due care for his own safety.

And in Clarke v. Connecticut Co. (1910) 83 Conn. 219, 76 Atl. 523, where a passenger was injured by the collision of the automobile with a street car, it was held that an instruction which permitted her to recover unless she saw the danger in time to warn the driver thereof, and absolved her from the duty of looking and listening for an approaching car, was erroneous because it did not permit the jury to measure her conduct by the standard of reasonable care.

And it was held in Toledo R. & Light Co. v. Mayers (1916) 93 Ohio. St. 304, 112 N. E. 1014, where the plaintiff was injured as the result of a collision by a street car and the automobile in which he was riding, as a guest, in the front seat with the driver, that, although plaintiff was required to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and reasonably to use his faculties of sight and hearing to observe and avoid the dangers incident to crossing the track, an instruction that he "was not exonerated from any duty at all by reason of the fact that he himself was not driving the machine" was erroneous.

Matter of law.

The failure of one riding, in daylight, on the front seat of a motor vehicle, to see the street car which struck the vehicle, when the street car was within the plain field of his vision for a sufficient period of time to have enabled the driver of the vehicle to have stopped it before the collision, constitutes contributory negligence as matter of law, and the statute creating a presumption of due care upon the part of the person injured did not require the submission of the plaintiff's negligence to the jury. Pigeon v. Massachusetts North Eastern Street R. Co. (1918) 230 Mass. 392, 119 N. E. 762.

One injured in a collision with a street car, while riding in an automobile driven by another with whose negligence he is not chargeable, has been held to be guilty of negligence as a matter of law in the following circumstances:

— where plaintiff was sitting on the front seat with the driver, with nothing to obstruct her view as she approached the street intersection at which the collision occurred, in a vicinity with which she was well acquainted, and, although she could have seen the street car coming, she did not look, and did not warn the driver, or object to his attempt to cross the tracks, because she had been with him before over the same route, and never gave it a thought, but relied implicitly upon the driver, and took no precautions to see for herself that a street car was coming, and did not notice the car until the driver called her attention to it when the auto had crossed one rail of the track, Leapard v. Kansas City R. Co. (1919) — Mo. App. —, 214 S. W. 268;

— where a woman of mature years failed to look out for approaching cars, on crossing street car tracks, when the automobile was going so slowly that, upon a word of caution from her, it could have been stopped, and the accident avoided. Pouch v. Staten Island Midland R. Co. (1910) 142 App. Div. 16, 126 N. Y. Supp. 738;

—where one riding as a passenger upon the running board of a motor truck failed to look, when, if he had looked; he could have seen the street car approaching in ample time to have stepped off the running board and saved himself from injury, Gilbert v. Kansas City R. Co. (1921) — Kan. —, 197 Pac. 872. And it was further held in this case that, as the plaintiff was in a better position than the driver to see approaching cars, he was required to look and listen for an approaching street car as much as the driver, and that, if he had discovered the approaching street car which collided with the auto, it would have been his duty to have warned the driver thereof;

—where plaintiff was familiar with the locality, and sat on the front seat with the driver, and had the same opportunity of seeing the dangers, and the accident occurred in the evening when it was dark, and both the plaintiff and the driver saw the headlight of a car half a mile away, and discussed the matter, and concluded that they had plenty of time to cross the tracks ahead of the car, and, as they approached the tracks, the plaintiff made no request of the driver to stop and let him out of the automobile, and did not object to the attempt to cross the track ahead of the car, and therefore must have consented to test the danger, whatever it might be, Farquhar v. Webster, M. B. & F. City Street R. Co. (1912) 50 Pa. Super. Ct. 536;

—where, knowing that the automobile, after passing a street car going in the same direction, was being turned to cross the tracks in the middle of a block, plaintiff, who could have seen the car which struck the automobile coming from the opposite direction, if she had looked, paid no attention whatever, Carden v. Chicago R. Co. (1918) 210 Ill. App. 155;

—where a passenger in an automobile which was being raced against a street car, and which crossed in front of it and was struck by it, participated in the racing in violation of the speed law, which was the contributing cause of the collision, and knew that the car was following the automobile, and could have seen it as the automobile was directed across the tracks, Fair v. Union Traction Co. (1918) 102 Kan. 611, 171 Pac. 649;

—where a passenger in an automobile, stalled at night so close to a street railroad track that a street car could not pass without striking it, saw a street car approaching from behind at a distance of about 700 feet, and called her husband's attention to it, he being the driver of the automobile, but continued in her seat, and, when the street car was 100 feet away, signaled to it to stop, and, although she had plenty of time when she first saw the street car to get out of the automobile, did not do so because she thought the motorman would see the automobile and stop, Lawrence v. Fitchburg & L. Street R. Co. (1909) 201 Mass. 489, 87 N. E. 898;

—where the machinery of an automobile got out of order, causing it to stop on one of the tracks of a street railroad company, upon a foggy and very dark night, and, after nearly an hour's effort to push the automobile off the track, the chauffeur, remembering that a car was about due, went back along the track some distance for the purpose of stopping it, but, after making all proper efforts to do so, failed, and during this time the plaintiff got out of the automobile, but went back into it, although she knew it was still upon the street railway tracks, and was injured when the automobile was struck by the car, Coleman v. Pittsburgh, H. B. & N. C. Street R. Co. (1916) 251 Pa. 498, 96 Atl. 1051.

It was held in Dunlap v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. (1915) 248 Pa. 180, 93 Atl. 873, that the plaintiff, injured when the automobile in which he was riding collided with a street car, was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where it appeared that he, though familiar with the neighborhood, and though seeing the car tracks and being aware that a car might pass at any moment, made no effort to see if any car was coming. It further appeared in this case that the plaintiff was riding with the constable, as his deputy, for the purpose of making a distress for rent, and the court said that the plaintiff should be held to a somewhat higher degree of duty than a passenger for hire would be held; that the driver and the plaintiff were engaged in a common purpose, and had a common object in view,—that of transacting business in which both were interested,—and that, while the driver's negligence should not be imputed to the plaintiff, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to exercise proper care, and not to sit quietly by and fail to see danger that was plainly imminent.

And the same holding was made in Laudenberger v. Easton Transit Co. (1918) 261 Pa. 288, 104 Atl. 588, following Dunlap v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. (Pa.) supra, the court saying that no distinction could be made between the two cases.

And in Fredericks v. Chicago R. Co. (1917) 208 Ill. App. 172, where a passenger in the rear seat of an automobile was injured when it was struck by a street car, the court held correct an instruction to the effect that if the plaintiff knew, or, by the exercise of ordinary care and caution, could have known, of the approach of the car, and, notwithstanding, rode upon the street car track and was thereby injured, and that in so doing he failed to exercise ordinary care and caution for his own safety just before and at the time of the alleged accident, which failure approximately contributed to and caused the injury, he was guilty of contributory negligence; and upheld also an instruction to the effect that if the plaintiff, by using his faculties with ordinary and reasonable care, looking out for danger, could have avoided the accident, and if he negligently failed to do so, and such negligence caused or proximately contributed to the injury, the plaintiff could not recover.

One who, seated upon the front seat of a wagon with the driver, in approaching street car tracks, does not look up or down for approaching cars, and pays no attention to the cars, is guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Caminez v. Brooklyn, Q. C. & S. R. Co. (1908) 127 App. Div. 138, 111 N. Y. Supp. 384.

And the failure of a person riding upon a wagon to look and listen before crossing street railway tracks was held in Dummer v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. (1901) 108 Wis. 589, 84 N. W. 853, to make him guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. This holding, the court said, was necessitated by the legal proposition stated in the following words: "Whatever difference of opinion there may be upon the subject as an original proposition, it is now firmly settled as a part of the law of this state that it is the duty of a person approaching the track of an electric street railway, whether he be walking or riding in a vehicle, to look and listen for approaching cars; and that if he fails to do so, and is injured by a car while crossing the track, he is guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law."

And in Kirschbaum v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. (1920) 73 Pa. Super. Ct. 536, where one riding upon a wagon which his coemployee was driving saw, at the same time as the driver, a street car approaching about 75 feet away, and did not say or do anything to prevent his fellow employee from driving in front of the approaching car, it was held that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, because he joined with the driver in testing the danger, which was patent to them both.

And it was held in Anderson v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1899) 30 Misc. 104, 61 N. Y. Supp. 899, that there was no basis for a finding by the jury that the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, where it appeared that he was a helper, sitting upon the front seat of a wagon which was slowly approaching a street railway crossing, and that, when near the track, he saw a rapidly approaching car about 30 feet away, and did not ask the driver to stop or alter his course, or attempt to jump from the wagon.

ty Power & Light Co. (1920) 119 Me. 588, 109 Atl. 487, where a passenger in an auto truck was injured when it was struck by a street car when the driver, preparatory to turning around, backed the truck upon, or so near to, the street car tracks that the truck was struck by a passing electric car, it was held that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, because his own testimony indisputably proved that he made no effort whatever to ascertain whether a car was approaching when the course of the truck was changed, and that, had he used the diligence of an ordinarily prudent man for his own safety, he would have discovered the peril and avoided it.

And in Miller v. Ft. Smith Light & Traction Co. (1918) 136 Ark. 272, 206 S. W. 329, where a wife, while riding in her husband's automobile, was injured by its collision with a street car, an instruction that, situated as she was on the seat beside the driver, she had no right to rely implicitly upon his care and prudence for her own safety, but it was her duty, if the driver was approaching at a careless rate of speed the street on which the street cars were passing, to attempt to have him check his speed to a safe rate, and that, if she failed to do so and her failure contributed to the collision, she could not recover, was objected to upon the ground that there was no evidence that the plaintiff was on the seat with her husband, the driver, when the automobile collided with the street car, and the court said, in overruling this objection, that, while it was true that there was no direct testimony to that effect, there was evidence from which it could be inferred; and the court further said that the instruction dealt with a phase of the law that was proper to be submitted to the jury under the circumstances, and that this was so without regard to the fact whether the plaintiff was sitting on the front or the back seat of the automobile.

One riding upon a wagon, seated beside the driver, has no right to rely implicitly upon the care and prudence of the driver in approaching street car tracks, but it is his duty, if the driver is approaching such tracks at a careless rate of speed, to attempt to have him check his speed to a safe rate, and such passenger, if he makes no effort to have the driver diminish the speed, and his failure to do so contributes directly to a collision between the wagon and a street car, cannot recover for his injuries, since he is guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Holden v. Missouri R. Co. (1903) 177 Mo. 456, 76 S. W. 973.

And the failure of a passenger sitting on the seat with the driver to warn the latter of the approach of a street car which struck the wagon, where the passenger saw the car approaching nearly half a square away, constitutes contributory negligence as matter of law. Cincinnati Traction Co. v. Sanders (1909) 32 Ohio C. C. 413.

But a passenger in the rear seat of an automobile is not guilty of contributory negligence because of her failure to jump therefrom upon seeing a rapidly approaching street car about 50 feet away, with which the automobile almost instantly collided, or because of her failure to direct the movements of the driver. Burke v. Anacostia & P. R. Co. (1919) 48 App. D. C. 296. In this case the court said: "Plaintiff's own conduct discloses no want of proper care for her safety. What could she have done under the circumstances to protect herself? The law did not require her to jump from the automobile. If she did, her injuries would, in all probability, have been more serious than they were. If she sought to direct her son, her efforts, no doubt, would have been more confusing than otherwise. He was compelled to act on the spur of the moment, and it would have been impossible for her to have influenced his action for her safety under the circumstances. Besides, it is a matter of common knowledge among those familiar with the handling of automobiles in motion that 'driving from the back seat' is extremely dangerous. We can perceive nothing in the evidence on which the jury could have predicated negligence on plaintiff's part, and therefore we think the court erred in submitting the question to the jury."

A passenger is not guilty of a want of ordinary care in taking no active steps to prevent the driver from crossing the tracks in front of a street car, where the driver, confronted with the same conditions, is held to be in the exercise of due care in so crossing. Lindquist v. Duluth Street R. Co. (1921) — Wis. —, 184 N. W. 690.

And in Rogers v. Portland R. Light & P. Co. (1913) 66 Or. 244, 184 Pac. 9, where a passenger in an automobile was injured as a result of its collision with a street car at a street intersection, the court, in reference to the plaintiff's contributory negligence, said: "There was absolutely nothing in the testimony to justify any instruction as to plaintiff's contributory negligence. She had no control or authority over the driver, but was merely a guest, and, as any woman under the same circumstances would have done, she relied upon her escort to look out for her safety. She was not charged with the duty of looking out for possible dangers. If a possible danger was called to her attention, and she realized it, it was her duty to call the attention of her escort to it; and this she did. When she saw a car coming she called his attention to it. Had she assumed the task of looking out for cars, the case might have been different; but such duty had not been committed to her, and she had not assumed it. There is nothing to indicate that she acted differently from any other woman under the same circumstances."

And in Hunter v. Saskatoon (1919) 12 Sask. L. R. 354, 48 D. L. R. 68, where a passenger occupied the front seat of an automobile in order to show the driver the way to his house, and was injured when the automobile struck a street car, it was held that the jury were not justified in finding that he was guilty of contributory negligence in that he failed to warn the driver that he was approaching a street car line, since, as the passenger was under no obligation to point out to the driver dangers on the route which would be apparent to any reasonably careful driver, the failure of the passenger to warn the driver that he was approaching a street car line could not constitute contributory negligence; and the court directed that the judgment below in favor of the defendant should be set aside, and judgment entered for the plaintiff. The court said: "The jury found the deceased negligent in that he omitted to warn the driver that he was approaching a street car line. It is frankly admitted that he gave no such warning. Was there any duty on his part so to do? In my opinion there was not. Where one person undertakes to show the way to another, his obligation is, prima facie, limited to directing him along what streets he should proceed and what turnings he should take. He is not ordinarily under obligation to point out obstacles or dangers on the route which would be apparent to any reasonably careful driver. Of course, if a man intrusts himself to the control of a driver who, to his knowledge, is blind or incompetent, he cannot, if he is injured as a result of such blindness or incompetence, be heard to say that he did not contribute to his own injury. But here the driver of the automobile was competent; he had possession of all his faculties; he could have avoided the accident had he been looking ahead. The deceased was, in my opinion, entitled to assume that in driving the automobile he would use due care."

And where a passenger in a buggy driven along a highway parallel with the street railroad tracks and at a safe distance therefrom, sits in the buggy without fear, and apparently without thought, of any danger in so driving along the highway, and is thrown out and injured upon the buggy being upset, when the horse nearest to the tracks is crowded over by the other horse, upon its becoming suddenly frightened, so as to be struck by a street car approaching from the rear, such passenger is, as matter of law, not guilty of contributory negligence, and the question of her negligence should not be submitted to the jury. Atwood v. Utah Light & R. Co. (1914) 44 Utah, 366, 140 Pac. 137.

The mere failure of a guest to look and listen for approaching cars before the vehicle in which he is riding is driven across street railway tracks by one with whose negligence he was not chargeable has been held not to constitute contributory negligence, as a matter of law, upon the part of such guest, in the following circumstances:

— where a woman was riding on the front seat of a motor truck with her husband, Colorado Springs & Interurban R. Co. v. Cohun (1919) 66 Colo. 149, 180 Pac. 307. The court said: "Was plaintiff herself guilty of negligence? She took no care, did not look, and did not see the car at all, though she might have done so, and it is insisted that she ought to have looked and listened, and warned her husband. It was her duty to exercise that kind and degree of care that a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under like circumstances, and the court, in instructions 13 and 14, so instructed the jury. The questions, then, for decision, concerning her contributory negligence, were: First, how a woman of ordinary prudence would behave, situated as plaintiff was. Second, Did plaintiff so behave? These questions are ordinarily for the jury, and the courts cannot interfere unless the jury's answer is so manifestly wrong as not reasonably to be the subject of dispute. Since plaintiff's negligence, if any, was failure to look or listen, and since her conduct in this respect is undisputed, the jury by their verdict for plaintiff necessarily decided that a woman of ordinary prudence in like circumstances would not have looked or listened. We are now asked to say that the verdict was wrong because her conduct was negligent as a matter of law, which would be equivalent to saying that a woman of ordinary prudence, under the same circumstances, would have looked or listened, and that that proposition is so manifest as not reasonably to be a subject of dispute. This we cannot say;"

— where one riding in a wagon, with his back toward the approaching car which struck the wagon at a street intersection, did not do anything to stop the team, and the evidence was conflicting as to the speed of the car and how far it was from the team at the time the motorman discovered them on the track, Chickasha Street R. Co. v. Marshall (1914) 43 Okla. 192, 141 Pac. 1172;

— where a boy of fifteen, a helper upon a grocery delivery wagon, was riding rapidly down a short runway from a livery stable to the street, but had never been at the livery stable before, and had no means of knowing that the driver would proceed rapidly down the runway, and the distance was so short that he had no opportunity either to warn the driver, or to save himself from the collision with the street car, Ebert v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1913) 174 Mo. App. 45, 160 S. W. 84. The court held applicable to the case the doctrine that if a person riding with another has no ground to suspect incompetency or to anticipate negligence on the part of the driver, and the impending danger is so sudden, or of such a character, as not to require or permit any act on the part of the passenger for his own safety, he may recover;

— where a woman was riding in a one-seated sleigh, with her husband, who was an experienced and competent driver and was familiar with the running of the street cars over the route on which the collision occurred, and she relied entirely upon his watchfulness, Denis v. Lewiston, B. & B. Street R. Co. (1908) 104 Me. 39, 70 Atl. 1047. It was held in this case that the jury did not commit manifest error in finding that the plaintiff was not chargeable with contributory negligence, and a verdict in her favor was sustained;

— where the plaintiff was injured while riding in a carriage with his brother, whom he knew to be a skilful and experienced driver, who had for many years been traveling the street of the accident in a vehicle similar to that in which the accident happened, and he saw his brother check his horse as they approached the street crossing, and lean forward beyond the side curtains of the carriage, and look and listen, and then proceed to make the crossing, and from the position in which plaintiff sat he could not have seen the car through the small light in the curtain of the carriage, and, even if he had been warned of the approach of the street car, could not have escaped from the carriage in time to save himself, United R. & Electric Co. v. Biedler (1904) 98 Md. 564, 56 Atl. 813, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 338;

— where the driver looked and saw no street car approaching, and his view was much better than that of the plaintiff, who sat in the rear seat of the auto, and whose view was necessarily obstructed, Moody v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. (1920) 173 Wis. 65, 180 N. W. 266. The court held that her failure to look, if she did not look, could not be said, as a matter of law, to have proximately contributed to the accident and injury.

It was held in Wosika v. St. Paul City R. Co. (1900) 80 Minn. 364, 88 N. W. 386, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 72, that the negligence of a passenger sitting upon the rear seat of a wagon which was struck by a street car, although she did not look for approaching cars as the team turned upon the track, is a question for the jury, under the doctrine of Howe v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (1895) 62 Minn. 71, 30 L.R.A. 684, 54 Am. St. Rep. 616, 64 N. W. 102, under "Question of fact," supra, II. a.

And it was held in Zalotuchin v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1907) 127 Mo. App. 577, 106 S. W. 548, that a girl not over sixteen years of age, seated on a box placed behind the seat of a wagon, driven by her stepfather, with her face towards the rear, was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, so as to prevent her recovery for damages from the collision of the wagon with a street car, under the rule that, if a person riding in a vehicle knows that the driver is negligent and takes no precaution to guard against injuries, he cannot recover, the court saying: "Whether plaintiff looked while the vehicle was in a place of safety, saw the car approaching, and failed to warn her stepfather, or did not look at all in the direction from which the car approached until she had reached a dangerous position, her conduct would have been a subject for the jury to classify. . . . On account of her minority, her actions should not be measured in law by the standard to be applied to persons of mature years. As a general rule, the characterization of the conduct of a minor is regarded as an issue for the triers of fact to solve, and we perceive no reason for making of the present case an exception to that rule. The acts of plaintiff were not so glaringly negligent as to compel us to say that reasonable minds could not differ with respect to them. Considering her position in the wagon and the further fact that, being a mere child, she naturally would rely greatly on the watchfulness and discretion of her mother and stepfather, whose opportunities to judge of the risk involved in attempting the crossing were better than her own, it is a fair inference to say that she acted in a manner to be expected of a person of her age and apparent intelligence."

And in Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Johnson (1904) 163 Ind. 518, 72 N. E. 571, where a woman riding in a buggy with her husband was injured when the buggy, which was traveling partly on the street car tracks, was run into by a street car from the rear, it was held that it could not be said, as a matter of law, that she was guilty of contributory negligence, where it appeared that, while they were passing along the street prior to the accident, she did not look to the rear to discover whether a car was approaching from that direction, and that she made no effort, after the buggy turned into the street on which the street car tracks were located, to ascertain the location of the car coming from the rear, but that she heard it approaching, and gave her husband some warning to the effect that they were in danger by reason of its approach.

It was contended in Pine Bluff Co. v. Whitlaw (1921) 147 Ark. 152, 227 S. W. 13, that the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as would defeat a recovery by her, because the evidence showed that she could have seen the street car approaching in time to have notified the driver of the danger therefrom, and it was her duty to have done so, but the court held that her contributory negligence was for the jury, because there was evidence that she had known the driver for many years, and considered him a careful driver, and that he was accustomed to driving about the streets of the town, where he must, of necessity, have frequently crossed the street car tracks, and she testified that she did not see the street car until the automobile gave a jerk when the driver increased the speed in order to cross the track ahead of it.

And it was held in the case of Fujise v. Los Angeles R. Co. (1909) 12 Cal. App. 207, 107 Pac. 317, that it could not be said as a matter of law that the failure of the deceased to look to ascertain the position of the street car before turning across the tracks was contributory negligence, where the street car approached and overtook the express wagon upon which she was riding from the rear, and struck it, causing her death. The court said in this connection that the deceased must be presumed from her residence in another place to have been less familiar with the congested condition of the business streets of the city where the accident happened, and of the effect thereof, than a public express driver, and that in the absence of some unusual peril, apparent to her and not to him, or to which they were equal strangers, it would be presumed that she pursued the safer plan in letting the driver take care of his own horse.

In Salisbury v. Boston Elev. R. Co. (1921) — Mass. —, 132 N. E. 239, where one riding in an automobile was injured when it was struck by a street car at a street intersection, it was held that the contributory negligence of the passenger was a question for the jury, where it appeared that he was seated with the driver on the side opposite from that in which the car that struck the automobile came, that, when 50 feet from the crossing, he looked in the direction in which the car came, and no car was in sight, that the accident occurred within five seconds thereafter, and that he did not see the car until the auto was upon the tracks. It was strongly argued that the plaintiff should have looked again when he reached the curb line of the street intersection, but the court said that that was a question for the jury to determine as a question of fact, and further said that the plaintiff might well trust something to the expectation that the driver would act with due regard for their safety, and might assume that an electric car would not approach an intersecting street at the rapid speed at which it was going, without giving any warning of its approach.

One riding in a buggy which was struck by a street car cannot be said to be guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law where, upon the driver's stopping the horse at the nearest track, the passenger looked and listened for approaching cars, and saw or heard none, and the driver then proceeded to walk the horse across the tracks. Stussy v. Kansas City R. Co. (1921) — Mo. App. —, 228 S. W. 531.

And in Byerley v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1913) 172 Mo. App. 470, 158 S. W. 413, where a woman riding upon the front seat of an automobile, with her husband driving, was injured when it was struck by a street car, it was held that plaintiff, having looked, as the automobile turned to cross the tracks, toward the direction from which the car came, and not seeing it, could not be charged with contributory negligence as matter of law because she did not keep her eyes in that direction, but allowed the automobile to start across while she looked in the opposite direction for a moment, and where it appeared that when she looked again in the first direction the street car, because of its excessive speed, struck the automobile before it could be stopped, although it was stopped within its own length. The court said that it did not mean that, if plaintiff saw, or should have seen, the street car coming, and undertook to cross in front of it, miscalculating its distance and speed and the time it would take to cross with the automobile, she could recover.

One injured when a street car struck the rear end of a delivery sled upon which he was riding cannot be said to have been guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where it appeared that he saw the street car as soon as there was any necessity of observation, that he thought that there was sufficient time to pass over the tracks before the car came to the crossing, and that this belief was one which a reasonably prudent man might have entertained, and that the horse was driven in a reasonable manner, and not suddenly upon the tracks in front of the approaching street car. Bombard v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. (1919) 234 Mass. 1, 124 N. E. 434.

And in Davis v. City Light & Traction Co. (1920) 204 Mo. App. 174, 222 S. W. 884, when the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding reached a street intersection, the driver saw a street car coming, and undertook to stop, but, because of something wrong with the engine, was unable to do so, and the street car collided with the automobile, and it was held that the plaintiff, though he did not look in the direction of the street car until a moment before the collision, was not guilty of such contributory negligence as would defeat an action for his injury, because his negligence did not contribute to the injury, the court saying in this connection: "If plaintiff had been on the lookout and had seen the car approaching, he could have done but two things—one to have warned the driver, and the other to have jumped out. Warning the driver would have been wholly useless, since the latter was aware of the car, and was using his every endeavor to stop, but failed without fault of anyone, if the evidence in his behalf is to be believed. His failure to open the door of the auto and jump out was not such an omission, in the circumstances, as to constitute negligence, as a matter of law. The top of the auto was up. Plaintiff was sixty-eight years old, and consequently not so agile as a younger person. But more than that, if he had observed the driver at all, he saw he was trying to stop."

And it was held in Bailey v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. (1917) 228 Mass. 477, 117 N. E. 824, 18 N. C. C. A. 62, a case of a collision between an automobile and a street car, that the due care of the plaintiff was plainly for the jury, regardless of a statutory presumption of due care in his favor, where he did all that reasonably could be expected of an invited guest in the way of looking out for his own safety.

The contributory negligence of one injured by a collision with a street car, while riding in an automobile driven by another whose negligence was not imputable to him, has been held to be a question of fact under the following circumstances:

— where plaintiff was seated upon the left side of the driver,—the side from which the street car approached,—with a clear view of the street car track for more than half a mile from a point 35 feet from the track until the automobile reached the track, and they were alone in the automobile and not at the time engaged in conversation, and there was disputed evidence to the effect that the automobile was going at a speed of not more than from 4 to 6 miles an hour, and that the motorman sounded his gong as he approached the crossing, and that the plaintiff looked and listened for the approaching car, Clarke v. Connecticut Co. (1910) 83 Conn. 219, 76 Atl. 523;

— where plaintiff, a young girl of fourteen, just prior to reaching the tracks, suggested to the driver to be careful as they were approaching a street railroad, whereupon he reduced the speed of the automobile, and she looked and listened for the approach of cars, but could not see the car which struck the automobile, because of an abrupt curve of the tracks, of which curve she was unaware, Turney v. United R. Co. (1911) 155 Mo. App. 513, 135 S. W. 93;

— where plaintiff occupied the rear seat of the automobile, which stopped on approaching a street car track, in order to let a street car go by, and after the car went by the plaintiff looked and saw no car coming, although she could see far enough to have observed the car in ample time to have avoided the accident, if it had not been going at an excessive rate of speed, Ziegler v. United R. Co. (1920) — Mo. App. — 220 S. W. 1016;

— where the plaintiff was well acquainted with the general character of the crossing, the location of the track, and the trolley time schedule, and, when they were drawing near, looked for cars, and saw the car at the first possible moment, when the automobile was about 30 feet and the car at least 70 feet from the place of collision, and the plaintiff at once made an outcry, exclaiming "Oh, the car!" and this was all she did to avoid the accident, MINNICH v. EASTON TRANSIT CO. (reported herewith) ante, 296;

— where a passenger in an automobile was injured when it was struck on a narrow bridge as the driver attempted to pass a street car, which he was following, by turning out in the direction required by statute, and in the only direction in which the width of the bridge afforded room for him to pass, and the passenger failed to warn him against doing so, Chadbourn v. Springfield Street R. Co. (1908) 199 Mass. 574, 85 N. E. 737;

— where plaintiff heard the car coming very fast as the automobile was about to cross the tracks, but made no attempt to notify the driver of such fact, Christison v. St. Paul City R. Co. (1917) 138 Minn. 456, 165 N. W. 273;

— where the automobile was being driven by a competent chauffeur, and plaintiff was seated on the rear seat with the side curtains up, and with her host and hostess on either side of her, and other occupants of the car in front of her, and had never driven on the street on which the accident happened, and was not acquainted with that part of the city, and did not know where she was, or that she was approaching a street car track, and where her failure to warn the driver could have no effect, since he saw the car before she did, and knew of its presence, but was not aware of its excessive speed, and when the plaintiff saw the car it was only a few feet away and too late for her to do anything, Beall v. Kansas City R. Co. (1920) — Mo. App. —, 228 S. W. 834. It was held that under these circumstances the court could not apply to the plaintiff the rule that if one who is riding in an automobile is where he can see the danger, or is aware of it, and therefore has opportunity to do something to avert it, either by warning the driver or otherwise, he must act, and if he takes no precautions whatever he will be guilty of contributory negligence;

— where plaintiff was a passenger in an inclosed public taxicab, with no means of communication with the driver, and did not know of his intention to back upon street car tracks, and thereby place her in danger of collision, Kackley v. Central Illinois Traction Co. (1916) 201 Ill. App. 164;

— where plaintiff was riding in a disabled automobile which was being towed by an auto truck, McLaughlin v. Pittsburgh R. Co. (1916) 252 Pa. 32, 97 Atl. 107. The court said: "Was it in accordance with the dictates of common prudence for plaintiff to remain in a disabled automobile, while it was being towed by a rope through the traffic of a public highway? Did she exercise reasonable care for her own safety in committing herself, under the circumstances, to the care of a strange driver, with whom, owing to the distance at which he sat, and the noise of the machinery, it was difficult to communicate? Were the conditions under which she rode of such a character as to constitute a patent danger which she voluntarily joined in testing? Had she knowledge of the danger involved in turning across the tracks in front of the street car, and time in which to make protest against the action of the driver in turning into danger, or was the danger not so apparent, or so serious, as to call upon her to exercise her own judgment in any way for her own protection? These were matters for the jury to decide, upon their view of what was required of plaintiff in the exercise of prudence and reasonable care for her own safety, under the circumstances shown by the evidence;"

— where a salesman was delivering goods to customers upon a motor truck, and was seated upon the driver's seat, and saw the street car approaching before the truck had entered the danger zone, and could have insisted upon its being stopped before reaching the crossing, or could have requested the driver to slow down and avoid reaching the point where a collision was possible, but was engaged at the time in covering the goods with tarpaulin, and, as soon as he observed the danger after the driver had jumped from the truck, he caught hold of the steering wheel and endeavored to turn the automobile to avoid a collision with the street car, Stoker v. Tri-City R. Co. (1917) 182 Iowa, 1090, L.R.A. 1918F, 515, 165 N. W. 30;

—where the automobile, after following a street car, turned onto the other track and ran parallel with the car for a distance until the driver, upon seeing a car approaching on the track upon which he was running, drove in front of the first car, and, after proceeding for a short distance, was run into by it, and plaintiff said or did nothing, except that, in response to an inquiry of the driver beside whom he sat as to whether the track upon which he was going to turn in order to avoid the car he was following was clear, looked, and said that it was, and that there was not a car or anything in sight, Wilson v. Puget Sound Electric R. Co. (1909) 52 Wash. 522, 132 Am. St. Rep. 1044, 101 Pac. 50. The court said: "No negligent act of the deceased, either of omission or commission, is disclosed by the evidence. He did nothing and said nothing except to answer a question asked him by the driver. It is a well-known fact that an automobile is an intricate machine, and one which requires skill to operate. The deceased had a right to assume that the driver was competent, that he knew the capacity of his machine, and that he would not put it in a perilous position. If the machine was running at 12 or 15 miles an hour, as testified by the driver, and the car at 8 miles an hour, as testified by the motorman, when the driver started to go onto the west track, the act would not have appeared hazardous to a reasonable man. If, however, the south-bound car was traveling at a speed of 40 miles an hour, and the north-bound car at 30 miles an hour, the situation was serious when the north-bound car was observed, and it would not appear, to one who is not skilled in the operation of a machine, how any advice from a passenger to the driver under such circumstances could aid the latter in any way. It would seem that any interference, or attempted assistance, on the part of the passenger, would have tended to disconcert rather than to aid the driver;"

—where plaintiff remained in an automobile standing on the street car tracks on the side of the street to allow passengers to alight, after she saw a street car approaching from the rear, until it was too late to escape injury, where another passenger of the automobile had gone back to stop the street car, Fitch v. Bay State Street R. Co. (1921) 237 Mass. 65, 15 A.L.R. 234, 129 N. E. 423;

—where the automobile was stalled upon a street car track within full view of an approaching car about a block away, and plaintiff, who saw the car which the driver of the automobile had gone back to flag, failed to jump from the automobile until the street car had come within 12 feet of it, when she realized that the car was not going to stop, Hensley v. Kansas City R. Co. (1919) — Mo. App. —, 214 S. W. 287;

—where the plaintiff was one of four persons sitting on a single seat of an automobile, three of such persons sitting on the seat, and the fourth passenger sitting partly on the lap of the plaintiff and partly on the side of the automobile, Washington, B. & A. R. Co. v. State (1920) 136 Md. 103, 111 Atl. 164. It was held that the fact that there were four persons on the one seat in the position described did not constitute contributory negligence, as a matter of law, on the part of the plaintiff, the court saying: "By reason of the position she occupied, it may have been more difficult for her to see whether there was anything in the way, or any car coming, as they approached the crossing. As she was on the left side (the one from which the car came), she probably had a better opportunity to see whether one was coming than the driver had, unless Jockel obstructed her view, when sitting partly on her lap and partly on the side of the automobile. Whether she thus voluntarily put herself in a position that prevented her from seeing or hearing an approaching car, or which interfered with the driver's view, as soon as he might have otherwise seen it, or interfered with his management of the car, were questions to be considered by the jury;"

— where a passenger in an automobile was injured in a collision between it and two street cars passing in opposite directions, Speer v. Southwest Missouri R. Co. (1915) 190 Mo. App. 328, 177 S. W. 329.

While, if a passenger in an automobile is aware that the driver is carelessly rushing into danger, it may be incumbent upon her to take proper steps for her own safety, a passenger cannot be said to be, as matter of law, negligent in failing to call the attention of the chauffeur to the danger of the situation, where it appears that she is a stranger in the place and does not know that the road crosses a railroad track, and is not aware of the approaching car. Thompson v. Los Angeles & S. D. B. R. Co. (1913) 165 Cal. 748, 134 Pac. 709. It was further held in this case that the evidence was not such as to compel the conclusion that the chauffeur was manifestly incompetent and inattentive to his duties to such a degree as would throw upon the plaintiff any greater obligation of watchfulness than that which would otherwise have been incurred, and that, on the point of the chauffeur's apparent competency, it might fairly be said that the jury might, on the evidence, have found either way.

And in Peabody v. Haverhill, G. & D. Street R. Co. (1908) 200 Mass. 277, 85 N. E. 1051, where the plaintiff was riding in a buggy, it was held that the jury had a right to find that she was herself in the exercise of proper care, where it appeared that she was being driven by her son, a young man of about twenty years, that she had no reason to anticipate negligence on his part, and there was evidence that at a suitable place she leaned forward and looked in the direction from which a street car would come, and saw none, and that the jury might find that her failure to see or hear the street car which struck the buggy did not show negligence on her part, because of the obstructions to her view and of the noise of a brook which ran across the street, and because no bell was rung, or other signal given from the car itself, and it was not the regular time for it to pass.

Upon the question of the contributory negligence of a guest in a private carriage, who was injured by collision with a street car, evidence is admissible to show that the driver was habitually careless, and that the guest had knowledge of that fact. Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Co. (1906) 149 Cal. 131, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1059, 85 Pac. 152. The court said in this connection: "The character and habits of the driver of the carriage with respect to similar dangers, if known to the plaintiff, would naturally have some effect on her own conduct, on the particular occasion, in keeping a lookout for the danger herself, in giving him warning, and in enjoining on him a prudent course; and, in order to enable the jury to determine whether or not she exercised ordinary care in that respect, it was proper to give evidence of such character and habits, coupled with proof of knowledge thereof on her part."

And a passenger in a tallyho coach is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to warn the driver of danger, or in not leaping from the coach, where she was riding on the rear seat four seats back of the driver, and did not apprehend any unusual danger until the street car was so near as to have rendered unavailing any warning she might have given the driver, and where the seat on which she was riding was elevated about 7 feet above the ground, so that any attempt by her to leap from her perch might, and probably would, have been more disastrous to her than to retain her position. Denver City

Tramway Co. v. Norton (1905) 73 C. C. A. 1, 141 Fed. 599.

And a finding of a jury that a passenger in an automobile was not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to tell the driver to stop, or to caution him before going upon a street railroad track, should not be set aside, where the driver is competent, and the situation of known peril just before the collision came upon all the occupants of the automobile quickly and unexpectedly, nor should such finding be set aside because of the passenger's failure to step or jump from the automobile just before it was driven upon the track, or at the time the front wheels were on the track, where, in doing so, the passenger would have placed himself in a position of greater danger,—that is, upon the ground between the car rails,—with the possibility of falling immediately in the path of the oncoming electric street car. Hermann v. Rhode Island Co. (1914) 36 R. I. 447, 90 Atl. 813.

In Nichols v. Pacific Electric R. Co. (1918) 178 Cal. 630, 174 Pac. 319, where the street car company claimed that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in riding in the automobile while it was being driven at a dangerous speed, without herself taking any precautions to ascertain whether or not the car was approaching, it was held that the question as to whether or not the plaintiff exercised ordinary care upon approaching the tracks was a question for the jury, the plaintiff having testified that the speed of the automobile was not excessive, and that her first knowledge of the danger of a collision was the fact of the collision.

And it was held in Farrar v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1913) 249 Mo. 210, 155 S. W. 439, 4 N. C. C. A. 377, where one of a number of ladies taking a hay ride in a wagon, who sat upon the side of the wagon with her feet over the side, upon the side of the wagon toward the street car tracks, had her foot crushed between the wagon and a street car which came from behind, it was held that the fact that she remained so seated upon the side of the wagon, as it was driven along, on or near the street car tracks, did not make her guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, but that her negligence was a question for the jury.

It was held in Malone v. Kansas City R. Co. (1921) — Mo. App. —, 232 S. W. 782, that a fireman on a motor fire truck which collided with a street car was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, upon the ground that he knew that there was going to be a collision and made no effort to save himself or avoid the danger, but stood at his post and continued to sound the siren in accordance with his duty, and upon the ground that he could not rely upon the driver of the truck, where it appeared that the plaintiff saw the street car when he was 75 feet from the crossing, the car being at that time about 100 feet away, and that he saw the street car slowing down, and, assuming that it would stop as its duty was under the city ordinance, took his eyes off the car, and continued to sound the siren, and that he did not see the car any more until the truck swerved to the east in an endeavor to avoid the collision, and the plaintiff was thrown under the car and injured.

And in Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baker (1902) 132 Ala. 507, 31 So. 618, where a fireman on a hose cart was injured by a collision thereof with a street car, it was held that it was not contributory negligence as matter of law for a fireman, while riding to a fire on a hose cart, to stand on his feet and be in the act of putting on his coat, where it appears that the firemen, when starting to a fire, would not have time to put on their coats, and, to avoid getting wet and to be in readiness for service when they arrive at the fire, they put them on while on the way, which they are allowed to do.

Where, while a buggy is crossing street car tracks with a car approaching in the distance, the horse slips down on the track, and, while she is endeavoring to regain her feet, the street car strikes one of the rear wheels of the buggy and a passenger is injured, he is not guilty of contributory negligence, as matter of law, in not jumping from the buggy when he saw the car approaching, but his negligence is a question for the jury. Edwards v. Foote (1901) 129 Mich. 121, 88 N. W. 404.

And in Oddie v. Mendenhall (1901) 84 Minn. 58, 86 N. W. 881, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 297, where a passenger in a buggy was injured by being thrown therefrom upon its being struck by a street car which approached from behind while the buggy was standing at the curb, and frightened the horse by its noise, the horse in its fright, during the absence of the driver, backing the carriage upon the track, it was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, in remaining in the carriage after the driver had left it, or in failing to jump out after the horse became fractious, but that her negligence was a question of fact for the jury.

And in Walsh v. Altoona & L. B. Electric R. Co. (1911) 282 Pa. 479, 81 Atl. 551, where a passenger in a wagon, in order to avoid the danger of an imminent collision between the wagon and a street car at a sharp curve of the track at a street intersection, jumped out of the wagon and injured her ankle, it was held that the question whether she exercised the care of a prudent person in permitting the driver to attempt the crossing under the circumstances was for the jury. The court said that the test of contributory negligence was whether she joined in testing a patent danger or in violating a fixed rule of law. It appeared that the driver was careful and competent, that the crossing was not in itself dangerous, and only made so by the approach of an unexpected or unheralded car running not oftener than every twenty minutes, and the court stated that there was no obvious or imminent danger in a passenger permitting a capable driver to make the crossing. It was also held that the question whether she was guilty of negligence in leaping from the wagon under the circumstances was likewise for the jury.

In Trumbower v. Lehigh Valley Transit Co. (1912) 285 Pa. 397, 84 Atl. 403, where the plaintiff, while seated on the front seat of a carriage, was injured when it was struck by a car approaching from the direction in which the carriage was going, just as it was turning out of the street car tracks into an opening in the snow banks along the highway, which prevented the road from being used except in the street car tracks, it was held that while a passenger, if he voluntarily goes into a patent danger which he could have avoided, or joins the driver in testing such a danger, cannot recover, that the danger in driving in the street car tracks was not so manifest that the plaintiff could be said to have been negligent as matter of law.

And in Pla y Hernandez v. San Juan Light & Transit Co. (1908) 4 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 138, where a passenger in an automobile was injured when it was struck by a street car, the case was submitted to the jury, which found a verdict for the plaintiff.

And in Brown v. Chicago City R. Co. (1910) 153 Ill. App. 242, where one riding on a wagon was injured upon its collision with a street car, it was held that, upon the evidence in the case, the question whether he was in the exercise of reasonable care for his own safety was a question for the jury.

IV. In collisions with vehicles.

Collisions between two automobiles.

In an action for injuries to a guest in an automobile upon its collision with another automobile, the court, in Elling v. Blake-McFall Co. (1917) 85 Or. 91, 166 Pac. 57, upheld an instruction as follows: "The plaintiff in this case was required to exercise reasonable care; that is, that degree of care which a person of reasonable prudence would exercise in the situation in which he was placed. If he had reason to suspect carelessness or incompetency on the part of the driver, it was his duty to protest and remonstrate with or caution him against being careless, or to caution him concerning the operation of the car, and if the driver was running the car at a dangerous rate of speed, and the plaintiff knew of the rate of speed and its danger, or, in the exercise of reasonable prudence, ought to have known and appreciated it, it was his duty to remonstrate against such speed, and direct the driver to slacken the same, and, if he knew and appreciated the danger of a collision in time to avert it by promptly warning the driver, it was his duty to do so."

And in Carter v. Brown (1918) 136 Ark. 23, 206 S. W. 71, where a passenger in an automobile was injured when it collided with another automobile, it was held that it was the duty of a guest to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and that where the exercise of such care would have avoided the danger and resultant injury, and the failure to do so contributed to the injury, the guest was guilty of contributory negligence.

And a passenger in an automobile, injured upon its collision with a taxicab, cannot be held to be guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, because she rode, immediately before the collision occurred, at a speed of from 15 to 20 miles an hour for several blocks, without protesting, where by statute a speed of more than 10 miles an hour was made unreasonable and negligent. Holland v. Yellow Cab Co. (1920) 144 Minn. 475, 175 N. W. 536.

In the case of Parmenter v. McDougall (1916) 172 Cal. 306, 156 Pac. 460, a judgment for plaintiff, injured in the collision of a motorcycle with an auto, was reversed because of the error of the trial court in withdrawing from the consideration of the jury the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence in failing to request the driver of the motorcycle on which plaintiff was riding to moderate his speed in approaching an obstructed or blind street intersection, and, in this connection, the court said: "The passenger is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and . . . whether or not he exercised such care is a question of fact. Unless the evidence is all one way, this 18 A.L.R.—23.

question must be submitted to the jury. We entertain no doubt that the evidence in the case at bar was such that the jury might have found against the plaintiff on the issue of his contributory negligence."

And where an occupant of an automobile was injured when it collided with another automobile at a street intersection, the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding having, about a block back, increased its speed to overtake an automobile which had passed it, it cannot be said that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, merely because he sat still in the automobile until the collision occurred, and did not insist or demand that the automobile be stopped, or that he be allowed to get out, since the speeding up took place so close to the point of collision that there was little or no time for the plaintiff to take further steps to secure his safety, if it was incumbent upon him to do so in order to escape the charge of negligence on account of remaining quiet in the automobile after having objected to the increase of speed. Rappaport v. Roberts (1918) — Mo. App. —, 203 S. W. 676. The court said that the question of contributory negligence depended solely, in this case, upon whether the plaintiff instigated the increase of speed by suggesting it to the driver, or whether it was against his advice and over his objection (upon which point the evidence was conflicting), and not upon the fact that he thereafter sat still and made no other or more effective or insistent objection in the short space of time before the collision.

A policeman clothed with authority to enforce speed laws, who makes no effort to control the speed of an automobile in which he is riding as a guest, is, where such automobile is driven at an unlawful rate of speed, guilty of negligence which will preclude him from recovering damages occasioned by the negligence of the driver of another automobile. Hubbard v. Bartholomew (1913) 163 Iowa, 58, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 443, 144 N. W. 13.

And where an automobile which had the right of way at a street intersection over a motor truck, seen to be approaching about 50 feet away at a rate in excess of the speed limit, proceeded across the street without paying any further attention to the truck, and, after passing the center of the intersection, was struck, although it swerved to avoid collision, by the truck coming diagonally across the street in violation of the traffic laws, the failure of an occupant of the automobile to keep a continuous lookout for the truck after entering upon the intersection was held not to make him guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, and a finding of the trial court that he was not negligent was not disturbed, in Simonsen v. L. J. Christopher Co. (1921) — Cal. —, 200 Pac. 615.

One is negligent in riding in an automobile with knowledge that the chauffeur is drunk, so as to prevent his holding the driver of another automobile liable, because of the speed at which he was driving, for injury to him by the collision between the two cars, if the injury was caused by the act of the driver of the car in which he was riding. Lynn v. Goodwin (1915) 170 Cal. 112, L.R.A.1915E, 588, 148 Pac. 927, 9 N. C. C. A. 915.

And in Wiley v. Young (1918) 178 Cal. 681, 174 Pac. 316, where one riding in the side car of a motorcycle was injured by its collision with an automobile, it was held that the trial court properly refused an instruction predicated upon the theory that it would be negligence upon the part of the plaintiff to ride with the driver, if she had reason to believe that he was usually careless or negligent in some unspecified particular in the operation of the same, and in this connection the court said: "This is not the law. If the plaintiff knew, or had reason to believe, that Lewis was usually negligent in the operation of his machine, it was her duty to consider that fact in determining what precaution she should have taken for her safety in the event of meeting the defendant's automobile upon the public highway; and the question for the jury to determine under all the facts and circumstances, including the knowledge of the plaintiff, if any, concerning the driver, Lewis, was whether or not she was guilty of any negligence which proximately contributed to the injury. The only evidence as to plaintiff's knowledge of the driver's habitual negligence, if any, is the inference to be drawn from the fact that plaintiff had ridden as his guest some fifteen times. There was no evidence that he had ever collided with any other machine or obstacle, and hence there was no basis for an instruction so general in its terms, even if otherwise proper."

And in Littlefield v. Gilman (1911) 207 Mass. 539, 93 N. E. 809, the appellate court refused to pass upon the question as to whether it was negligence as matter of law for a guest, who was killed by a collision between two automobiles, to ride with an unlicensed chauffeur, since such question was not called to the attention of the court below, and was not within the scope of a requested instruction as to imputing negligence.

Where a guest upon the front seat of an automobile sees a motor truck rapidly approaching on the right, about 75 or 100 feet away, and, raising his hand as a signal that the automobile means to cross, tells the driver to cross in front of the truck at a street intersection, the former is not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. Feigin v. Malbin (1918) 171 N. Y. Supp. 245.

And where a wife, riding with her husband in an automobile, was injured by its collision with another automobile at a street intersection, when her husband attempted to cross ahead of the other car which had the right of way, the fact that she kept still, although seeing the approaching automobile, did not make her guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where she knew that her husband saw the approaching car, and it was not until the instant before the collision that she became aware that he intended to cross ahead of it. Ward v. Clark (1919) 189 App. Div. 344, 179 N. Y. Supp. 466. The court said: "She naturally relied upon the judgment of her husband in driving the car. Accidents in driving automobiles are often quite as likely to happen as to be averted by outcries and unwarranted suggestions and interference with the driver."

It was held in Kokesh v. Price (1917) 136 Minn. 304, 161 N. W. 715, 16 N. C. C. A. 1050, that it could not be said as a matter of law that a passenger in an automobile, injured when it collided with another automobile in rounding a corner, was negligent because she did not warn or admonish her husband, who was driving, as to the giving of signals, and as to the speed and manner in which he rounded the corner, where the whole incident covered but a very short space of time, and it did not appear that her husband was not usually careful.

And it cannot be said that a passenger, struck by another automobile, was conclusively guilty of contributory negligence in standing for a few minutes on the street side of the automobile, with his foot on the running board and his hand on the machine, talking with the driver, after it had arrived at the curb in front of the passenger's house, and he had alighted from the automobile and passed around behind it, and looked for a rattle in the machine which they had previously heard, and the court said that, at most, the question of his contributory negligence was one for the jury. Walden v. Stone (1920) — Mo. App. —, 223 S. W. 136.

Collision between automobile and other vehicle.

One who, without protest, permits the chauffeur of a hired automobile to drive at a manifestly dangerous speed on the wrong side of the road, is guilty of contributory negligence so that he cannot recover from the owner of a wagon with which the automobile comes into collision. Hardie v. Barrett (1917) 257 Pa. 42, L.R.A.1916F, 444, 101 Atl. 75, 16 N. C. C. A. 485.

And it was held in Oberholzer v. Hubbell (1918) 36 Cal. App. 16, 171 Pac. 436, that the fact that a woman who was riding in a buggy driven by her husband, which collided with an automobile to her injury, testified that there was nothing to obstruct her view of the approach of the defendant's automobile, that she did not look to see whether vehicles were approaching, and that, if she had looked in the direction from which the defendant's automobile approached, she could have seen it and would have stopped, did not show that she was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

And in Williams v. Withington (1913) 88 Kan. 809, 129 Pac. 1148, it was held that it was not contributory negligence as matter of law for a woman, riding on the front seat of a buggy with her husband, with one child sitting on her lap and another beside her to look after, to fail to look, when she could or should have seen the automobile approaching which ran into the buggy and injured her, and that she had the right to rely upon the watchfulness of her husband, who was driving; at least, until she actually saw some danger calling for a warning or advice from her.

And in Withey v. Fowler Co. (1914) 164 Iowa, 377, 145 N. W. 923, where a passenger in the rear seat of an auto was injured by the tongue of a truck striking her hand, it was held that she was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where it appeared that, when she saw the near approach of the truck and realized the danger of collision, she put out her hand, motioning the driver of the truck to hold up, but the forward thrust of the truck caused its tongue to strike the palm of her hand; whether by sheer accident, or because of an instinctive movement on her part to ward off the threatened stroke, was not entirely clear. The court said: "Plaintiff was confronted with a sudden peril. Her effort to attract the driver's attention and avert the collision was a proper one. The thrusting out of her hand was at least a natural movement, even if a futile one, and to lay down the rule that an act so humanly natural in a sudden and alarming emergency is negligence as a matter of law would be to overturn the most fundamental principles of the law governing recoveries for personal injury."

It is not negligence for one, injured while riding in the back part of a sleigh, by reason of an auto truck skidding against it, to sit with his legs over the side of the sleigh, where such an accident could not ordinarily happen except in case of violation of the traffic law. Corey v. Hartel Bros. (1912) — Mich. —, 185 N. W. 748.

One riding as the helper of the driver upon the frame of the left front end of a steam roller, with his legs hanging over the side and his face turned toward the front, is not guilty of contributory negligence so as to defeat his recovery for injuries received by him, by having his legs struck by a motor truck passing too close to the steam roller. Moreno v. Los Angeles Transfer Co. (1920) — Cal. App. —, 186 Pac. 800. In this case the court said that the plaintiff was not required, either under the common law or by any statutory enactment, to refrain from occupying a position that could only become a place of danger by reason of the negligence of another; that the Motor Vehicle Act required the defendant's employee, in passing, to keep to the left of the steam roller, and not to turn to the right again until entirely clear thereof; and that the plaintiff was justified in assuming that the defendant's employee would obey the law, and hence he was not negligent in failing to watch to the rear, as contributory negligence cannot be predicated upon an omission to assume that another will violate the law.

A passenger in a carriage will not be presumed to be guilty of contributory negligence by failing to jump therefrom when discovering that the horses are frightened by an approaching automobile. McIntyre v. Orner (1906) 166 Ind. 57, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1130, 117 Am. St. Rep. 359, 76 N. E. 750, 8 Ann. Cas. 1087.

And in Herdman v. Zwart (1914) 167 Iowa, 500, 149 N. W. 631, where a woman, riding with her husband in his carriage, was injured when the horse took fright at the defendant's automobile, an instruction was given to the effect that the plaintiff was required to use ordinary care, the instruction ending with the words, "That is, so far as lay within her power, she was required to exercise the same care as an ordinarily prudent person would be required to exercise under like circumstances," and it was unsuccessfully contended that the expression, "so far as lay within her power," laid the duty of extraordinary care upon the plaintiff, the court saying: "We think that a careful reading of the clause will not bear this interpretation. This clause expressly says that she was required to exercise the same care as any ordinarily prudent person. The particular clause objected to implies a possible excuse for a lower standard of care. Its application is, perhaps, that, if the decedent was under any disability or limitation of body or intellect, it would excuse her from the measure of care required from an ordinary person. There was, perhaps, no occasion for the qualification, but its tendency was favorable rather than prejudicial to the appellant. If the instruction had required her to exercise all the care that 'lay within her power,' a different question would be presented."

V. As to defects or obstructions in highways.

Defects in roadbed.

A passenger on the back seat of an automobile, traveling over a road in apparently good condition, is not bound to pay constant attention to the management of the car, or to keep constant lookout for imperfections in the road. BRUBAKER v. IOWA COUNTY (reported herewith) ante, 303.

And the court said in Warth v. County Ct. (1912) 71 W. Va. 184, 76 S. E. 420, that ordinarily a passenger riding in a vehicle driven by another is not held to the same degree of care to keep a lookout for dangerous places in the road as is required by the driver, but, if the passenger knows of any existing or approaching danger, whether it be known or unknown to the driver, he is negligent if he fails to call the driver's attention to it, or to try in some way to avoid it.

And in Crescent Twp. v. Anderson (1886) 114 Pa. 643, 60 Am. Rep. 367, 8 Atl. 379, where one driving a horse and wagon, upon coming to a bridge which was being repaired, drove to one side of the bridge, down into the ravine, and up the other side, and during the passage an occupant of the rear seat was thrown out and injured, it was held that such occupant was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, because she could see that the bridge was temporarily closed to prevent travel over it, and that the route around the bridge was not prepared for the passage of vehicles, the ravine, its approaches, its depth and width, being all fully disclosed to view, and she made no request to the driver to take any other route, or that she might get out of the wagon, but voluntarily joined him in testing the danger in crossing the ravine as he did.

And in Winner v. Oakland Twp. (1893) 158 Pa. 405, 27 Atl. 1110, 1111, where the occupant of a carriage was injured when it was overturned by reason of the bad condition of the road, it was held that she was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, where it appeared that, although they could have taken another road, they took the one which they were told was in bad condition, that when they came to a bad spot in the road the driver got out and examined it, and told the others that, while it was a pretty bad place, he thought he could get over by careful driving, and in making the attempt the injury occurred.

But in White v. Portland Gas & Coke Co. (1917) 84 Or. 643, 165 Pac. 1005, where the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, in turning out to avoid another automobile coming from the opposite direction, ran into the loose earth of a recently filled trench in the highway, causing the wheels to skid, in consequence of which the automobile rolled down an embankment on the side of the road, it was held that it could not be said as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to notify the driver, or to call his attention to the danger of going over the embankment in an effort to avoid a collision with another machine.

A passenger on the back seat of an automobile which struck an obstruction in the highway cannot be charged with negligence in failing to see signals along the road warning of danger when there is no evidence that any existed which would warn an ordinarily prudent traveler, or in failing to control the speed of the car when there is nothing to show that he could have formed an intelligent estimate of the rate of speed. BRUBAKER v. IOWA COUNTY (reported herewith) ante, 303.

And in Beach v. Seattle (1915) 85 Wash. 379, 148 Pac. 39, it appeared that a street stopped at a ravine, and that the arrangement of the lights and the location of another street on the opposite side of the ravine gave the appearance, at night, that the street was continuous over the ravine, and there was no barrier, red light, or any danger signal of any kind to indicate the presence of the ravine, and the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding plunged into it, and it was held that the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence was one for the jury, where it appeared that she sat on the front seat with the driver, who was competent and careful; that, although the automobile at the time was running at an excessive speed, the plaintiff had no appreciation of its speed, or that it was dangerous; that she had no knowledge of the existence of the ravine, had never been in that part of the city before, and was unfamiliar with the streets; that she could see the lights on the opposite side of the ravine, and that she noticed only a kind of dark spot or shadow in the street, but did not think it indicated any danger; and that, though looking straight ahead, there was nothing to warn her of the existence of the ravine.

A person, who, for the purpose of taking a pleasure drive, enters an automobile driven by one known to be intoxicated, is guilty of negligence which will prevent his holding the municipality liable for injury due to a defect in the street, which the driver could not avoid because of his condition. Winston v. Henderson (Farmers' Bank & T. Co. v. Henderson) (1918) 179 Ky. 220, L.R.A.1918C, 646, 200 S. W. 330.

But in Sutton v. Chicago (1915) 195 Ill. App. 261, where a passenger was drowned when the auto in which he was riding ran into an open drawbridge, and into the river, it was held that his contributory negligence was a question of fact for the jury, where it appeared that he was one of a party on a joy ride, in which all had been drinking, including the chauffeur, and that they were all so drunk that they did not even know that they were going away from home when they wanted to go home, by which diversion from the route the accident happened.

A guest who consents to stay in an automobile when the driver attempts to run it after dark, without lights, along a road with which no one in the car is familiar, is so negligent that he cannot hold the one responsible for an unguarded excavation in the road liable for injury caused by the machine falling into it. Rebillard v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (1914) L.R.A.1915B, 953, 183 C. C. A. 9, 216 Fed. 503.

But where, during a trip taken at night, the lights of an automobile fail, and the owner and driver avails himself of the earliest opportunity to improvise or repair an oil lamp attached to the dash, after which the journey is continued, the driver being an experienced driver, and being accompanied and assisted by one who is familiar with the roads, and where the roads are muddy and the automobile is driven slowly, and falls into an unguarded cut, the fact that a guest or passenger continues the journey as a passenger in the rear seat of the car does not make him, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence. Chambers v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (1917) 37 N. D. 377, 163 N. W. 824, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 954.

And in Dillabough v. Okanogan County (1919) 105 Wash. 609, 178 Pac. 802, where a passenger in an automobile was injured when it struck a partly washed out culvert in the road, it was held that it was not negligence, as a matter of law, to ride in an automobile running on high gear over a muddy and slippery road, even in the nighttime.

A woman who, while riding behind her husband upon a motorcycle, was injured because of a defect in the road, which the husband could not see because of the glare of the headlights of an approaching automobile, cannot be held to be guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, upon the ground that the seat occupied by her in the rear of her husband was insecure, and that she should have requested her husband to stop the motorcycle, and have dismounted therefrom. Kuntz v. Walda-meer Co. (1917) 68 Pa. Super. Ct. 73.

And in Warth v. County Ct. (1912) 71 W. Va. 184, 76 S. E. 420, it appeared that the bank of a ditch along the center of the road gave way under the weight of the horse attached to the buggy in which the plaintiff was riding, and precipitated the horse into the ditch, and the plaintiff, on attempting to get out of the buggy, was thrown to the ground and injured, and it was held that the negligence of the plaintiff was a question for the jury, where the evidence showed that the husband was driving very carefully upon the same side of the street that he had passed over only a few hours before, that it was not too dark to see the road and ditch, that he did see it, and was very careful to avoid getting into it, that the road was in constant use, and that others had driven over it the same day safely, the court stating that it could not be said, as matter of law, that the risk was so obviously dangerous that a reasonably prudent person would not have assumed it, or that plaintiff displayed such reckless disregard for safety in attempting to ride by the ditch as to amount to negligence per se. The court further said, in regard to the contention that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence per se in trying to get out of the buggy when, if she had remained in it, she would not have been hurt, that, if plaintiff was not negligent in assuming the risk of riding by the ditch, she was not negligent in trying to free herself of a dangerous situation in which she found herself because of the defendant's negligence, provided she exercised reasonable precaution in doing so.

And in Hanson v. Clinton (1914) 156 Wis. 147, 145 N. W. 646, where a passenger in a buggy was injured when it was tipped over on a rough road with which she was unfamiliar, it was held that the evidence showing that the buggy was being driven slowly, that it was dark, and that the driver could not see the defect which tipped the buggy over, was ample to support a finding of the jury that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

In Kalland v. Brainerd (1918) 141 Minn. 119, 169 N. W. 475, where a passenger in a hired automobile was injured because of a defect in a street, the court left the question of contributory negligence to the jury, and it found that the passenger was not negligent.

And it was held in Jewell v. Rogers Twp. (1919) 208 Mich. 318, 175 N. W. 151, an action against a township for the death of a passenger in an automobile which ran into a quarry cut across a discontinued highway, that the contributory negligence of the deceased was a question for the jury.

Other defects or obstructions.

It was held in Vincennes v. Thuis (1902) 28 Ind. App. 523, 63 N. E. 315, that the rule that it is as much the duty of a passenger in a vehicle, if he have the opportunity to do so, to use reasonable care and judgment to learn of and avoid danger in approaching a railroad crossing, as it is the duty of the driver, is applicable to a passenger in a vehicle who was injured when it struck a hydrant in the street.

And in Wentworth v. Waterbury (1916) 90 Vt. 60, 96 Atl. 334, where, upon approaching a curve in the road, the driver of an automobile discovered, when he was about 16 feet therefrom, a wagon standing diagonally across the road between the guard rails along an embankment over a culvert, and he then applied the brakes and turned to the left, where there was more, though insufficient, room, and brought the automobile practically to a standstill opposite the wagon, when the automobile slipped against the guard rail, which gave way in consequence of its insufficiency, and the automobile was precipitated down the embankment, it was held that a passenger in the automobile was prevented from recovering for his injuries, because it was not possible to say that the case tended to show that such passenger was himself free from contributory negligence, it appearing from his own testimony that he saw the wagon standing diagonally across the road, when the automobile was from 8 to 12 rods away, and did not mention that fact to the driver, or do anything but sit supine and mute beside him on the front seat, while the automobile went forward with unslackened speed. The court said: "If the burden of showing contributory negligence had been on the defendant, we might think that here the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence was for the jury. But in this state such burden is on a plaintiff, and certainly the plaintiff wholly failed to sustain the burden of showing that he was personally free from contributory negligence, for in the state of the evidence it could not fairly and reasonably be inferred that he was so free."

And it was held in Whitman v. Fisher (1904) 98 Me. 575, 57 Atl. 895, that a passenger in a wagon which was overturned by striking a pile of dirt in a street was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, the court stating the facts constituting contributory negligence as follows: "The plaintiff was driving with her husband in the evening; he was driving, but they were both upon the same seat of a single-seated wagon. It was an extremely bright moonlight night without a cloud in the sky to obscure the moonlight; there was practically no more difficulty in avoiding the obstruction in the street than there would have been in the daylight; the horse that was being driven was wholly blind, and had to be entirely guided by the driver; upon this account great care was required, whether driving in the daytime or nighttime, because no reliance whatever could be placed upon the horse; the plaintiff had practically as good an opportunity of observing obstructions in the road as did her husband; she was aware of the fact that the horse was totally blind, and knew that upon this account great care was necessary to avoid obstacles of all kinds."

In Jefson v. Crosstown Street R. Co. (1911) 72 Misc. 103, 129 N. Y. Supp. 233, where a passenger was injured when the automobile, while traveling at the rate of 50 or more miles an hour, struck a bundle of newspapers in the highway, it was held that the fact that the defendant created a nuisance in the highway did not make it liable to one who, in a reckless and unreasonable use of the highway, was injured by the nuisance, and that, while it might be that, in an action for damages occasioned by the nuisance, the plaintiff was not obliged to prove an absence of contributory negligence, yet, if it appeared that the recklessness of the injured person was the proximate cause of the injuries, there could be no recovery, and that the mere fact that plaintiff rode in the automobile 1,500 feet in something like twenty seconds, without a remonstrance, or even a suggestion, to the driver that he stop the car or slacken its speed, placed on the plaintiff all the recklessness or contributory negligence needed to sustain a finding of a jury that he was in an unreasonable use of the highway.

And in holding that one who was killed while riding in a buggy with another, when it struck a hydrant in the street, was guilty of such negligence as to preclude a recovery for his death, the court, in the case of Vincennes v. Thuils (1902) 28 Ind. App. 523, 63 N. E. 315, said: "The decedent was sitting by the side of Dr. Beard (the driver), and had equal opportunity with him to discover and avoid danger. He had equal knowledge, also, with him, that it was very dark, and that they were driving at a rapid, dangerous, and reckless rate of speed, considering the darkness of the night and that the street was unlighted. To travel upon an unimproved street where inanimate objects, if any, in the street, could not be seen on account of darkness, and at such a reckless rate of speed as shown by the evidence, is such negligence itself as will preclude a recovery."

And it was held in Meenagh v. Buckmaster (1898) 26 App. Div. 451, 50 N. Y. Supp. 85, where a passenger was thrown from a buggy when it struck rubbish in the street which was plainly visible, and which left an abundance of room in the street to pass around it without contact, that if the driver was intoxicated, or his manner of driving was so heedless or careless that the passenger, in the exercise of ordinary care, would have perceived it, and he failed to do so and to remonstrate with the driver, he was chargeable with contributory negligence as matter of law by continuing to ride with him.

But where an automobile was being driven at a rate in excess of the speed limit just before it came to a pile of brick in the street, to avoid which it was turned and ran into a hole in the street, and, before it could be stopped, the forward wheels struck a street car rail and threw out a passenger, the failure of the passenger to remonstrate with the chauffeur, and request him to drive slower or permit him to alight from the automobile, does not constitute contributory negligence, as a matter of law, upon his part, where it appeared that he sat in the rear seat of the automobile, and that it was dark until the automobile was within 100 feet of the pile of brick. Gary v. Geisel (1915) 59 Ind. App. 565, 108 N. E. 876.

collision of the automobile, at night, with a black, unlighted bridge girder in the center of the highway, cannot be held guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, upon the ground that she permitted, without protest, the driving of the machine in excess of the legal speed limit, and in the center of the road in violation of an ordinance, where the evidence as to the rate of speed of the automobile is conflicting, and such ordinance only applies to the passing of other vehicles. Boyd v. Kansas City (1922) — Mo. —, 237 S. W. 1001.

And in Gaffney v. Dixon (1910) 157 Ill. App. 589, where a woman, while riding with her husband in his automobile, was injured when it struck an obstruction in the street consisting of a load of sand and gravel, and it appeared that the husband had broken his arm a few months before, and could not completely close the hand of the injured arm, and was not in a condition physically to control the automobile with ordinary care, it was held that to make the wife negligent in riding with him it would not only be necessary that she knew what his physical condition was, but also that she must have known, by the exercise of ordinary care, that, because of such condition, he was unable to manage the automobile with ordinary safety, and the court further held that, even if she had known that, because of his physical condition, he was unable to manage the auto with ordinary safety, she would not be guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in riding with him, but that it would be for the jury to say whether she was in the exercise of ordinary care for her own safety while riding under the control of a driver who had such physical disability.

And it was held in Jacks v. Reeves (1906) 78 Ark. 426, 95 S. W. 781, where a woman riding in the back seat of a buggy was injured by a sagging telephone wire coming into contact with the top of the buggy, that it was not contributory negligence, as a matter of fact or of law, to permit a fourteen-year-old girl, accompanied by two grown women, to drive a gentle horse along a public highway in broad daylight.

And in Ferry v. Waukegan (1917) 205 Ill. App. 109, where a passenger in an automobile without any lights was injured by being thrown out when it struck a pile of material in the street about half an hour after sundown, it was contended that to permit the automobile to proceed without a light, in violation of the law which required the lamps on an automobile to be lit at sunset, was contributory negligence on the part of the passenger, but it was held that it was a question of fact for the jury whether the passenger should have insisted on leaving the car unless the lamps were immediately lighted, it appearing that, about a mile before the place of the accident was reached, the passenger asked the driver if his lamps were lit, and the driver replied he would light them when he reached the end of the street lights, that it was not yet dark, and the street lights were on, and that the passenger was engaged in a conversation with another passenger in the rear seat of the automobile concerning a proposed business trip. It further appeared that it was not clear from the evidence that the failure to have lights on the automobile contributed to the accident, since the automobile was endeavoring to pass a hayrack, going in the same direction, when it was first confronted by the pile of materials, and the driver would not have seen the materials any sooner if his lights had been on.

And in Logan County v. Bicher (1918) 98 Ohio St. 432, 121 N. E. 535, a suit for the death of plaintiff's husband, while a guest in an automobile, when it plunged from the road over a creek where there were no barriers, it was held that the question of the decedent's contributory negligence was for the jury. v.
GUST GROBER et al., Respts.

Wisconsin Supreme Court — March 8, 1921.

(173 Wis. 493, 181 N. W. 739.)

Negligence — of driver imputed to guest.

1. An invited guest in a private conveyance who has no control over the driver, is not engaged in a joint undertaking with him, is guilty of no negligence himself, and stands in no other relation to him requiring his negligence to be imputed to the guest, is not chargeable with the driver's negligence so as to prevent his holding a stranger liable for an injury negligently inflicted upon him.

Automobile — liability of owner for accident while he is guest in car.

2. The owner of an automobile who accepts the invitation of his son to accompany him on an expedition of his own in which the son uses the father's car, and who does not interfere in any way with the management of the machine, is not liable for an injury inflicted by the son in negligently driving the car.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County (Gregory, J.) in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained in a collision with an automobile alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Vinje, J.:

Action to recover damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff in being run over by an automobile driven by Harvey Grober. William Grober, his brother, and Gust Grober, his father, the respondents, were also occupants of the automobile. It appears that Gust Grober and William were guests in the automobile, having been invited by Harvey to accompany him on the trip. Much evidence was taken as to who owned the automobile,—the sons Harvey and Edwin, or the father. The trial court found that the sons named owned the machine and entered judgment dismissing the complaint upon the merits as to William Grober and Gust Grober; whereupon plaintiff voluntarily entered a nonsuit against the defendant Harvey Grober, and appealed from the judgment dismissing the case as to Gust and William Grober.

Messrs. William A. Schroeder and H. B. Walmsley for appellant.

Messrs. Bloodgood, Kemper, & Bloodgood, and Emmet Horan, Jr., for defendants and respondents:

In order to establish a right of action against an individual, it must be shown that such individual has been guilty of a breach of duty which is the proximate cause of the injury.

An automobile is not inherently dangerous.

Steffen v. McNaughton, 142 Wis. 49, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, 124 N. W. 1016, 19 Ann. Cas. 1227; Doran v. Thomsen, 74 N. J. L. 445, 66 Atl. 897.

Plaintiff on his own testimony is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Weber v. Swallow, 136 Wis. 46, 116 N. W. 844; Hannigan v. Wright, 5 Penn. (Del.) 537, 63 Atl. 237; Water-molen v. Fox River Electric R. & P. Co. 110 Wis. 153, 85 N. W. 663; Culbertson v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 88 Wis. 567, 60 N. W. 998; McCormick v. Hesser, 77 N. J. L. 173, 71 Atl. 55.

Plaintiff failed to show any negligence on the part of any of the defendants and for that reason the learned trial judge was justified in directing the verdict.

Kuchler v. Milwaukee, 165 Wis. 320, 162 N. W. 315.

Vinje, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have carefully examined the evidence with reference to the ownership of the automobile, with the result that we think the trial court correctly decided that issue. But, if it did not, the legal questions presented would be the same, for the evidence is undisputed that Harvey Grober was the one primarily interested in making the social visit that was made. He alone received the invitation, and he in turn invited his father and brother to accompany him. This they did as his guests. He drove the machine, and there is no evidence that either the father or the brother interfered in the least with his management of it, or were called upon to do so. A man may be a guest in his own automobile. So, even if the father owned the machine, under the evidence he would have to be classed as a guest therein so far as this trip is concerned. The same is true of the brother, William. As guests, are they liable to plaintiff for the negligence of Harvey, the driver? It is claimed that they are, under the doctrine of Prideaux v. Mineral Point, 43 Wis. 513, 28 Am. Rep. 558. That case held that the driver of a private conveyance is the agent of a person therein to the extent that, if his negligence contributes jointly with that of a third person to an injury received by the occupant, there can be no recovery against the third person, because the negligence of the driver is imputed to the occupant, thus creating contributory negligence barring recovery. It is now sought to extend this doctrine so as to make the occupant liable to third persons for the negligence of the driver. That there is a substantial difference between the rule as announced in the Prideaux Case, and the claim made by plaintiff, is obvious. A person may well be content to trust his own safety to a driver, and yet not be willing to indemnify third persons who may suffer through his negligence. He may say, So far as I am concerned, his negligence is my negligence, but I do not agree to become responsible to others for his negligence. To extend the doctrine to that degree would make a guest in a private conveyance an insurer of third persons against the negligence of the driver. Instead of being invested with the liabilities of a guest, he would shoulder those of a master.

We not only decline to so extend the rule of Prideaux v. Mineral Point, supra, in so far as it imputes the negligence of the driver of a private vehicle to an occupant therein, but we take this occasion to expressly overrule it. We do so now the more readily because no litigant before the court suffers by reason of the repudiation of the doctrine. It had its inception in this state in Houfe v. Fulton, 29 Wis. 296, 9 Am. Rep. 568, decided in 1871, where Dixon, Ch. J., says: "The only questions here are whether there was any want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, or on the part of the person with whom he was riding and who was driving the horse at the time of the injury, which also contributed to the injury, . . . and whether the defect in the bridge was the sole cause of the injury." 29 Wis. 297.

The court held that, since the evidence did not conclusively show such negligence on the part of the driver, a nonsuit was improperly granted. This implied that negligence of the driver would bar recovery as stated in Prideaux v. Mineral Point, 43 Wis. 526, 28 Am. Rep. 558. But it was not until the decision in the latter case that this state became explicitly sponsor for the doctrine that an occupant in a private conveyance who has no control over the driver, who is not engaged with him in a joint undertaking other than traveling with him, and who stands in no blood, marriage, or other relation to him, has the negligence of the driver imputed to him so as to bar a recovery against a third person whose negligence contributed to the injury. The principle there announced has been steadily followed since, either by a reaffirmance thereof or under the rule of stare decisis. See Otis v. Janesville, 47 Wis. 422, 2 N. W. 783; Johnson v. Superior Rapid Transit R. Co. 91 Wis. 233, 64 N. W. 753; Lockwood v. Belle City Street R. Co. 92 Wis. 97, 65 N. W. 866, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 641; Ritger v. Milwaukee, 99 Wis. 190, 74 N. W. 815; Olson v. Luck, 103 Wis. 33, 79 N. W. 29; Lightfoot v. Winnebago Traction Co. 123 Wis. 479, 102 N. W. 30; Lauson v. Fond du Lac, 141 Wis. 57, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 40, 135 Am. St. Rep. 30, 123 N. W. 629; Landry v. Great Northern R. Co. 152 Wis. 379, 140 N. W. 75; Hains v. Johnson, 154 Wis. 648, 143 N. W. 653; Sommerfeld v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 155 Wis. 102, 143 N. W. 1032; Kuchler v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 157 Wis. 107, 146 N. W. 1133, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 891; Puhr v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 171 Wis. 154, 14 A.L.R. 1334, 176 N. W. 767. In the Kuchler Case it was applied in all its rigor to a boy ten years old riding with his grandfather. So it must be admitted that there has been no substantial wavering on the question.

In Lightfoot v. Winnebago Traction Co. 123 Wis. 479, 102 N. W. 30, Cassoday, Ch. J., said that the rule had been steadily adhered to, and that, if a contrary rule was to prevail, it was for the legislature to say so. Were it a rule of property, we should certainly apply to it the rule of stare decisis. But it is not a rule of property. It is a pure judicial decree relating to liability for negligence, and the court would not for a moment give countenance to an argument that a wrongdoer relied upon it. We are, therefore, at liberty to change the rule in the interests of justice, and to conform to the overwhelming majority rule. See cases cited in note in 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 597 et seq., and in L.R.A. 1915A, 763, supplementing it, and also 20 R. C. L. 158 et seq., and cases cited in note 13; id., 163; Whittaker's Smith, Neg. 2d Am. ed. 1896, p. 508; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 6th ed. §§ 65a et seq.; 1 Thomp. Neg. §§ 499 et seq.; Buswell, Personal Injuries, § 105; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 2d ed. § 110; 1 Beven, Neg. 2d ed. pp. 203 et seq.; 29 Cyc. 548; dissenting opinion in Mullen v. Owosso, 100 Mich. 103, 23 L.R.A. 693, 43 Am. St. Rep. 436, 58 N. W. 663. The above authorities show that only a few states adhere to the imputed negligence rule, and some of them by a divided court.

The doctrine was founded upon the idea that the occupant voluntarily made the driver his agent for the trip by accepting a ride with him; that he trusted his safety to him, and thereby became so identified with him that the driver's negligence became his own. While there is some ethical ground for this idea, it has never received extended judicial approval, and it has been pointed out that it rests upon no sound legal basis, either as to agency or identity; that the driver, as well as the third party, become tort-feasors toward the occupant when he is injured by their joint negligence, and that he can pursue either or both.

The rule has received severe criticism by many text-writers. See 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 6th ed. pp. 166 et seq.; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 499. Strange to say, in spite of the fact that Chief Justice Ryan pointed out in the Prideaux Case that it might not be applicable to a public conveyance, the Wisconsin rule has often been discussed as though it applied to them. The case of Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, 137 Eng. Reprint, 452, 18 L. J. C. P. N. S. 336, applied to public conveyances, omnibuses, and it has been generally conceived that, since that case has been discredited by English and American courts (see text-writers cited above), the same discredit has attached to the rule of imputed negligence declared in the Prideaux Case. Our court has never applied the rule to public conveyances and has negatived such application. Landry v. Great Northern R. Co. 152 Wis. 379, 140 N. W. 75; Ellis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 167 Wis. 392, — A.L.R. —, 167 N. W. 1048, 19 N. C. C. A. 142; Bakula v. Schwab, 167 Wis. 546, 168 N. W. 378. This much charity requires to be said in behalf of the doctrine now

When and under what circumstances the occupant may be guilty of contributory negligence, or engaged in a joint undertaking with the driver, or stand in such relation to him that the negligence of the driver may be imputed to him, it is not now necessary to discuss.

Only so much of the Prideaux Case is overruled as imputes the negligence of the driver to an occupant in a private conveyance who has no control over the driver, is not engaged in a joint undertaking with him, is guilty of no negligence himself, and stands in no other relation to him requiring his negligence to be imputed to the occupant.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of guest for injury to third person due primarily to negligence of driver.

The related question as to care or negligence of one riding in an automobile driven by another as affecting the former's right to recover against a third person is treated in the annotation following Brubaker v. Iowa County, ante, 303.

As stated in the reported case (REITER v. GROBER, ante, 362), a man may be a guest in his own automobile, and therefore cases involving the liability of the owner of an automobile when riding therein at the invitation of another who is driving it are included in the note, but cases which make the liability of the owner turn upon the mere fact of his ownership of the automobile are excluded, as such subject is treated in a note to the case of Zeeb v. Bahnmaier, 2 A.L.R. 888, entitled "Owner's presence in automobile operated by another as affecting former's liability."

Cases in which the husband rides as a guest in his wife's automobile are excluded from the annotation where the husband's liability is based upon the existence of the relation of husband and wife.

And cases of parents riding as guests of their minor children are also excluded where liability is based upon the relationship of parent and child.

As a general rule, one riding in a vehicle as a guest, without any control over the driver, is not liable for injury to a third person due to the negligence of the driver.

Wisconsin.—REITER v. GROBER (reported herewith) ante, 362.

Thus, a mother who accepts the invitation of her son to ride in his automobile merely as his guest, and who has no control over, and takes no part in the management of, the automobile, is not responsible for injuries inflicted upon another by the negligence of her son in driving the car. Anthony v. Kiefner (Kan.) supra.

And the owner of an automobile is not liable, on the theory that it is a dangerous machine, for its negligent use to the injury of a stranger, by one to whom he had loaned it and who was in complete control of its operation, although the owner is, at the time of the accident, present in the machine as a guest. Hartley v. Miller (Mich.) supra.

One cannot be held liable for an injury resulting from the negligence of the driver of an automobile which was being towed, in failing to follow the forward car and causing a rope connecting the machines to throw a bicyclist, where it appears that he had been a passenger in the disabled machine, and merely assisted in tying the machines together, and that at the time of the injury he was riding as an invited guest in the machine which was doing the towing, it appearing that he did not employ, pay, direct, or control the driver of either car. Jerome v. Hawley (N. Y.) supra.

And in Garcia v. Georgetti (4 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 495) supra, the court, in charging the jury, stated that a person who is merely the invited guest of another in an automobile is not liable to one injured by the negligence of his host or the latter's servant in operating the machine, unless the guest has some control of or takes some part in the negligent direction or management of the car.

One who is invited to become the guest of another on an automobile trip, and who accepts the invitation upon condition that he shall be permitted to pay the hotel expenses of the party at their destination, cannot be held liable for an injury resulting from the negligence of the chauffeur in the operation of the car, where the guest has no interest in the automobile, and exercises no control or management over the chauffeur. Adamson v. McEwen (1913) 12 Ga. App. 508, 77 S. E. 591. The court said in this case: "We deduce from these authorities, as well as from the general principle on the subject, that where one is injured by the negligent conduct of the driver of an automobile, a person who is riding in the automobile simply as an invited guest and who has no control or management of the machine or of the driver, and no interest in the automobile, cannot be held liable for the negligent conduct of the chauffeur; that in riding in the automobile under these circumstances he is not engaged in a common or joint enterprise with the owner or the chauffeur; and the fact that the guest has agreed to pay the expenses of the party after they have arrived at their destination does not alter the legal conclusion to be drawn from the facts above stated."

And in Crawford v. McElhinney (1915) 171 Iowa, 606, 154 N. W. 310, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 221, involving the liability of a husband for injuries to a third person resulting from the negligence of the former's wife in running his automobile, the question whether the husband and wife were engaged in a common enterprise, or whether the husband had control over the car, was submitted to the jury by an instruction approved by the appellate court, which stated, in part, that if the husband and wife were not engaged in a common enterprise, and the husband did not have any control over the use of the car, but was a guest therein, the negligence of his wife could not be imputed to him, and he would not be liable for the injuries caused thereby.

And in McMahan v. White (1906) 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 169, where it was held that the owner of a vehicle who permitted a guest to drive during a pleasure trip, but who retained the right to control the manner of driving, and the right to take possession of the reins at any moment, was liable for an injury caused by the negligence of the guest driving the vehicle. There is an obiter statement to the effect that if the situation of the parties had been reversed, and the driver had been the owner of the conveyance, and the defendant had been riding in it by his permission or invitation, the defendant would not be liable.

Persons who hire a hack, automobile, or other public conveyance, do not become responsible for the negligence of the driver or chauffeur, if they exercise no control over him further than to indicate the route they wish to travel, or the places to which they wish to go. This doctrine applies to a person who rides in a private vehicle by permission and invitation of the owner. Wilkinson v. Myatt-Dicks Motor Co. (1915) 136 La. 977, L.R.A.1915E, 439, 68 So. 96.

And a mother's request, while on a ride as the guest of her son in his automobile, that sometime during the ride he should call at a certain house on an errand of hers, does not make the case one of joint enterprise or indicate that she had either management or control of the car, so as to make her responsible for the negligence of her son in operating the car, which resulted in injury to a third person. Anthony v. Kiefner (1915) 96 Kan. 194, L.R.A.1915F, 876, 150 Pac. 524, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 264. The court said that the fact that the owner of an automobile, who has invited a guest to ride with him, takes a particular course at the request of, and for the pleasure or convenience of, the guest, does not indicate management of the automobile, or result in responsibility on the part of the guest for the conduct of the owner and operator.

And a political speaker is not liable for an injury occurring while he is an occupant of a car which was engaged, and whose chauffeur was hired, by members of political committees, although it was put in his charge during a speaking trip so far as directions to the chauffeur as to the route to be taken were concerned, since this situation did not create the relation of master and servant. Pease v. Gardner (1915) 113 Me. 264, 93 Atl. 550. The court said: "It was as if the owner of a car should invite a friend to ride, without the owner accompanying him, and instruct the chauffeur to go wherever the friend might direct. The chauffeur would still remain the servant of the owner, and the friend would still be merely the passenger for whose pleasure or convenience the ride is taken."

If, however, a guest in an automobile undertakes to keep a lookout and fails, or if he has even a slight share in the management of the car, or if the unlawful speed of the car which causes the injury to the third person is made at the guest's instance and request, or if in any way he personally participates in inflicting the injury, he may be held liable for the resulting injury. But the mere fact that a mother, who is sitting by the side of her son in his automobile as his guest, does not protest against his action when he drives his automobile at an excessive rate of speed for the distance of a little more than a city block, in which an injury is inflicted upon a third person, cannot be held as culpable negligence on her part which would make her liable for his negligence and the resulting injury. Anthony v. Kiefner (1915) 96 Kan. 194, L.R.A.1915F, 876, 150 Pac. 524, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 264.

But in Minor v. Mapes (1912) 102 Ark. 351, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 214, 144 S. W. 219, where a man riding with his wife in her automobile, which she was driving, was held answerable for injuries negligently inflicted by her upon a passenger who had just alighted from a street car, under the common-law rule making a husband liable for his wife's torts, the court said: "But aside from the question of the husband's common-law liability for torts of the wife, we are of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding negligence on the part of appellant. The rule is that where one who rides in a public conveyance, or merely upon the invitation of some third party, exercises no control over the driver, and is not guilty of any positive act of negligence, the negligence of the driver cannot be imputed to him so as to render him liable for injuries to another person. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. McFall (1905) 75 Ark. 30, 69 L.R.A. 217, 86 S. W. 824, 5 Ann. Cas. 161; 1 Thomp. Neg. 502; Little v. Hackett (1886) 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 652, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Steinbrenner (1885) 47 N. J. L. 161, 54 Am. Rep. 126, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 258. This rule cannot, however, be extended so as to afford an avenue for the husband's escape from liability on account of the negligent act of his wife or minor child, with whom he is driving in an automobile or other vehicle. He is presumed to exercise some control over them under those circumstances,—at least, to the extent of preventing an act of negligence which is calculated to result in injury to other persons,—and it is his positive duty to do so. In this instance the husband was sitting beside his wife, who was driving the machine, and whatever danger there was in driving too near the street car was as obvious to him as it was to her. He needed no knowledge or experience in the operation of the machine in order to apprise him of such a danger. To say that the husband was not liable for the negligent act of the wife, committed under those circumstances, would be to absolve him entirely from any duty to fellow travelers."

One who goes upon a pleasure trip in another's automobile, upon the invitation of the chauffeur, under circumstances which would compel the belief that the chauffeur had taken the automobile without the owner's permission, is liable to the owner, as an accomplice of the chauffeur in his wrong, for damages sustained by the automobile, on the way, from the accident. Galibert v. Vaillancourt (1915) Rap. Jud. Quebec, 53 C. S. 521.

And in Apperson v. Lazro (1909) 44 Ind. App. 186, 87 N. E. 97, rehearing denied, without mention of this point, in (1909) 44 Ind. App. 195, 88 N. E. 99, it was held that one of two defendants in an action to recover for the negligent operation of an automobile was not entitled to a judgment in his favor notwithstanding a general verdict for the plaintiff, on the theory that answers to interrogatories filed showed that he had nothing to do with the injuries inflicted, but was merely an occupant of the car, it appearing that the complaint in the case alleged that the defendants were in possession and control of the automobile at the time of the injury, and that this was not contradicted by the answers to the interrogatories, since the rule invoked was held to apply only in case of an irreconcilable conflict between the verdict and the answers.

STATE OF GEORGIA.

Georgia Supreme Court — August 12, 1921.

(151 Ga. 818, 108 S. E. 238.)

Juror — qualification — relationship to party.

1. A juror in a criminal case who is related either by consanguinity or affinity within the ninth degree to the prosecutrix, ascertained according to the rules of the civil law, is a disqualified juror. (a) That a juror is related to the prosecutrix in a criminal case within the prohibited degree, unknown to the defendant until after verdict, is a good ground for an extraordinary motion for new trial. (b) That the juror was unaware of the relationship to the prosecutrix until after verdict will not prevent a new trial.

Appeal — new trial — sufficiency of notice.

2. When an extraordinary motion for new trial in a criminal case is made in term, upon grounds which were not known to the movant or his counsel before the convening of the court, and the judge entertains the motion, grants a rule nisi thereon, and the solicitor general acknowledges service of the motion and nisi, expressly waving "all other and further service or notice," and is given twenty days' notice of the motion and of the grounds thereof before final hearing, the judgment overruling the motion and denying the new trial will not be affirmed upon the ground that the movant did not give to the opposite party twenty days' notice of his intention to make the motion.

3. When in a criminal case, after verdict, either in an original motion or an extraordinary motion for new trial, an attack is made upon a juror upon the ground that he was not impartial, the trial judge occupies the place of a trier, and his finding that the juror is competent will not be reversed unless, under all the facts, the discretion is manifestly abused. (a) The statements of a juror on voir dire may be considered by the trial judge on the hearing of an extraordinary motion for new trial, where the juror died subsequently to the trial and before the making of the motion.

[See 2 R. C. L. 217.]

ERROR to the Superior Court for Union County (Jones, J.) to review a judgment denying an extraordinary motion for new trial after affirmance of a judgment convicting defendants of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John A. Sibley and Hughes Spalding, for plaintiffs in error:

A juror related either by consanguinity or affinity within the ninth degree to the prosecutrix is a disqualified juror.

Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 857; Chitty, Bl. Com. * 206; Smith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 576, 59 S. E. 311.

Prejudice or bias of a juror against the defendants likewise disqualifies a juror, and a new trial should be granted.

Doyal v. State, 73 Ga. 72; Bishop v. State, 9 Ga. 129.

If there was a disqualification the fact that the juror was unaware of the relationship does not remove such disqualification.

Smith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 574, 59 S. E. 311.

If the juror was disqualified within the prohibited degree, such fact, although unknown to the juror, was a good ground for an extraordinary motion for a new trial.

Ibid.

Prejudice and bias of a juror are ground for an extraordinary motion for a new trial.

Doyal v. State and Bishop v. State, supra.

The notice of intention to file motion for a new trial on extraordinary grounds was sufficient.

Brinkley v. Buchanan, 55 Ga. 342; Chandler v. Hammond, 23 Ga. 498.

Messrs. Pat Haralson, T. S. Candler, Howard Thompson, and Joseph G. Collins, for the State:

Notice twenty days before term and before making motion for rule nisi should be given so as to enable the court, on hearing for rule nisi, to pass on the grounds and determine whether stay of proceedings and rule nisi will be granted.

Cleveland v. Chambliss, 64 Ga. 357; Gould v. Johnston, 123 Ga. 765, 51 S. E. 608; Cox v. State, 19 Ga. App. 293, 91 S. E. 422.

The relationship not being within the fourth degree by the canon law would not be cause for new trial even on an ordinary motion for new trial, much less upon an extraordinary motion. Nor would the relationship be close enough to disqualify the juror if shown on his voir dire and while and before he was selected as a juror, because not within the fourth degree by the canon law.

If the juror does not know of the relationship at all till after the trial he could not possibly have been prejudiced or biased by it, and it is not and cannot be any real cause for new trial.

Brumfield v. State, 102 Miss. 610, 59 So. 849, 921; State v. Congdon, 14 R. I. 459; Senterfeit v. Shealey, 71 S. C. 259, 51 S. W. 142; Cartwright v. State, 12 Lea, 620; Larkin v. Expression of opinion by jurors before trial, from rumor, does not disqualify even in an ordinary motion for new trial.

Ray v. State, 15 Ga. 233; Wright v. State, 18 Ga. 383; West v. State, 79 Ga. 773, 4 S. E. 325; Moon v. State, 68 Ga. 688; Carter v. State, 106 Ga. 372, 71 Am. St. Rep. 262, 32 S. E. 345, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 125; Blackman v. State, 80 Ga. 785, 7 S. E. 626; Vann

E. 499; Costly v. State, 19 Ga. 614.

Neither of the alleged grounds of motion is a sufficient ground for an extraordinary motion for new trial, and the court below properly refused grant of motion therefor.

Messrs. R. A. Denny, Attorney General, Graham Wright, and W. E. Candler, also for the State.

George, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

George Crawley, Decatur Crawley, Rosa Crawley, and Blain Stewart were jointly indicted and jointly tried at the October term, 1919, of Union superior court, for the offense of murder. The defendants were convicted. George Crawley and Decatur Crawley were sentenced to be hanged, and Rosa Crawley and Blain Stewart were sentenced to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. The defendants made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and the judgment of the lower court was affirmed by the supreme court on September 30, 1920. A motion for rehearing was filed, and this motion was denied on October 2, 1920. 150 Ga. 586, 104 S. E. 410. Union superior court convened on October 4, 1920, and adjourned on October 9, 1920. On October 9, 1920, and before the adjournment of court, the defendants named above filed an extraordinary motion for new trial, upon the grounds that: (1) One of the jurors who had rendered the verdict finding them guilty, to wit, Frank H. Spivia, was disqualified by reason of relationship to the prosecutrix, which fact was unknown to the defendants or their counsel; and (2) one of the jurors who rendered the verdict finding them guilty, to wit, Luther Chastain, was disqualified by reason of prejudice and bias against the defendants, which fact was unknown to the defendants or their counsel. On December 7, 1920, the judge of the superior court entered a judgment overruling the extraordinary motion for new trial, and the movants excepted.

1. The Penal Code 1910, § 1091, provides: "In case of a motion for a new trial made after the adjournment of the court, some good reason must be shown why the motion was not made during the term, which shall be judged of by the court. In all such cases, twenty days' notice shall be given to the opposite party."

The state contends that the judgment denying the extraordinary motion for new trial should be affirmed, because, if for no other reason, twenty days' notice of movants' intention to move for a new trial upon extraordinary grounds was not given to the solicitor general as required by the Code. The record discloses that the grounds upon which the extraordinary motion was made were not discovered until after the convening of the superior court on October 4, 1920. As stated above, the motion was filed on the last day of the term of the court, to wit, October 9, 1920. The motion for rehearing made in the case was denied by the supreme court only two days before the convening of the October term, 1920, of Union superior court. A motion for new trial based on extraordinary grounds must be filed in term time, either at the term when the case is tried or at some subsequent term. Due diligence required the movants to make their extraordinary motion for new trial promptly on discovery of the grounds. As stated, the grounds of the motion relied on were discovered by movants and their counsel during the October term, 1920, of Union superior court. It was, therefore, impossible for the movants to give counsel for the state twenty days' notice of their intention to file the extraordinary motion for new trial at the October term. It appears, however, that the trial judge entertained the motion and granted a rule nisi thereon, calling on the solicitor general to show cause on November 23, 1920, why the motion should not be granted. Upon the motion and nisi the solicitor general acknowledged service in the following language: "Service of the within extraordinary motion for new trial, with orders thereon, is hereby acknowledged. Copy waived. All other and further service of notice is hereby waived."

On motion of the solicitor general the hearing was postponed until November 6, 1920, and again postponed until November 9, 1920, on which latter date the court took the motion under advisement, and thereafter, on December 7, 1920, entered a judgment overruling the motion. It will be noted that the opposite party had twenty days' notice of the motion before the final hearing thereon, and that he was fully advised of the grounds of the motion. We are of the opinion that this was sufficient. Compare Brinkley v. Buchanan, 55 Ga. 342. We do not rest the decision of this point upon the doctrine of waiver alone, nor upon the fact that the court granted the nisi notwithstanding the failure of movants to give the solicitor general twenty days' notice of their intention to file the motion for new trial; but we are of the opinion that twenty days' notice of the filing of the extraordinary motion for new trial before final hearing thereon is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the statute. The decision on this point is made upon all the facts as they appear in the record, and it is unnecessary to decide whether the refusal of the judge to grant a rule nisi solely upon the ground that movants had failed to give the solicitor general twenty days' notice of their intention to make the extraordinary motion would be erroneous.

2. Considering the grounds of the extraordinary motion in their inverse order, we are of the opinion that the court did not err in overruling the motion upon the second ground thereof. This ground is based upon an affidavit of a witness to the effect that prior to the trial of the case Luther Chastain, one of the jurors, had stated that "the Crawley boys and Blain Stewart ought to be hung, and if he got on the jury he would make it hard for them," and upon the affidavit of another witness to the effect that this juror, after the trial of the case, had stated that the verdict rendered in the case was in accordance with his previously fixed opinion. After the trial of the case and before the filing of the extraordinary motion for new trial, the juror died. The state was, therefore, unable to produce an affidavit by the juror; but the state offered certain affidavits detailing facts and circumstances tending to cast suspicion upon the truth of the statements contained in the affidavits offered by the movants, and to disprove this ground of the motion. In addition, the juror had been sworn on the voir dire. Being dead at the time of the filing of the extraordinary motion for new trial, it was competent for the court to take into consideration the juror's sworn statement that he had not formed or expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, and that there was no bias or prejudice resting on his mind either for or against the accused. See Buchanan v. State, 24 Ga. 282, 286. In view of the counter showing submitted by the state, the case on this point is within the rule announced in Jefferson v. State, 137 Ga. 382, 73 S. E. 499; McNaughton v. State, 136 Ga. 600, 71 S. E. 1038;

3. On the first ground of the motion it appears that the prosecutrix, the wife of the deceased, is related to the wife of the juror Spivia. Upon this point the evidence submitted by the movants and the state is not in conflict. The wife of the juror is five degrees removed from the common ancestor, and the prosecutrix is four degrees removed from the common ancestor. By the rule of the civil law the juror's wife and the prosecutrix are related in the ninth degree; by the canon law in the fifth degree. The movants and their counsel were unaware of this relationship until the judgment of the trial court overruling the original motion for new trial was heard and affirmed by the supreme court. That the movants and their counsel, by the exercise of due diligence, could not have sooner discovered the relation of the juror to the prosecutrix, is not fairly in dispute. The trial court, in overruling the extraordinary motion, expressly found that neither the movants nor their counsel had waived the alleged disqualification of this juror, and waiver necessarily results either from knowledge of such relationship or from ignorance of such relationship, due to the failure to exercise proper diligence. It appears that the prosecutrix and counsel for the state were also unaware of the relationship until after the verdict; and the affidavit of the juror himself, to the effect that he did not know of the relationship until after the trial, and that even upon notice and inquiry he was unable to ascertain the exact relationship, was offered by the state upon the hearing of the motion. In view of all the facts and circumstances detailed in the affidavits of movants and of their counsel, it must be held that both movants and their counsel exercised due diligence in the premises. There is no statute in this state expressly declaring what degree of relationship will disqualify a juror in a criminal case. Nor is the rule prescribed by which the degree of relationship is to be determined. In the selection of a juror for the trial of a criminal case the state or the accused may make either of the following objections: "(1) That he is not a citizen, resident in the county. (2) That he is over sixty or under twenty-one years of age. (3) That he is an idiot or lunatic, or intoxicated. (4) That he is so near of kindred to the prosecutor, or the accused, or the deceased, as to disqualify him by law from serving on the jury." Penal Code 1910, § 999.

In Brown v. State, 28 Ga. 439 (original motion for new trial), it appeared that one of the jurors was a cousin of the prosecutor, but the degree of the relationship is not stated. It was held that a new trial should be granted "where one of the jury is cousin to the prosecutor, and the fact not known to the accused or his counsel until after his conviction." In Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 856 (original motion for new trial), it was held that a third cousin of the prosecutor in a criminal case is not a qualified juror. In the opinion by Chief Justice Jackson (page 857) it is said: "The juror was disqualified, being a third cousin and within the ninth degree, which fact was unknown to the defendant and his counsel until after the trial."

In Watkins v. State, 125 Ga. 143, 144, 53 S. E. 1025, it is said: "The ninth degree of relationship, as that expression was used in Ledford's Case, has been construed to mean the ninth degree as calculated by the rules of the civil law, and not of the canon law. Thomp. Trials, 53; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1124. . . . Sir Edward Coke stated that relationship in any degree was sufficient to disqualify a juror. 1 Co. Litt. 157a. But later writers state that the relationship must be within the ninth degree, calculated according to the civil law. 3 Bl. Com. 363; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 541; Finch's Law, 401. Such seems to be the view adopted in this state, as indicated in Ledford's Case, supra."

In Roberts v. Roberts, 115 Ga.

259, 261, 90 Am. St. Rep. 108, 41 S. E. 617, it is said: "In Ledford v. State, supra, Mr. Chief Justice Jackson says: 'The juror was disqualified, being a third cousin and within the ninth degree.' This statement by the chief justice that relationship within the ninth degree would disqualify, we suppose, meant within the ninth degree as calculated by the rules of the civil law, and not by the rules of the canon law, which are of force in this state in reference to matters of inheritance."

See also Moody v. Griffin, 65 Ga. 304; McElhannon v. State, 99 Ga. 672, 26 S. E. 501.

The state insists, however, that upon the point involved, the statements in 75 Ga., and in the other cases cited, are obiter dicta. According to 1 Chitty, Criminal Law, 541, a principal challenge will be admitted if the juror is related to either party within the ninth degree, though only by marriage. See 2 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. 2d ed. § 901. In Thompson on Trials, 2d ed. § 62, it is said that relation by consanguinity and affinity "is reckoned according to the rule of the civil law, as distinguished from that of the canon law, which latter was the English law of descent." Relation is a common-law disqualification, and the statement of the chief justice in Ledford's Case, supra, is a recognition of the common-law rule. In Smith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 574, 59 S. E. 311, it was held that a juror who was related by affinity to the prosecutor within the ninth degree as determined by the rule of the civil law is a disqualified juror, and that a new trial should be granted upon this ground, upon extraordinary motion. In the opinion, by Judge Russell, attention is called to the fact that the movant contended that the juror was related to the prosecutor in the seventh degree, but that the counter showing submitted by the state authorized the trial judge to find that the juror was related to the prosecutor in the ninth degree only. At page 577 of 2 Ga.

App. it is pointed out that "the degree of relationship to a party which will disqualify a juror is not the same as will disqualify a judge. At common law favor was not presumed in a judge, while originally the presumption as to a juror was that any relationship whatever, either by affinity or consanguinity, would disqualify a juror, this rule being later modified so that the disqualification by reason of kinship extended no further than to include the ninth degree. The limitation of the disqualification of judges to cases where one or more of the parties to the case may be of kin within the fourth degree was the adoption of an arbitrary rule by statute, regardless of the common law, while the rule as to the disqualification of jurors (in the absence of legislation on the subject) is the common law."

It has been held by this court that relation within the fourth degree to either party will disqualify a juror in a civil case. Roberts v. Roberts, supra; Central Georgia Power Co. v. Nolen, 143 Ga. 776 (2), 85 S. E. 945; Central Georgia Power Co. v. Pope, 144 Ga. 130, 86 S. E. 322. The common-law rule, which disqualifies a juror in a case where he is related to one of the parties, is in force in this state, both in civil and criminal cases. Under the statute the judge is disqualified if related to either party within the fourth degree, computed by the canon law. Short v. Mathis, 101 Ga. 287, 28 S. E. 918. Under the decisions of this court a juror in a civil case is disqualified if related to either party within the fourth degree, computed by the canon law. Under the common-law rule applied in this state a juror in a criminal case is disqualified if related to the prosecutor by consanguinity or affinity within the ninth degree, computed by the rule of the civil law.

Juror—qualification—relationship to party.

It is insisted by the state that, since the statute (Penal Code, § 999) recognizes the relation of the juror to the prosecutor, the accused, or the deceased, as ground for challenge for cause, objection to the juror upon this point must be taken before trial. Cases in other jurisdictions support this contention. See 3 Wharton, Crim. Proc. 10th ed. § 1786, and cases cited in note 10. According to these decisions disqualifications not absolute, which are ground for challenge, are not grounds for new trial, unless urged before trial. In Georgia R. Co. v. Cole, 73 Ga. 715, it is said: "A jury composed of men who are not lawful men—men whose relationship to the parties renders them incompetent as jurors—cannot render a lawful verdict. If the parties consent to the jurors, or have knowledge of their incompetency, then they will be held to waive the same. It cannot be said that the defendants in error have had their case tried, certainly not legally, and, although the verdict may be in accordance with the facts, and such as a lawful jury should have rendered, yet it is no verdict, and the court did right to set it aside."

In view of the prior decisions of this court, it must be held that a juror related by consanguinity or affinity within the ninth degree, to the prosecutor in a criminal case, is a disqualified juror; and, where such relation is unknown to the accused until after verdict, a new trial will be granted.

But it is finally insisted that the juror himself was unaware of the relation and could not have been influenced thereby, and that any such disqualification, if good ground for granting an ordinary motion, cannot be classed as among the extraordinary grounds recognized by law. In Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 856, it was said: "It would be too dangerous a precedent to allow the juror to assert that he was ignorant of the relationship till after trial, too. The principle on which the law rejects him is that he is not impartial; the same objection lies to his assertion that he was ignorant of the relationship at the time of the trial, after he had assisted in the conviction."

While the reasoning on this point

may not be altogether satisfactory, the exact point was ruled and the policy of the state declared. The ruling has been subsequently followed. Lyens v. State, 133 Ga. 587, 600, 66 S. E. 792. The suggestion that the disqualification of a juror in a criminal case on account of relation to the prosecutor cannot be classed as among the extraordinary grounds recognized by law is convincingly disposed of by Judge Russell in Smith v. State, supra, as follows: "Counsel argue that 'the question of the relationship of a juror not only ordinarily occurs in the trial of cases, but is of general and constant occurrence. And the motion in this case shows on its face that it did occur in this case and was inquired for.' We will agree with counsel that the inquiry into the subject of the relationship of jurors—questions as to such relationship—is almost a matter of daily occurrence in the courts. But in the opinion that the discovery of disqualification after counsel has called attention to the subject of relationship, and the trial judge has taken the pains to have an investigation in open court touching relationship, and the cautious juror's mind is again indirectly turned to any cause which might bias his judgment by the questions propounded on the voir dire, is a common or ordinary occurrence, we do not concur. We hold such a circumstance to be extraordinary, and the law has long so regarded it; for, contrary to the prevailing rule, it absolutely shuts its ears to the explanation that the juror was not aware of the relationship and that such relationship did not in any wise affect the verdict. The law will not hear or consider that the presence of the disqualified juror did not hurt the losing party. This ground of motion for new trial is extraordinary in the same sense as the ground mentioned in Cox v. Hillyer, 65 Ga. 57, where one is convicted on the testimony of a witness subsequently found guilty of perjury in giving that testimony. It is lamentably true that perjury is not uncommon, but the law justly considers it an extraordinary circumstance that the falsity of testimony which has been credited by a jury and has induced a solemn verdict of guilty should be established."

See also Harris v. State, 150 Ga. 680, 104 S. E. 902.

Whether a juror is disqualified on account of bias is a question of fact. Whether a juror is disqualified on account of relationship to the prosecutrix is likewise a question of fact; but the inquiry, in the absence of waiver by the accused, extends only to the existence of the relation, and to the degree thereof. If related to the prosecutrix within the prohibited degree, the law declares the disqualification. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court erred in refusing the new trial upon this ground of the motion.

ANNOTATION.

Relationship to prosecutor or witness for prosecution as disqualifying juror in criminal case.

The reported case (CRAWLEY v. STATE, ante, 368) is in accord with the Georgia rule that a juror related by consanguinity or affinity within the prohibitory degree to the prosecutor or prosecutrix is disqualified from sitting in the case. Brown v. State (1859) 28 Ga. 439 (cousins);

Ledford v. State (1885) 75 Ga. 857 (third cousins); Watkins v. State (1906) 125 Ga. 143, 53 S. E. 1024; Smith v. State (1907) 2 Ga. App. 574, 59 S. E. 311 (related in the fifth degree by canon law and ninth degree by civil law); Hubbard v. State (1908) 5 Ga. App. 599, 63 S. E. 588 (third cousins by affinity); Harris v. State (1911) 10 Ga. App. 70, 72 S. E. 516 (first cousins); Perrett v. State (1915) 16 Ga. App. 587, 85 S. E. 820; Merritt v. State (1921) — Ga. —, 110 S. E. 160 (related to wife of prosecutor in the eighth degree by civil law).

In Williams v. State (1919) 23 Ga. App. 518, 98 S. E. 557, however, there is a decision, reported by syllabus alone, to the effect that a juror is not disqualified by the fact that he is related within the prohibitory degree to a witness for the state. The court ignores the decision in Ledford v. State (1885) 75 Ga. 857, supra, and the other Georgia cases cited herein which have held to the contrary, and cites as authority for its position Atkinson v. State (1900) 112 Ga. 411, 37 S. E. 747, reported by syllabus to the effect that the fact that a juror is closely related to one acting as a "partisan" for the state in a criminal prosecution affords no ground of challenging him for cause, and also cites Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Mead (1918) 22 Ga. App. 70, 95 S. E. 476, which, in holding that a juror in a civil case was not disqualified by the fact that he was related to the principal witness for defendant, said in the syllabus that there was no law making relationship within the prohibited degree, to a witness, ground for disqualifying a juror.

Such disqualification of the juror not known to defendant or his counsel until after the verdict is ground for a new trial. Brown v. State (1859) 28 Ga. 439; Ledford v. State (1885) 75 Ga. 857; CRAWLEY v. STATE (reported herewith) ante, 368; Perrett v. State (1915) 16 Ga. App. 587, 85 S. E. 820; Smith v. State (1907) 2 Ga. App. 574, 59 S. E. 311; Merritt v. State (1921) — Ga. —, 110 S. E. 160.

Where, however, the relationship is known, the incompetency of the juror is presumed to be waived where objection is not made. Miller v. State (1913) 139 Ga. 716, 78 S. E. 181.

In Brown v. State (1859) 28 Ga. 439, the rule as to diligence in objecting to a disqualified juror was stated to be that one "must make the objection at the right time if he knows the fact, but if he does not know the fact, or have special reason to believe it, he is not bound to offend every man on the panel by making random imputations against him."

The fact that the relationship was not known to the juror does not prevent a new trial in Georgia. Smith v. State (Ga.) supra; CRAWLEY v. STATE (reported herewith) ante, 368. But see cases from other states, subsequently cited, in which the juror's ignorance of the relationship is al- luded to as a reason for refusing a new trial.

The law absolutely stops its ears to the explanation that a juror was not aware of the relationship, and that such relationship did not in any wise affect the verdict. The law will not hear or consider that the presence of the disqualified juror did not hurt the losing party. Smith v. State (Ga.) supra.

A new trial should be granted al- though the evidence authorized the verdict. Hubbard v. State (1908) 5 Ga. App. 599, 63 S. E. 588.

But it has been held that it is not such a disqualifying relationship, within the rule announced supra, that a juror is the first cousin of a son-in-law of the principal witness. Avery v. Armour Fertilizer Works (1916) 17 Ga. App. 458, 87 S. E. 698.

Nor is a juror who was first cousin of the deceased wife of the prosecutor disqualified. Harnage v. State (1910) 7 Ga. App. 573, 67 S. E. 694.

And that a juror's great-uncle mar- ried the grandmother of the prosecu- tor will not disqualify such juror, where the prosecutor is not a descend- ant of such marriage. McDuffie v. State (1892) 90 Ga. 786, 17 S. E. 105.

That the deceased, childless wife of the prosecutor in a trial for murder was a sister of the wife of one of the jurors is not such a relationship as to disqualify the juror, as, legally speak- ing, there was no relationship. Gar- ner v. State (1909) 6 Ga. App. 788, 65 S. E. 342.

And that a juror was married to the widow of the prosecutor's uncle did not disqualify him. Oneal v. State (1872) 47 Ga. 229.

Nor is a juror incompetent because he is a brother-in-law of one who is also a brother-in-law of prosecutor. Miller v. State (1913) 139 Ga. 716, 78 S. E. 181.

Other jurisdictions take a view opposed to that of the Georgia courts, as to the effect of the relationship of a juror to a witness. Thus, it has been held that there is no rule of the common law, nor is there a statute, disqualifying a juror on account of his relation to a witness, either by affinity or consanguinity, in any degree. State v. Hilton (1911) 87 S. C. 434, 69 S. E. 1077, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1057.

So, where a defendant has not exhausted his peremptory challenges, he cannot complain because the court refuses to stand aside a juror related to the prosecuting witness. Ibid. In this case the witness was related by blood within the sixth degree.

Also it has been held that it is within the discretion of a judge whether he shall set aside a verdict of conviction in a prosecution for seduction because of the fact that a juror was related to the prosecutrix. State v. Cooke (1918) 176 N. C. 731, 97 S. E. 171.

And in Daniels v. State (1889) 88 Ala. 220, 7 So. 337, it was held that refusal of the court to grant a new trial on the ground that a juror is a relative of one of the witnesses is discretionary and not reviewable on appeal. In this case the motion for new trial was made on the ground that a juror and a witness for the state were first cousins, a fact which was not known when the juror was accepted, and the relationship was not disclosed when counsel made inquiry as to that fact before accepting the jury.

Mere relationship of a juror to a witness for the commonwealth will not disqualify the juror. Wright v. Com. (1913) 155 Ky. 750, 160 S. W. 476.

In Arnold v. State (1921) — Ark. —, 233 S. W. 818, a prosecution for carnal abuse, it was held that there was no reversible error in the trial court's ruling that a juror was qualified to sit, although he was related to a physician, one of the state's witnesses. The court said that such relationship might affect the juror in reaching a verdict, where he further stated that he would not give any more credence to the doctor's testimony than he would to any other credible witness, and especially since it appeared that the physician's testimony did not tend to prove any fact connecting accused with the offense charged against him, nor was there any attempt by him to controvert the testimony.

So, the fact that four jurors were related to a witness for the commonwealth in a prosecution for arson (one being an uncle and three being cousins) was held not ground for new trial, where no active participation upon the witness's part is shown in the prosecution, nor was any of his testimony contradicted or attempted to be contradicted, it being merely to the effect that he had, as an insurance agent, placed an insurance policy on the building burned. Ibid.

That a juror's wife is a "double third cousin" of prosecuting witness in an assault case will not be ground for new trial, where both the juror and his wife testified that they were not acquainted with such witness, and were totally unaware of such relationship, and consequently could not have been influenced thereby. Brumfield v. State (1912) 102 Miss. 610, 59 So. 849, 921.

And a new trial will not be granted because of the relation of a juror to the prosecuting witness (in this case a double uncle by marriage), which fact was unknown to defendant at the time of trial, where no inquiry in regard thereto was made at the time the juror was accepted. Templeton v. State (1900) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 57 S. W. 831.

Also that the grandfather of the wife of a juror was the brother of the father of complainant, a relationship within the prohibited degree under the Code, and which was not known to defendant or his counsel, or to the district attorney, at the time of the trial, is not ground for arrest of judgment and a new trial in the absence of any proof of actual injury or prejudice to the defendant. People v. Mack (1898) 35 App. Div. 114, 13 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 401, 54 N. Y. Supp. 698.

And although a juror is disqualified to serve when he is related to the prosecutor within the sixth degree, computing by the civil law, yet a new trial will not be granted because of the want of general qualifications of the juror propter defectum, and this even though the defendant was ignorant of the fact when the juror was selected, where there appears no evidence of partiality to the prosecutor, or of collusion with him, or of prejudice against the defendant in the selection of the juror; and especially where the fact of relationship was of so little consequence to him that he could not state whether he was related or not, except from rumor or hearsay. Hamilton v. State (1898) 101 Tenn. 417, 47 S. W. 695.

Under a Code provision that it is a cause for challenge that a juror is related by "consanguinity or affinity in the ninth degree to the person . . . on whose complaint the prosecution was instituted," a juror who is third cousin of complainant is disqualified. People v. Clark (1891) 62 Hun, 84, 10 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 57, 41 N. Y. S. R. 448, 16 N. Y. Supp. 473, 695.

A disqualifying relationship by affinity is not shown by the fact that a juror's uncle is the brother-in-law of the husband of the sister of the mother of prosecutrix. Doyle v. Com. (1902) 100 Va. 808, 40 S. E. 925.

In King v. State (1906) 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 321, 97 S. W. 488, which was an appeal from a judgment convicting the defendant of violating a local option law, the appellant's bill of exceptions raised the question as to the right of two of the jurors to sit in the trial of the case. It appeared from the bill that during the progress of the trial, and after the jury had been impaneled, the defendant, on the cross-examination of the witness, L. N. Gilbreath, showed that there was a vigilance committee in the town of Winnsboro, and that he belonged to the same; that such vigilance committee had hired Howell and Nabors, attorneys, to prosecute this as well as all violations of the local option law; and that J. D. Gilbreath and Aaron Cain, two of the jurors, were related to said L. N. Gilbreath within the third degree, they being uncles to said L. N. Gilbreath. It was further shown that this was the first information that the appellant had of this matter. The appellant then asked that the trial be arrested, and that the said two jurors be excused, which the court refused to do. It was held that the refusal of the trial court to excuse the two jurors was not error. J. H. B.

SAME.

Illinois Supreme Court—June 22, 1921.

(298 Ill. 599, 132 N. E. 213.)

Insurance — contract for beneficial interest — enforcement.

1. Performance by a beneficiary in a mutual benefit certificate of his agreement to pay the dues in consideration of a beneficial interest in the insurance prevents a change of beneficiary without his consent.

[See note on this question beginning on page 383.]

— change of beneficiary — equitable rights.

2. Equitable rights may be acquired in a beneficiary certificate of insurance which a court of equity will recognize and enforce against an attempt to change the designated beneficiary. [See 14 R. C. L. 1889.]

APPEAL by defendant Kroupa from a decree of the Second Branch of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County (Sullivan, J.) in favor of defendant Anna Mudra, in an interpleader proceeding to determine the proper beneficiaries to a benefit certificate, and the amount to be paid to each. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edward J. Smejkal and Joseph Z. Klenha, for appellant:

Where there has been a change of beneficiary, the burden of proof is upon the first beneficiary to prove such existing equities under a contract as will protect such beneficiary against the change.

Jory v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 105 Cal. 20, 26 L.R.A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17, 38 Pac. 534; Baker v. Abbott Mfg. Co. 212 Ill. App. 476.

Where the evidence shows that a benefit certificate was given to a designated beneficiary for safe-keeping, such circumstance does not in law deprive the member of the right to change his beneficiary, even though such beneficiary paid the dues and assessments.

Maynard v. Vanderwerker, 76 Hun, 25, 27 N. Y. Supp. 714; Preusser v. Supreme Hive, L. M. W. 123 Wis. 164, 101 N. W. 358; Fisk v. Equitable Aid Union, 7 Sadler, 567, 20 W. N. W. 68; Supreme Council R. A. v. Tracy, 169 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 401; Hill v. Hill, 130 Ill. App. 278.

The fact that a beneficiary paid assessments from community property does not deprive the assured of the right to change his beneficiary.

A society may waive a strict compliance with its by-laws and constitution, and the original beneficiary will not be heard to say that the same were not complied with.

Fraud cannot be perpetrated upon a designated beneficiary, where such beneficiary has no vested interest in the certificate under a contract with the assured.

Messrs. Lighthall, Dankowski, & Carlson, for appellees:

A change of beneficiary must be made in accordance with the by-laws and contract, or it will not be effective.

Freund v. Freund, 218 Ill. 189, 109 Am. St. Rep. 283, 75 N. E. 925; Hodalski v. Hodalski, 181 Ill. App. 158.

Unless the beneficiary named in the second certificate is competent to take, such certificate is void; and in such event the first certificate remains in force.

Royal League v. Shields, 159 Ill. App. 54, affirmed in 251 Ill. 250, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 208, 96 N. E. 45.

Where the beneficiary named in a mutual benefit certificate pays dues and assessments thereunder, under an agreement with the member that in consideration thereof such beneficiary shall receive the benefits payable under the certificate at death of the member, such beneficiary thereby acquires a vested equitable interest in the certificate, which prevents the member from changing the beneficiary without the consent of the original beneficiary.

McGrew v. McGrew, 190 Ill. 604, 60 N. E. 861; Supreme Council, R. A. v. Tracy, 169 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 401; Women's Catholic Order of Foresters v. Hill, 191 Ill. App. 629; Order of Columbian Knights v. Matzel, 184 Ill. App. 15; Hill v. Hill, 180 Ill. App. 278.

The fact that the member may have paid some of the dues and assessments does not affect the right of the beneficiary under such agreement, where it was agreed the beneficiary should pay such dues and assessments, or see that the payments were kept up, and the beneficiary paid most of the dues and assessments and saw that they were kept paid up.

Order of Columbian Knights v. Matzel, 184 Ill. App. 15; Women's Catholic Order of Foresters v. Hill, 191 Ill. App. 629.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On March 24, 1899, the order of the Columbian Knights issued a benefit certificate to James Mudra, now deceased, in the sum of $1,000, payable at his death to Anna Mudra, his wife. Subsequent to the issuing of this certificate, the name of the order was changed to the Columbian Circle. Mudra applied in writing on March 13, 1916, for a new certificate and for a change of beneficiary, stating in his application that the original certificate had been lost, and directing that the benefits be paid as follows: To Anna Mudra, his wife, $5; Ralph Mudra, a son, $10; Eddie Mudra, a son, $10; Joseph Kroupa, a nephew, $775; John Mudra, a brother, $100; and Marie Mudra, a sister, $100. Pursuant to this application a new certificate was issued to him on March 20, 1916. Upon his death, June 29, 1917, appellee, Anna Mudra, claimed the full amount of $1,000 under the original certificate, and appellant, Joseph Kroupa, claimed $775 under the new certificate. The Columbian Circle filed its bill of interpleader in the superior court of Cook county, in which it is admitted that $1,000 are due, and praying the court to determine the proper beneficiaries and the amount to be paid to each. Answers and replications were filed and the cause was submitted to a master in chancery, who took the evidence and found that the original certificate was canceled by the issuance of the second certificate, and found that the beneficiaries named in the certificate of March 20, 1916, were entitled to the proceeds thus paid into court, in the proportions set forth in the certificate. On exceptions to the master's report the chancellor found that the appellee had an equitable interest in the original certificate, by reason of an agreement that she pay the dues and assessments accruing thereon and her compliance with such agreement, and decreed that the certificate dated March 20, 1916, be held null and void, and the original certificate of March 24, 1899, in full force and effect, and that Anna Mudra was entitled to the entire sum accruing thereon. This decree was, on review, affirmed by the appellate court, and, a certificate of importance being granted, the cause comes here on appeal by Joseph K. Kroupa.

The chancellor and the appellate court found that, at the time of the delivery of the original certificate to James F. Mudra, the assured, he delivered it to the appellee, his wife, telling her, in effect, that she should pay the premiums, and the insurance would be for her benefit; that his wife accepted the policy and agreed to keep up the payments, and that she, or her son James, had possession of the certificate at all times thereafter; that she, or her sons for her, paid the premiums thereafter, with the exception of a few instances when the assured voluntarily paid them himself. The chancellor and the appellate court found that an agreement existed between appellee and the assured by which appellee obtained an equitable interest in the original certificate, and the second certificate, having been issued without her consent, was unauthorized and in fraud of her rights, and therefore void.

Appellant concedes the rule to be that where the assured, having designated a beneficiary, delivers the policy to her on an agreement that she shall receive the proceeds thereof in consideration of her promise to pay dues or assessments on such policy, and she fulfils such promise, the assured cannot thereafter change the beneficiary; but he contends that the evidence does not show such agreement and the fulfillment thereof. This is the principal contention of appellant, and rests upon questions of fact.

The rule in this state is that while the assured may, in the absence of intervening equities, change at will the beneficiary named in his insurance policy, equitable rights may be acquired in a beneficiary certificate of insurance, which a court of equity will recognize and enforce. Bispham, Eq. 162; Supreme Council, R. A. v. Tracy, 169 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 401; McGrew v. McGrew, 190 Ill. 604, 60 N. E. 861. If there was an agreement between the assured and appellee that she should receive a beneficial interest in the certificate of insurance upon and by reason of payments by her of the premiums, dues, or assessments, such contract was binding on the assured, and deprived him of the right to change the beneficiary without appellee's consent.

Two questions of fact, therefore, arise: First, was there an agreement of this character between appellee and the assured? Second, if so, was that agreement complied with on the part of the appellee?

James Mudra, a son, testified that prior to the taking out of the membership in the lodge there was a discussion between appellee and the deceased, and it was then agreed that in case he took out such certificate she should be made beneficiary. He testified, also, that when the certificate arrived at the home the deceased laid it on the table, and said, "Now, mother, this is yours; you pay the premiums and look after it that these premiums are paid;" and she said, "All right," and took the certificate, and put it away; that thereafter the certificate remained either in the possession of appellee or of witness; that he frequently paid these premiums for his mother, sometimes getting the money for such payments from her, and at other times paying, at her request, out of his own money and thereafter settling with her. He testified that his father never gave him any money to pay the premiums, but at different times advised that the premiums be kept up; that this continued even after the attempted change of beneficiaries. Bohemius Mudra, another son, testified that he had paid premiums for his mother; that his father had said to him that it was up to the mother or the sons to pay the premiums; that if they did not want to do it the policy would lapse. He also testified that after the attempted change of beneficiaries, in March, 1916, his father inquired whether or not the premiums were being paid by appellee. Rudolph Mudra, another son, testified that he was present at the time of the conversation between appellee and the assured regarding the certificate and the payment of the premiums; that after the family had moved to the state of Nebraska, which occurred some years after the taking out of the certificate, he was advised by his father that the premiums should be kept up, and that appellee was present and declared they would be kept up. This witness paid premiums at different times on behalf of his mother, and testified that he got the money from his mother; that he paid on this certificate after the purported change of beneficiaries. Antonie Mraz, a sister of the appellee, testified that after the purported transfer, in March, 1916, the assured frequently called at her house during the times when he was not living at home, and asked her to send word to appellee to be sure and make payments on the premiums.

Appellee testified that at the time she married the assured she had money of her own; that the two together bought property in the city of Chicago which they afterward sold, and she received as her share the sum of $1,100 for the property. She testified that she paid the premiums, and was careful to see that they were paid; that she paid them every month; that while he once in a while paid them, such payments by him were wholly voluntary on his part; that she did not request that he do so; that nobody paid them for her at her request; that while her three sons were at home they gave their earnings to her, and continued to do so prior to their marriage, and that, while she sent the premiums by her sons, it was her money that paid them.

Appellee stated in her testimony that her husband gave her the certificate for safe-keeping, and counsel for appellant contend that this proves there was no contract that she should pay the premiums. It is evident from her entire testimony, however, that the expression in her testimony "for safe-keeping," which was given through an interpreter, was not intended in the technical, legal sense that she was simply the bailee of the certificate. There is no doubt, from her testimony and the testimony of her three sons, that all understood that there was an agreement that she should pay the dues or premiums and receive the benefit of this certificate.

Frank B. Vrenak, a witness called by appellant, testified that sometimes the assured paid dues and some of the times the sons paid them. He testified that he did not know the assured before April, 1915, and knew nothing about what payments were made, or by whom, prior to that time.

This is substantially all of the evidence in the record pertaining to the question of the existence of the agreement contended for by appellee. It shows that the certificate at all times has been in the possession of appellee or one of her sons, though a portion of the time the assured was not living at home. It is evident that she considered it her duty to see to the payment of the premiums, and the record discloses that she either furnished the money to do so, or had her sons furnish the money, and that the payments made by the assured, at such times as he did make them, were purely voluntary. It discloses that appellee had a source of income from her sons until they became of age and married; that while the assured, when employed, contributed to the family, he frequently drew from appellee all that he had paid her, in order to settle his personal accounts. The evidence also discloses that, even after the attempted change of beneficiary, the assured frequently reminded members of the family that if appellee would have the benefit of the certificate she must keep up the premiums.

It appears from the testimony of the witness Vrenak, secretary of the local lodge, that the assured told him that his old certificate could not be found, and that he (the witness) issued a new certificate, with change of beneficiary. This statement was not true, since the assured knew the whereabouts of the certificate, and the record discloses that his attempted change of beneficiaries was a fraud upon the equitable rights of the appellee in the certificate of insurance. The evidence discloses that the assured, during the last four years of his life, was in the habit of staying away from home a greater portion of the time, returning for a few days or weeks, and then again leaving; that he was addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, and in the later years of his life was unable to hold positions as a result of that habit.

We are of the opinion that the evidence in this case discloses an agreement whereby appellee acquired an equitable interest in the first certificate of insurance in question, and that such agreement is a valid and binding one, and that she made substantial compliance therewith, and, under the rule herein referred to, the assured was without right to change the beneficiary without her consent. It follows, therefore, that the second certificate was null and void, and the insurance is due upon the first certificate issued, in accordance with the terms thereof.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will therefore be affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied, October 7, 1921.

- III. Effect of voluntary payment of dues or assessments, 392.

I. General rules.

Where the original beneficiary in a mutual benefit certificate is named pursuant to an agreement, express or implied, that he shall be so named in virtue of some consideration moving from him, it is held by the weight of authority that he acquires a right that cannot be defeated, which will be recognized—at least, on principles of equity—as against a substituted beneficiary having no superior equity, notwithstanding the general rule that the beneficiary of such certificates does not acquire a vested right.

In Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Denzer (1908) 129 Ky. 202, 110 S. W. 882, where the association was contesting the right of the earlier beneficiary, it was held that a member might change the beneficiary in a certificate issued by a fraternal order, whose laws, which were a part of the contract, gave the member the right to change beneficiaries, and provided in effect that the beneficiary named should not acquire a vested interest prior to the death of the member—notwithstanding that the earlier beneficiary was named under an agreement, known to the order, that he should pay dues and assessments, and that he did pay the same as long as the order would receive them, it having eventually refused to receive further payments by him, in consequence of an attempt by the member to change beneficiaries, and his subsequent withdrawal from the order. It will be observed that, in most of the cases previously cited and subsequently set out, the real controversy was not, as in this case, between the earlier beneficiary and the association, but between earlier and later beneficiaries, over an insurance fund paid into court, the association making no contest.

In Sabin v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1887) 26 N. Y. Week. Dig. 309, 6 N. Y. S. R. 151, Bradley, J., who wrote the opinion, said that the designation of the original beneficiary for a sufficient consideration had no effect upon the member's right to change the beneficiaries; and that the failure on his part to keep and observe his agreement was merely the breach of a personal undertaking, which did not defeat the operation and legal effect of the power of appointment; and that the original beneficiary could not hold the subsequent beneficiary as trustee of the fund received under the final certificate. This was a controversy between the original and subsequent beneficiary, the order having paid the amount of the certificate into court. The majority in the case concurred in the result on another ground, without expressing any opinion on the point in question. The position of the learned justice on this point is clearly contrary to the later New York cases.

See infra, II., for other cases in which the vested right of the original beneficiary is denied.

II. Application to facts.

The principle that the beneficiary designated in a certificate issued by a benefit association may acquire a vested interest therein, by virtue of a contract with the member, was recognized in Smith v. National Ben. Soc. (1890) 123 N. Y. 85, 9 L.R.A. 616, 25 N. E. 197, although the question there involved was whether the acts and declarations of the member were competent to affect or destroy the interest of the beneficiary.

And in Supreme Council, R. A. v. McKnight (1909) 238 Ill. 349, 87 N. E. 299, it was held that where a proper beneficiary has been designated, and the beneficiary has advanced the member money upon the faith of the certificate, or paid dues and assessments thereon, the fraudulent charge of the certificate without the knowledge of the beneficiary will not be permitted to defeat the right of the beneficiary named in the original certificate, on the ground that such beneficiary has acquired a beneficial interest which may be enforced in a court of equity.

So, where a certificate upon a husband's life was issued payable to his wife, pursuant to an agreement that she should advance him a certain amount of money, and should be the beneficiary, and the certificate should be turned over to her, and the money was advanced in pursuance of such agreement, the member had no right to change the beneficiary. Supreme Council, R. A. v. Tracy (1897) 169 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 401.

And where a member of a benefit society names his daughter as beneficiary, and agrees with her that, upon his death, she shall receive out of the proceeds of the certificate the amount advanced by her to him, he has no right, after the certificate is delivered and the money paid, to change his beneficiary. McGrew v. McGrew (1901) 190 Ill. 604, 60 N. E. 861.

And in another Illinois case (Kiobassa v. Polish Roman Catholic Union (1908) 141 Ill. App. 297), it was held that if it was shown that a wife made a loan to her husband upon his promise that he would procure insurance in a benefit society, payable to her, as security, and he did so, and never paid the loan, she would have equitable rights in the proceeds of the certificate as against one whom the husband subsequently attempted to substitute as beneficiary; but the evidence in this case was held not to show these facts.

And where a woman agreed, in consideration of being made beneficiary in a certificate, to marry the insured, and performed her promise, she was held to have acquired a legal, as well as an equitable, right to the benefit, which was not defeated by a subsequent attempt by the insured, without her consent, to change the beneficiary. Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Ulanowsky (1914) 246 Pa. 591, 92 Atl. 711.

And it has been held that a complaint stated a cause of action, which alleged that the plaintiff was induced to marry a man by an antenuptial agreement wherein he promised that if the plaintiff would marry him he would make her the beneficiary of a policy in a benefit society which he held, and that upon their marriage, with the intent of performing the agreement, he caused her to be named as beneficiary in the policy, and delivered it to her, but subsequently secured possession of it without her consent and caused defendants to be named as beneficiaries. Freitas v. Freitas (1916) 31 Cal. App. 16, 159 Pac. 611; Freitas v. Freitas (1916) 31 Cal. App. 19, 159 Pac. 618.

And where, in part performance of an antenuptial contract, a husband procures a change in a certificate of insurance in which his children were the sole beneficiaries, so as to make his wife an equal beneficiary with the children, and she has fully executed the antenuptial contract on her part, she thereby obtains an equitable interest in the certificate, and he cannot thereafter, without her consent, surrender the certificate, and obtain the issuance of a new one in which a third party is named as the sole beneficiary, and thus divest her of her interest in the certificate which was procured pursuant to such contract. Supreme Lodge, K. P. v. Ferrell (1910) 83 Kan. 491, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 777, 112 Pac. 155.

And in Stronge v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. (1907) 189 N. Y. 346, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1206, 121 Am. St. Rep. 902, 82 N. E. 433, 12 Ann. Cas. 941, it was held that a member of a benefit association who procured a certificate designating a certain person as beneficiary, pursuant to an agreement with her, and upon a consideration moving from her, was precluded as against her from exercising the privilege ordinarily possessed by members of such associations of changing beneficiaries, notwithstanding provisions of the by-laws that the member should have a right to change his beneficiary as often as desired, and making provision for the issuance of a new certificate in case of inability to surrender the original, the court stating that such provisions were not applicable to such a case, but related to those in which there was a voluntary and gratuitous designation.

And where an aunt agreed with her nephew, who was in debt, to furnish or assist him in obtaining money, upon condition that he should secure her by procuring a policy on his life, and he procured a policy in a mutual benefit company payable to his mother if she survived him, and if not, to his aunt, and it was agreed between the insured, his mother, and the aunt that, in the event of his death before the aunt's, his mother should indemnify the aunt, and the latter subsequently furnished the insured with money, it was held that she had a vested interest in the policy to the extent of the indebtedness of the insured to her, accruing under the terms of the agreement, and that an attempt to change the beneficiary without her consent did not defeat her right to sufficient of the proceeds of the insurance to reimburse her; but that, subject to this right, a new beneficiary might be named. Gillham v. Estes (1910) 158 Ill. App. 211.

And in Leaf v. Leaf (1891) 92 Ky. 166, 17 S. W. 354, 854, it was held that a wife originally designated as beneficiary in a certificate issued to her husband had a superior equity as against an adult child whom the husband subsequently designated as beneficiary to the fund derived from the certificate, and which the society paid into court, where, by her own means and personal labor, and with the original certificate in her possession, she paid the assessments, and, upon a separation of the husband and wife, their property rights were adjusted upon the understanding, express or implied, that she was to have the benefit of the certificate.

And in Webster v. Welch (1901) 57 App. Div. 558, 68 N. Y. Supp. 55, where a daughter had paid the assessments on two certificates upon the life of her father until the death of her mother, who was the beneficiary therein, and at that time she agreed with her sister and father that one of the certificates should be made payable to her sister in consideration that she would support the father, and that the other certificate should be payable to herself, it was held that she acquired a vested interest in the certificate issued to her in pursuance of such agreement, and that the sister was estopped from claiming any interest in such certificate under a subsequent designation of herself as beneficiary by her father.

And a member of a beneficial association waives his right to change beneficiaries, where the original beneficiary is designated pursuant to an agreement by the latter to satisfy a debt owed to him by the former, and to pay the premiums on the policy, and board the member when he is out of work, which agreement is carried out so far as the member permits. Re Krause (1897) 28 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. (Pa.) 29.

In Supreme Council, C. B. L. v. Murphy (1903) 65 N. J. Eq. 60, 55 Atl. 497, a husband whose certificate in a beneficial association had lapsed promised his wife that, if she would get it reinstated and continue the payments, she should have the benefit of the certificate, and, pursuant to such understanding, she renewed the certificate, taking and keeping possession of the same, and made the payments, and, in the main, supported him for the rest of his life; at the time of the reinstatement of the certificate the by-laws of the association allowed a change of beneficiary only on surrender of the certificate; under a by-law subsequently passed, allowing such change without such surrender in case the certificate is beyond the member's control, the member attempted to make a change in favor of a sister who had made him some slight gratuitous gifts of spending money. It was held on an interpleader by the association, which paid the money into court, that the wife's equity was so strong that it could not be overcome, even if the designation of a new beneficiary was made by the member of his own free will, and was carried out with the technicalities necessary to make the new certificate effectual. The decision, however, does not rest solely upon the ground that the wife was made beneficiary in pursuance of an agreement to that effect, and upon a consideration moving from her, but in part, at least, upon the fact that, at the time of the reinstatement of the certificate under the by-laws of the order, no change of beneficiary could be made without the surrender of the original certificate, and upon the other equities of the case.

In Delaney v. Delaney (1897) 70 Ill. App. 130, the court applied the general rule that the beneficiary in a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association acquires no vested right, and that the member may change the beneficiary if he so elects, without discussing the effect upon such right of an agreement between the member and the original beneficiary, although it is stated in the opinion that the certificate was taken out and delivered by the member to his wife in consideration of her past support of him, and of some moneys that she had furnished or loaned to him, and that she paid his initiation fee when he took out the certificate for her benefit, and that she agreed with him to pay all dues or assessments that should be asked of her, there being no evidence that any subsequent dues or assessments were ever asked from her. The decision was affirmed by the supreme court in (1898) 175 Ill. 187, 51 N. E. 961, without discussing the effect of the agreement between the member and the beneficiary, and, in the statement of facts preceding the opinion of the supreme court, it is stated that the trial court found that the member did not give the certificate to the wife (the original beneficiary), or make any contract with her that she should receive the insurance money mentioned therein, or that he would not change the beneficiary therein. In the opinion of the appellate court in McGrew v. McGrew (1901) 93 Ill. App. 76, the Delaney Case is distinguished on the ground that the decision rested upon the right in general of a member to change the beneficiary; and that equitable rights of the beneficiary in the certificate sought to be changed were not considered or involved.

In Sabin v. Phinney (1892) 134 N. Y. 423, 30 Am. St. Rep. 681, 31 N. E. 1087, a husband took out a certificate payable to his wife, and the same was delivered to her, and, at the same time, the wife took out a certificate in another order, payable to her husband, the same being delivered to him. The husband paid the dues on both memberships until he and his wife separated, at which time she took possession of the certificate issued to her without his consent, and he, without her consent, took the certificate issued to him, and named a new beneficiary. It was held that the wife had no vested right in the husband's certificate which would prevent his designating a new beneficiary, the court remarking that she never paid any expenses incident to the membership of her husband in the society to which he belonged, nor of her membership in the society to which she belonged, and that no pecuniary consideration could be raised in her favor. It appeared in this case that the society did not contest its liability, and had paid the money into court.

In Ryan v. Boston Letter Carriers' Mut. Ben. Asso. (1915) 222 Mass. 237, L.R.A.1916C, 1130, 110 N. E. 281, it was held that a change by a man, without the knowledge or consent of his wife, of the beneficiary in a mutual benefit certificate in which the wife was named as beneficiary, was a breach of his antenuptial contract to take out a certificate in her name in consideration of her marrying him and loaning him money, but it was held that no trust attached to the proceeds of the insurance in the hands of one subsequently named as beneficiary, in favor of the wife, in the absence of anything to show that the substituted beneficiary knew of the rights of the wife, or that he was a mere volunteer.

In Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Jones (1907) 47 Tex. Civ. App. 533, 106 S. W. 184, an injunction was refused to prevent a fraternal benefit association from changing, in accordance with its laws, and at the direction of an assured, the beneficiary in a certificate issued by it, thereby defeating the claim of a creditor who was the beneficiary named in the certificate, as trustee for a son of the assured, under an agreement whereby the creditor was to keep alive the certificate by paying the assessments thereon, and in return therefor to discharge his claim against the insured out of the proceeds thereof. It is to be noted that the laws of the association required the beneficiary to be a member of the family of, or related by blood to, the assured, but the court merely assumed the validity of the certificate without passing upon that question.

In Malancy v. Malancy (1917) 165 Wis. 642, 163 N. W. 186, where friends of the insured, who was ill, refused to give him a fund which they had raised to defray his expenses at a sanitarium until he substituted his wife as beneficiary in a certificate which was payable to his mother, it was held that, notwithstanding the change was made under these circumstances, the insured still had power to appoint another beneficiary, it being provided by the by-laws of the society, which were a part of the contract, that a member might change the beneficiary without the consent of the original beneficiary, and that any agreement entered into by a member not to change the beneficiary should be null and void.

In Dell v. Varnedoe (1918) 148 Ga. 91, 95 S. E. 977, where the insurer paid the money into court for distribution, it was held that the equities of the claimants should be compared; and where it appeared that the insured agreed with his sister when she loaned him money, to secure insurance for her benefit, and that he did so, and subsequently paid the loan, and sought to have his wife named as beneficiary, it was held that the latter, who had paid the premiums with her own funds under an agreement that she should be named beneficiary, was entitled to the benefit, the court holding that equity could not consider the sister as other than a mere volunteer, with no contractual equity in the proceeds of the policy after the payment of the money loaned, and that, on the facts, the equitable right of the wife to the proceeds could not be questioned.

There is some conflict among the cases whether the payment of assessments by the beneficiary originally designated, in pursuance of an agreement or understanding with the member to that effect, will operate to give the beneficiary a vested right and prevent the member from changing beneficiaries.

In Brett v. Warnick (1904) 44 Or. 511, 102 Am. St. Rep. 639, 75 Pac. 1061, the court, in effect, approved the rule that where a person becomes a member of a mutual benefit association under an agreement with the beneficiary named in the certificate that the latter shall pay all the assessments, and they are so paid accordingly, the beneficiary thus acquires a vested interest in the certificate so that the member cannot afterwards make another designation without the consent of the beneficiary; and further said that, that being true, there is nothing to hinder the member, with the assent of the beneficiary, from contracting with a third party, whereby the latter may maintain a vested interest in the fund designated in the certificate, provided the contract is not such as the law will not recognize because contrary to public policy.

And in McKeon v. Ehringer (1911) 48 Ind. App. 226, 95 N. E. 604, where the insured agreed with his daughter that in consideration of her being made beneficiary she should pay all the assessments, and she did so, it was held that the insured was estopped from substituting another beneficiary in her place.

So, where a husband took out a benefit certificate payable to his wife upon the understanding that she would help him to pay the assessments if he should be unable to pay them himself, in pursuance of which the wife did pay some of the assessments, she had an equitable interest in the proceeds of such insurance when paid into court by the society, superior to the right of the member's sister, whom he subsequently designated as beneficiary, the latter being a merely voluntary beneficiary, and no equities, in addition to her bare legal right, appearing. Benard v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1900) 13 S. D. 132, 82 N. W. 404.

And in Royal Arcanum v. Riley (1915) 143 Ga. 75, 84 S. E. 428, where an agreement was made between two sons and their father that the sons should pay the assessments in a benefit society in which the father was a member, and that the sons should be named as joint beneficiaries, and the agreement was carried out by the sons, it was held that a vested interest was acquired in the benefits which could not be defeated by an attempt by the father to substitute one of the sons as sole beneficiary.

And in the Order of Columbian Knights v. Matzel (1913) 184 Ill. App. 15, in an abstract of the decision, it is stated that a beneficiary acquires a vested right in insurance which equity will protect if he assists in paying the assessments under an agreement by which the proceeds are to be paid to him; and that where a certificate is taken out for the benefit of a person named therein, and delivered to him, in consideration of an agreement by the beneficiary which has been fully performed, the member is not entitled to change the beneficiary without the original beneficiary's consent; and that provisions in the by-laws as to change of beneficiary have no application under such circumstances. And to the same effect is Women's Catholic Order of Foresters v. Hill (1915) 191 Ill. App. 629.

And in Stockwell v. Sedina (1912) 170 Mich. 476, 136 N. W. 476, where a married daughter agreed with her father to pay the assessments on his benefit certificate, and it was claimed that the arrangement was carried out, it was held that she acquired a vested interest in the insurance which was her sole property; and the court stated in its discussion that the interest so acquired was one which could not be defeated by the insured, by a change of the beneficiary.

But in another Michigan case, Modern Brotherhood v. Hudson (1916) 194 Mich. 124, 160 N. W. 406, it was held that the right of a holder of a benefit certificate to change his beneficiary would not be denied unless it was plain that the beneficiary named in the certificate had, by contract and performance, acquired a vested interest in the certificate and fund, and that the promise of the beneficiary named, to pay the assessments and dues, was not sufficient to create a vested interest in the certificate and fund, and did not limit the right of the insured to change his beneficiary; and where the court found that the beneficiary named not only promised to pay the assessments, but also to take care of the insured in his sickness, and that he failed to perform the latter obligation, which promises the beneficiary claimed that he never made, it was held that equity demanded no more than that the beneficiary be repaid the sums he had expended for assessments, and that the balance be paid to the one whom the insured had attempted to have named as beneficiary after the one first named had failed to perform his agreement.

In Schiller-Bund v. Knack (1915) 184 Mich. 95, 150 N. W. 337, where the evidence tended to show that the insured procured a benefit certificate payable to his wife, and handed it to her, telling her that she would have to pay for it, and she paid the assessments for some time, it was held that there was no valid contract between the husband and wife which gave her a vested interest in the insurance, and prevented the husband, who subsequently obtained a divorce, from substituting his second wife as beneficiary.

In Masonic Benev. Asso. v. Bunch (1891) 109 Mo. 560, 19 S. W. 25, it was held that the payment of assessments by the beneficiary would not give him a vested right in the certificate, or prevent the member from substituting a new beneficiary, although the assessments were paid pursuant to an agreement to that effect between the member and beneficiary, before the certificate was taken out. To the same effect is Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. McFadden (1908) 213 Mo. 269, 111 S. W. 1172.

In Supreme Council, R. A. v. Heitzman (1909) 140 Mo. App. 105, 120 S. W. 628, the court said that the insured may estop himself, in the absence of statute, to change the beneficiary, but that this is far from saying that he has a right to agree not to change which a statute cannot take away. In this case the statute, passed in 1897, declaring that no contract between a member of a fraternal society and his beneficiary that the latter shall pay assessments and dues shall give him a vested right in the benefit, or deprive the member of the right to change beneficiaries, was held to apply to a certificate issued after its passage, under an agreement by which the insured's wife was to pay the dues and assessments, and be designated as beneficiary, although such certificate was issued upon the surrender of a certificate, taken out before the passage of the act, which named other beneficiaries.

In Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. McFadden (Mo.) supra, the court said that the Act of 1897 was not retrospective, so as to affect the interest of a beneficiary, if she acquired any, either in law or equity, before the passage of the act. In that case, however, it was held that the beneficiary had not acquired any vested interest, by virtue of agreement or otherwise.

In Fischer v. Fischer (1897) 99 Tenn. 629, 42 S. W. 448, the court said that, under the prevailing rule as laid down and recognized by the current of authority, the member's right to dispose of the insurance exists, notwithstanding that the beneficiary originally named has paid or incurred expenses upon the faith of the provisions in his behalf in the certificate. The court remarked that it was not necessary for it to consider what the rights of the expectant beneficiary may be against the member personally, growing out of such payments made and expenses incurred. In this case a certificate was issued, payable, in certain proportions, to the son and daughter, respectively, of the member, pursuant to an agreement between the three by which the son was to furnish the father with a home and maintenance and pay half his dues to the order, and the daughter was to pay the other half of the dues and furnish the father necessary clothing, in consideration of which each should have the proportion of the proceeds named in the certificate. Subsequently this certificate was surrendered and a new certificate issued without the son's consent, in which the daughter's proportion was increased and the son's proportion diminished. In response to the contention that, the order having paid the fund into court to be distributed as the court might deem proper, it should be distributed between the son and daughter according to their agreement and the terms of the original certificate, the court said that, without intending to hold that a case may not be presented which will call for such action, and where the equities of the parties inter sese in the proceeds may not be adjusted without regard to the terms of the certificate under which the money is paid into court, the son having been unable to carry out his agreement to maintain the father, and having been obliged to abandon the attempt, there was no equity upon his part to have the fund distributed upon any different basis, or in any different manner, than that provided in the final certificate.

It will be observed that in some, at least, of the cases that deny the vested right of the beneficiary, there was no express agreement on the part of the member that the person paying the assessments should remain the beneficiary. It would seem that there can be no question but that such agreement on his part will be effective to prevent his subsequently changing beneficiaries, if the original beneficiary duly pays the assessments in reliance thereon.

In the reported case (COLUMBIAN CIRCLE v. MUDRA, ante, 378) it was stated to be the rule in Illinois that, while the insured may, in the absence of intervening equities, change at will the beneficiary named in his insurance policy, equitable rights may be acquired in a beneficiary certificate of insurance which a court of equity will recognize and enforce, and it was held that if there was an agreement between the assured and the beneficiary in a mutual benefit certificate that she should receive a beneficial interest in the certificate by reason of her paying the premiums, and she performed such agreement, the assured could not change the beneficiary without her consent.

And the payment by a wife of assessments on a certificate of insurance on the life of her husband in which she was named as beneficiary, in reliance upon assurances given by him that she was to remain the beneficiary, raises an equity in her favor entitling her to the fund derived from the insurance, as against a subsequent beneficiary appointed by the husband without her consent. King v. Supreme Council, C. M. B. A. (1907) 216 Pa. 553, 65 Atl. 1108.

And in Sipe v. Sipe (1918) 102 Kan. 742, L.R.A.1918E, 1029, 173 Pac. 13, it was held that a wife who was named as the beneficiary in a certificate held by her husband acquired a vested interest which could not be defeated by his attempt to change the beneficiary, where he promised her, after the issuance of the certificate, that if she would pay the assessments he would never change the beneficiary, and she paid most of the assessments, although a number were paid by her husband's father, who had told her that if she was unable to pay them he would pay them for her.

So, in Grimbley v. Harrold (1899) 125 Cal. 24, 73 Am. St. Rep. 19, 57 Pac. 558, the payment of assessments by the beneficiary, and her agreement to care for the member as long as she was able, in reliance upon an agreement by the member that she should receive the benefit of the certificate, and that he would not change beneficiaries, was held sufficient to prevent a change of beneficiaries.

And where a husband agrees that, if his wife will help to pay the assessments upon a certificate in a mutual benefit association in her favor, he will not change the beneficiary, and in consequence of such agreement she makes a part of the payments thereon, using for the purpose what are in fact the proceeds of her own labor outside of her ordinary household duties, she cannot be displaced as such beneficiary without her consent, notwithstanding the fact that she commingled her earnings with those of her husband as soon as received, keeping no separate account thereof, and then took the money for the assessments from the common fund. Savage v. Modern Woodmen (1911) 84 Kan. 63, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 773, 113 Pac. 802.

And in Gaston v. Clabaugh (1920) 106 Kan. 160, 186 Pac. 1023, where the controversy was between a daughter of the insured, who claimed to have been substituted as beneficiary, and the insured's wife and other children who were designated as the original beneficiaries, there was evidence of an agreement between the latter and the insured that if they would pay the premium the policy would be left without change of beneficiaries, and there was also testimony that the original beneficiaries paid the premiums with the exception of several of the later ones, which they would have paid had they not received word that they had been paid by another, the court allowed a recovery by the original beneficiaries, overruling a demurrer filed by the daughter who claimed to have been substituted, which set up that all the members of the family were living together as a family when the assessments were paid, and that they had no personal earnings that they put into the premiums.

And in Spengler v. Spengler (1903) 65 N. J. Eq. 176, 55 Atl. 285, also, it is impliedly recognized that the payment of assessments by the beneficiary, in reliance upon a valid agreement on the part of the member that the beneficiary should have the certificate absolutely if she would pay the premiums until his death, would prevent a change of beneficiaries. The difficulty in this case was that such agreement, if made at all, was made on Sunday, and was therefore invalid.

It is not clear whether or not the decision in Maynard v. Vanderwerker (1893) 30 Abb. N. C. 134, 24 N. Y. Supp. 932, holding that a beneficiary who had paid assessments on the certificate under an agreement with the member to do so acquired a vested right which could not be defeated by a change of beneficiaries, was rendered upon the assumption that the agreement included an express promise not to change beneficiaries. The decision was reversed by the general term in (1894) 76 Hun, 25, 27 N. Y. Supp. 714, upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show any agreement between the parties.

In Clark v. Loftus (1912) 26 Ont. L. Rep. 204, 21 Ont. Week. Rep. 705, 4 D. L. R. 39, there was held to be no binding agreement shown by the insured with his wife, who was one of the original beneficiaries, that he would not change the beneficiary, although there was evidence that, when he was bankrupt, he told his wife, who had property, that it would be for her interest and that of their children to pay the assessments, and that she did so; and a change of beneficiaries was given effect in the case.

The fact that a husband names his wife as beneficiary, and gives her the certificate with the intent that it shall be hers, and pays the dues thereon with community funds, does not give her such a vested interest therein as to deprive the husband of the power of substituting another beneficiary. Cade v. Head Camp, P. J. W. W. (1902) 27 Wash. 218, 67 Pac. 603.

The failure of the beneficiary, without the fault of the member, to perform the agreement on his part to continue to pay the assessments, which constitutes the consideration for his designation as beneficiary, will deprive the beneficiary of any vested right which he or she might otherwise have in the certificate, and enable the member to designate new beneficiaries as he see fit. Masonic Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Tolles (1898) 70 Conn. 537, 40 Atl. 449; Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Schworm (1899) 80 Mo. App. 64; Eatman v. Eatman (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 165.

In Knights of Modern Maccabees v. Sharp (1910) 163 Mich. 449, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 780, 128 N. W. 786, it was held that where a husband and wife mutually insured their lives for the benefit of each other, and further agreed that the survivor would continue the insurance for the benefit of their children, such agreement could not be enforced by the children so as to prevent the survivor from changing the beneficiaries.

The case of Brown v. Modern Woodmen (1916) 97 Kan. 665, L.R.A.1916E, 588, 156 Pac. 767, is not strictly within the scope of this annotation, as the question there involved was the right to the benefit of a certificate as between one who had made advances to the insured under an agreement that he should be substituted as beneficiary, which agreement was not fully carried out according to the by-laws, and the sons of the insured, who had never been designated as beneficiaries. It was held in that case that while ordinarily a member of a benefit society has no vested right to the fund, still, by an agreement to change beneficiaries in consideration of funds advanced, he may so bind himself as to preclude his beneficiary or heirs from asserting their claim to the proceeds against a party who advanced large sums on the strength of such agreement, although a complete change of beneficiary was not made in accordance with the constitution and by-laws; and it was held that evidence of the facts in the case should have been received, and the case determined upon equitable considerations.

III. Effect of voluntary payment of dues or assessments.

It appears well settled that the mere voluntary payment of assessments upon a benefit certificate by the beneficiary named therein, without any agreement with the member to do so, will not deprive the latter of the right to change beneficiaries, or entitle the beneficiary originally named, to the insurance fund as against a subsequent beneficiary named by the member in accordance with the rules of the association. Jory v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. (1894) 105 Cal. 20, 26 L.R.A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17, 38 Pac. 524; Masonic Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Tolles (1898) 70 Conn. 537, 40 Atl. 448; Supreme Lodge, N. E. O. P. v. Hine (1909) 82 Conn. 315, 73 Atl. 791; Beckner v. Beckner (1898) 104 Ga. 219, 30 S. E. 622; Pike County Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Berry (1919) 214 Ill. App. 316; Leaf v. Leaf (1889) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 47; New Era Asso. v. Kuyat (1916) 191 Mich. 646, 158 N. W. 119; Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. McGrath (1903) 133 Mich. 626, 95 N. W. 739; Supreme Tent, K. M. v. Altmann (1908) 134 Mo. App. 363, 114 S. W. 1107; Spengler v. Spengler (1903) 65 N. J. Eq. 176, 55 Atl. 285; Fisk v. Equitable Aid Union (1887) 7 Sadler (Pa.) 567, 20 W. N. C. 290, 11 Atl. 84; Heasley v. Heasley (1899) 191 Pa. 539, 43 Atl. 364; Cade v. Head Camp, P. J. W. W. (1902) 27 Wash. 218, 67 Pac. 603; Preusser v. Supreme Hive, L. M. W. (1904) 123 Wis. 164, 101 N. W. 358.

In Spengler v. Spengler (1903) 65 N. J. Eq. 176, 55 Atl. 285, supra, the court said, in support of this rule: "She [the original beneficiary] has notice that her husband [a member] may at any time change the beneficiary, and she has no lawful agreement binding him not to do so. If he does what he has a right to do, and what she knows he has a right to do, I do not see how, in a legal sense, she can complain. Her payments are referable to the papers as we find it, and to nothing else." In this case the court held that the original beneficiary was not even entitled to be refunded the premiums that she had paid while she was the beneficiary named in the certificate.

260, it was held that, in the absence of a special provision of law or a rule of the association to the contrary, the naming of a person as beneficiary in a benefit certificate issued by a fraternal benefit association does not confer a vested right upon the beneficiary, but merely an expectancy which may be defeated at any time by the insured's act, although the beneficiary has paid some, or all, of the assessments out of her separate estate, the payments in the case, apparently, being voluntarily made by the beneficiary, without and definite agreement with the insured.

And in Pike County Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Berry (1919) 214 Ill. App. 316, where a benefit certificate was payable to the insured's wife and children, it was held that the wife might recover the amount paid by her for dues prior to her divorce, but that she could not recover those paid thereafter in the interest of her children, as a mere voluntary payment of dues does not give a beneficiary a vested equitable interest, or any right to the proceeds of the certificates.

And it appears in New Era Asso. v. Kuyat (1916) 191 Mich. 646, 158 N. W. 119, where a wife was originally named as sole beneficiary in a certificate, that she paid most of the premiums; but it is not stated that this was under any agreement with the insured, and his change of beneficiary, by which a part of the benefit was given to his sister, was held valid.

In Tudor v. Tudor (1891) 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 422, however, it was held that where a member stopped paying dues and assessments on a certificate payable to his children, and separated from his wife, when the latter continued to pay them until his death, he had lost his right to change the beneficiaries, and the children were entitled to the fund as against the member's mother, whom he attempted to substitute as beneficiary, although it did not appear that the wife paid the assessments under any agreement with the husband to do so. v.

COUNTY OF PIERCE et al., Respts.

Washington Supreme Court (In Banc)—May 28, 1921.

(— Wash. —, 198 Pac. 377.)

Eminent domain — public improvement — consequential injury.

1. Injury to riparian property by turning the course of a stream against it within the channel, when changing the course of the channel to protect the roads and bridges of the county, is not consequential within the rule that no recovery can be had for consequential injuries from public improvements.

Waters — straightening of stream — liability for injury.

2. The rule of nonliability of the state for injury to riparian property caused by improving the navigation of a stream is not applicable to improvements to prevent the overflow of the stream to protect the roads and bridges of a county.

— water within river — liability for dealing with flood water.

3. The rule with respect to dealing with flood water out of the banks of a river does not apply to determine the liability of a county for erosion of banks by water within the river, because of the straightening of the channel to prevent overflows.

— protection against floods — change of channel of stream.

4. A private individual cannot so change the course of a stream in his efforts to protect his own property from flood waters that he will flood or erode the property of another.

Constitutional law — damaging property for public use — liability.

5. A county injuring private property by changing the course of a stream to protect its roads and bridges cannot, under a Constitution requiring compensation for taking or damaging property, avoid liability for the injuries on the ground that it is acting as a representative of the state, or is acting for the good of the public, or on the theory that the individual must suffer for the public good.

— police power — taking property for public use.

6. The police power is not inconsistent with or antagonistic to the rules of law concerning the taking of private property for public use.

Waters — straightening stream — protecting roads and bridges — police power.

7. A county in straightening the course of a navigable stream under legislative authority, for the protection of its roads and bridges against floods, is not exercising the police power so as to be protected against liability for injury thereby done to private property.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County (Clifford, J.) in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for erosion of land, alleged to have been caused by changes and improvements made by them in a certain river. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Davis & Neal, for appellant:

Defendants were liable for injuries sustained by reason of its careless and negligent acts.

The riparian owner is entitled to have the stream take its natural and usual course by his property, and if it is diverted and its course and channel changed so as to drive it into the bank and cause erosion, such action on the part of the person causing such diversion renders him liable in damages for injuries sustained.

Bridges, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to recover damages caused by certain erosions, the result, it is alleged, of changes in, and improvements of, the Puyallup river, made by the defendants, which river, in part, forms the boundary line between the defendant counties, and empties into Commencement bay, at or near Tacoma. The complaint alleged, and the plaintiff's testimony tended to show, the following facts:

On December 17, 1917, and for a number of years prior thereto, the Tacoma Meat Company, a corporation, owned a small tract of land bordering on the Puyallup river, near its mouth, on which land it had erected various buildings in which it had carried on a general slaughtering and packing establishment. Within these buildings were considerable quantities of valuable machinery and other personal property. Prior to the making of the improvements hereinafter mentioned, the Puyallup river was a tortuous, navigable stream, which had been in the habit of overflowing its banks during the rainy seasons, and thus doing much damage to the bridges, roads, and other public property of the defendants. In 1913 the legislature enacted a law which authorized any two counties, under certain circumstances, to jointly improve streams which flowed through both of such counties, or formed the boundary line between them, so as to correct, as far as might be, their habit of overflowing their banks and thereby causing damage. By virtue of this enactment the defendants entered into a contract, under date of January 19, 1914, for the purpose of straightening and deepening the channel of the Puyallup river, and abating the flood tendencies. This contract formed a district within which such improvements should be made, and the plaintiff's property is located in the extreme northwesterly portion of such district.

After entering into the contract, the counties proceeded to make the improvements, and in many places they straightened the stream, and widened and deepened it, and placed various improvements along and upon the banks, with a view of keeping the waters from eroding them. A few hundred feet immediately above the plaintiff's property the river, previous to its improvement, took a wide bend to the southwest, and as the waters so ran they were in the habit of hitting the northeasterly bank at a point slightly up-stream from the plaintiff's property, which act caused the waters to be deflected in such a way that very little, if any, erosion had occurred on the plaintiff's property in many years. In improving the stream the defendants eliminated the bend just mentioned, by causing the channel of the stream to be straightened, and as a result of such straightening, and the placing of concrete blocks on the banks for their protection, the waters of the stream were caused to come forcibly in contact with the bank on which plaintiff's property was situated, and during a high freshet in the winter of 1917, and after the defendants had completed their work of improving the river, there was such erosion of the plaintiff's lands as to cause its buildings to lose their foundations, and to be floated, together with their contents, out into Commencement bay, or Puget Sound. The particular causes of the erosions are alleged to be the straightening of the channel in such manner as to throw the current of the stream against the river bank at the point of plaintiff's location, the placing of concrete protection on the bank opposite and a little above plaintiff's property in such way as to deflect the waters against the bank of the river where plaintiff's improvements were located, and the failure of the defendants to protect the banks along that part of the stream where plaintiff's property was situated.

When the plaintiff had rested its case, the trial court granted the defendants' motion to take the case from the jury and enter judgment dismissing the action. Later, such judgment was made and entered, and the plaintiff has appealed. Since there was sufficient testimony to carry the case to the jury on the theory that respondents' acts had caused the damages suffered by appellant, we will henceforth speak of the damage as being caused by respondents, realizing, of course, that, at best, it was a question for the jury.

The arguments before this court have taken such a wide and varied range that it seems necessary for us at this time to show what the exact question before us is. In the first place, the appellant is not seeking any damage because its land and property were flooded. As a matter of fact, the waters at the time in question were so high as that all of plaintiff's property was flooded; but plaintiff seeks recovery only for damage done by erosion of his lands. In this way the direct question of damage by flooding is not involved. The testimony tends to show that the erosion was caused by such of the waters as were in the channel of the stream, and that the overflow waters did not cause any erosion. Again, although this stream is navigable within the improved district, we have concluded for injury.

that the law applicable to improving navigable streams in aid of navigation is not directly involved. While the improvements made by the respondents may or may not have improved the stream for navigation, the purpose of the improvement was not in aid of navigation, but to correct the tendency of the stream to overflow its banks. The legislative enactment authorizing the counties to do this work (Laws 1913, p. 156) does not contemplate the improvement of the stream for the purpose of making it more navigable. Its title, which is as follows, quite correctly shows the purpose of the act: "An Act Authorizing Counties to Contract Together for Administrative and Financial Co-operation in the Improvement, Confinement and Protection of Rivers and the Banks, Tributaries and Outlets Thereof, Whose Waters Flowing into or through Such Counties Work Damage by Inundation or Otherwise, Authorizing the Levy of Taxes and the Creation and Disbursement of Special Funds for Such Purposes, Delegating the Power of Eminent Domain in Aid of, and Providing Generally Ways and Means for the Accomplishment of Such Purposes and the Performance of Such Contracts."

The direct question before us is whether a county which straightens and otherwise improves a navigable stream for the purpose of preventing it from overflowing its banks and thereby doing damage to the public property, where such improvements are made by virtue of express authority of the legislature, is liable to a landowner, if because of such improvements, and the manner in which they are made, his property is eroded and washed away. The trial court stated its position, and, as we understand it, that of the respondents, in the following language: "The Puyallup river, at the point in controversy, is a navigable and tidal stream. The state, in its sovereign right, is owner of the bed and banks and body of the stream, and as such owner may make such changes in the course of the river, and may improve the same by widening or deepening or straightening a channel, or in any other manner it may see fit, and it is not liable to the owner of the shore land for any damage that may result from so doing, either directly or indirectly. It owes no duty to the shore landowner to protect him from resulting damage on account of any improvement the state may make upon its own property in the banks or bed of the stream, and the shore landowner has no right to any protection from the result of the state's acts in dealing with the river channel and the waters flowing therein."

The parties to the action have elaborately discussed the law of out-law, or surface, waters. In our opinion, those questions are not in this case, and to undertake to discuss them would be to create confusion in a question already sufficiently difficult. The appellant is complaining only of the action of those portions of the waters which were within the bed of the stream. It is not complaining of any overflowed, outlaw, or surface waters. Certainly, so long as the waters are confined to the bed and banks of the stream, they cannot be outlaw waters.

It seems certain that, had a private individual or private corporation caused the damage which the appellant alleges, there would be a liability. While a private individual has a right, under certain circumstances, to protect himself against overflow, surface, and outlaw waters, he cannot so change the stream, in an effort to protect his own property, as that he will thereby flood or erode the property of someone else. It seems to us that the authorities are quite unanimous in this regard. A few of them are as follows: Judson v. Tide Water Lumber Co. 51 Wash. 164, 98 Pac. 377; *Johnson v. But respondents contend that when they improved this river they were acting under direct legislative authority, and that what they did was for the state, and that when the state, either directly or through its appointed agents, acts for the good of the public, it cannot be made to respond for damages which may result to the private individual. They advocate the doctrine that the private individual, under such circumstances, must suffer for the public good. A wilderness of authorities are cited both in support of and against this proposition. It seems to us that a recurrence to certain fundamental principles may assist us in reaching a correct conclusion. One of the greatest contributions of the English-speaking people to civilization is the protection by law of the private individual in the enjoyment of his property and his personal liberties, against the demands and aggressions of the public. No better illustration of the progressive growth of this principle can be found than that contained in our various state constitutions, with reference to the taking of private property for a public use. It has been said that this power is a necessary incident to government, and was before, and did not grow out of, constitutions. If so, the Federal constitutional provision that private property should not be taken for a public use without compensation being made was but a written expression of a right which already existed, being placed in the Constitution for the purpose of emphasizing the desire to protect the rights of the individual. The national Constitution and the constitutions of the earlier states went no farther than to provide that private property should not be taken for public use without compensation being made. Later constitutions added to these provisions the idea that the compensation must be made before the taking is accomplished. Still later constitutions, including that of the state of Washington, added an additional element, to wit, that private property may not be taken or damaged for the public use without compensation being first made. State Const. art. 1, § 16. It is true that this is not an eminent domain proceeding, but the principles of law involved in the power to take private property for a public use are involved here, because respondents are seeking to justify the damage alleged to have been done by them on the theory that they were acting by virtue of law, and as an arm of the state, and for the use of the state, and for the public good.

Since, therefore, our Constitution expressly forbids the taking or damaging of private property for a public use, except upon just compensation first made, on what theory can respondents be relieved from any damage to appellant's property as a direct result of the improvements which were made in the Puyallup river? Certainly not simply because they were acting as an arm of the state, or alone because they were acting for the good of the public, or simply on the theory that the individual must suffer for the public good. To hold that they would be relieved on any of these grounds would be entirely to disregard the express provisions of our Constitution. The state itself cannot take or damage private property for a public use, without compensating the owner; nor can it authorize a taking or damaging which is prohibited to it. The only other principle of law under which respondents might be relieved would be the police power of the sovereign, because the only ways known to the law whereby private property may be taken or damaged by the public are by the principles of eminent domain or those of the police power. (If there may be a taking by taxation, that principle does not interest us here.) Indeed, it is the police power theory upon which respondents seem most strongly to rely. It is probable that this power is the most exalted attribute of government, and, like the power of eminent domain, it existed before and independently of constitutions. It is easy to understand the principles upon which the police power doctrine is based, but difficult to define in language its limitations. It is not inconsistent with or antagonistic to the rules of law concerning the taking of private property for a public use. Because of its elasticity, and the inability to define or fix its exact limitations, there is sometimes a natural tendency on the part of the courts to stretch this power in order to bridge over otherwise difficult situations; and for like reasons it is a power most likely to be abused. It has been defined as an inherent power in the state, which permits it to prevent all things harmful to the comfort, welfare, and safety of society. It is based on necessity. It is exercised for the benefit of the public health, peace, and welfare. Regulating and restricting the use of private property in the interest of the public is its chief business. It is the basis of the idea that the private individual must suffer without other compensation than the benefit to be received by the general public. It does not authorize the taking or damaging of private property in the sense used in the constitutions with reference to taking such property for a public use. Eminent domain takes private property for a public use, while the police power regulates its use and enjoyment, or, if it takes or damages it, it is not a taking or damaging for the public use, but to conserve the safety, morals, health, and general welfare of the public. Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 6, writes of this subject: "Everyone is bound so to use his own property as not to interfere with the reasonable use and enjoyment by others of their property. For a violation of this duty the law provides a civil remedy. Besides this obligation, which every property owner is under to the owners of neighboring property, he is also bound so to use and enjoy his own as not to interfere with the general welfare of the community in which he lives. It is the enforcement of this last duty which pertains to the police power of the state, so far as the exercise of that power affects private property. Whatever restraints the legislature imposes upon the use and enjoyment of property within the reason and principle of this duty, the owner must submit to, and, for any inconvenience or loss which he sustains thereby, he is without remedy. It is a regulation, and not a taking; an exercise of police power, and not of eminent domain. But the moment the legislature passes beyond mere regulation, and attempts to deprive the individual of his property, or of some substantial interest therein, under pretense of regulation, then the act becomes one of eminent domain, and is subject to the obligations and limitations which attend an exercise of that power."

In the case of Askam v. King County, 9 Wash. 1, 36 Pac. 1097, speaking of police power, this court said: "While it is undoubtedly true that in extreme emergencies the rights of private parties as to property must yield to the requirements of the public, yet to authorize such interference the emergency must be such as to make the action necessary."

The specific question, then, is: Were the respondents in the exercise of the police power in making the improvements they made in the river in question? Our answer must be in the negative.

The legislative act under which they made the improvement is entirely bare of any expression which would indicate that the legislature considered that public necessity demanded or required the making of the improvement. Section 1, chap. 54, p. 156, Laws 1913, being the act by virtue of which these improvements were made, provides that whenever any river shall flow in part through two counties, or shall form the boundary line between them, ". . . and the waters thereof have in the past been the cause of damage, by inundation or otherwise, to the roads, bridges or other public property situate in or to other public interests of both such counties, or the flow of such waters shall have alternated between the said counties so at one time or times such waters shall have caused damage to one county and at another time or times to the other county, and it shall be deemed by the boards of county commissioners of both counties to be for the public interests of their respective counties that the flow of such waters be definitely confined to a particular channel, situate in whole or in part in either county, . . ." then the counties interested may jointly make the desired improvement. The act provides that the expense of making such improvement shall be raised by an annual tax on all the property in the county, which tax is to be levied and collected as any other county tax. The act nowhere intimates that the counties would be relieved from any damages that may be done to private property; on the contrary, they are authorized to exercise the power of eminent domain for the purpose of acquiring lands on which the river may be straightened. The contract between the respondents, under which the work was done, directly recognizes that the river in the past has overflowed its banks and thereby damaged the roads, bridges, and other private property of the two counties, and that because thereof litigation between them had arisen, and that the purpose of the contemplated improvement is to settle such pending litigation and make improbable future suits, and to avoid future damage to the roads and bridges of the two counties. It will thus be seen that this improvement was not made to preserve public health, peace, morals, or welfare; it was not done to reclaim large tracts of land which otherwise might have been a waste; the idea of impelling necessity, which seems to be the chief ingredient of the police power, is entirely absent. Respondents cite many cases which they contend support them in their argument of nonliability. While we have carefully read all of them, we cannot here take the space to digest them, nor even cite all of them. The leading ones are Lamb v. Reclamation Dist. 73 Cal. 125, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775, 14 Pac. 625; Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission, 241 U. S. 351, 60 L. ed. 1041, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 671; Bass v. State, 34 La. Ann. 494; Hughes v. United States, 230 U. S. 24, 57 L. ed. 1374, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 624, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019; McCoy v. Plum Bayou Levee Dist. 95 Ark. 345, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 396, 129 S. W. 1097; Bedford v. United States, 192 U. S. 217, 48 L. ed. 414, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 238; Gray v. Reclamation Dist. 174 Cal. 622, 163 Pac. 1024.

The decisions in some of these cases are based upon constitutional provisions which only prohibit the taking of private property without compensation, and are, therefore,—at least, to that extent,—not in point, in view of our constitutional provision. Others of the cases cited involve improvements made in aid of navigation, and are not in point or material here. Others of the cited cases arise in instances where the state, or some subdivision of it, has made improvements in streams solely for the purpose of preventing them from overflowing their banks, and by such improvements reclaiming or saving to the state and its people large tracts of land which are essential to the welfare of the public. Of this class, the case of McCoy v. Plum Bayou Levee Dist. 95 Ark. 345, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 396, 129 S. W. 1097, concerning the Arkansas river, and Gray v. Reclamation Dist. supra, concerning the Sacramento river, may be considered leading cases. The last-cited case is, particularly, elaborately considered by the California supreme court. The reclamation district in that case built dikes, levees, and other works purely for the purpose of confining the waters of the Sacramento river within its banks, in order to reclaim very extensive tracts of otherwise valueless lands. Because of such improvements the plaintiff's lands were overflowed and damaged. The court applied the police power to these facts, and held the district was not liable. Without approving or disapproving the conclusion of the court in that case, and in others along the same line, they are easily distinguishable from the case at bar. In those cases there are elements on which the police power is rightly based, but which facts are entirely absent from the case at bar. There the controlling purpose of the improvement was to reclaim and save to the people large tracts of rich lands, which, because of inundation, were worthless. To that extent the public welfare was involved. Here, the controlling purpose was the protection of the roads and bridges of the respondent counties. Neither the state nor the people of the state or counties were interested in the improvement, except in a very indirect way, and as taxpayers.

We are confident that any damage that may have been done by the respondents cannot be excused under any reasonable interpretation of the law of police power. While no cases exactly in point have been cited or found by us, the following are a few of a great number which, in principle, support our views: Burroughs v. Grays Harbor Boom Co. 44 Wash. 630, 87 Pac. 937; Askam v. King County, supra; Ordway v. Canisteo, 66 Hun, 569, 21 N. Y. Supp. 835; Noonan v. Albany, 79 N. Y. 470, 35 Am. Rep. 540; Bradburry v. Vandalia Levee & Drainage Dist. 236 Ill. 36, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 991, 86 N. E. 163, 15 Ann. Cas. 904; Barden v. Portage, 79 Wis. 126, 48 N. W. 210; Jefferson v. Hicks, 23 Okla. 684, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 214, 102 Pac. 79; Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 115, 285, 306.

In the case of Burroughs v. Grays Harbor Boom Co. supra, the facts were that the driving company had built several splash dams for the purpose of creating artificial freshets, in order to assist in the driving of saw logs down the river towards market. The testimony showed that these artificial freshets caused Burroughs's lands to be eroded. The latter, by his action, sought, among other things, to enjoin the creation of artificial freshets because of the damage they did to his lands. Substantially the same argument was made by the driving company in that case as is made by the respondents here. It was there contended that the driving company was a quasi public corporation, directly authorized by legislative act, to create artificial freshets for the public good, and that it could not be held liable for damages caused by them. This court refused to adopt that view, and held that, if the driving company caused Burroughs's lands to be eroded by its artificial freshets, it would be liable therefor in damages. Answering this argument, Judge Dunbar, speaking for the court, said: "This provision of the fundamental law [our constitutional provision with reference to taking of private property for public use] was construed by this court, in Brown v. Seattle, 5 Wash. 35, 18 L.R.A. 161, 31 Pac. 313, 32 Pac. 214, and in many subsequent cases, to mean just what it said; and it can make no possible difference whether the property abuts on a street or river, or whether the invader of that right is a municipality, an individual, or a boom company. The constitutional guaranty applies equally in both cases."

Why, indeed, on general principles, should not the counties be liable if the damage to appellant is the direct result of the changing of the river channel and the currents of the stream? The counties were protecting themselves and their roads and bridges. May they do this in such a way as to injure private property without becoming liable therefor? Certainly not. They are in no better position than would be an individual who should do exactly the same thing. By the legislative authority they had a right to straighten the stream and change the currents thereof, but that legislative authority did not absolve them from liability for such damages as might directly result from such improvements.

But respondents contend that, in any event, they are not liable here, because the damage to appellant was not the direct result of improvements made by them, but was only what is sometimes termed indirect, or consequential, damages, for which there can be no liability. It is difficult to give any definition showing the difference between a direct and an indirect or consequential damage. This, however, may be easily shown by certain illustrations. Private property may be damaged, and its value lessened, because it is located close to some public building, such as a jail, or hospital, or public hall, yet such damage is purely incidental and not recoverable. The noise consequent on the operation of railroad trains upon a private right of way may depreciate the value of adjoining private property, and be an annoyance to those living in the immediate neighborhood, but such damage is purely consequential and is not recoverable. But the injury to appellant's property, if caused as contended for by it, cannot be considered of this nature. Eminent domain—public improvement—consequential injury.

The alleged erosion of its land, and thereby the destruction of its property, would be the direct result of the act of the respondents in straightening the channels of the river, and thereby changing the currents of the stream. There was testimony tending to show that respondents' engineers must of necessity have known that the improvements which they were making would cause the appellant's property to be eroded, and probably washed away. Under these conditions it cannot be said that the damages are so remote and disconnected with the improvement of the river as to be purely incidental or consequential.

Briefly, we hold that, if the damage in question was caused by the action of respondents in straightening the Puyallup river, and thereby changing its currents, then the appellant is entitled to have its case submitted to a jury. It follows from what we have said that the trial court erred in taking the case from the jury. The judgment dismissing the action is reversed, and the cause remanded for trial.

Parker, Ch. J., and Mackintosh, Fullerton, Main, Tolman, and Mitchell, JJ., concur.

Holcomb, J., dissenting:

The foregoing opinion is an exceedingly able and admirable one, but I am unable to bring myself to concur in it. I agree with the conclusions of the trial judge quoted in the majority opinion.

I am firmly of the opinion that the act under which the work was done by the counties was an act under the police power. The improvements were certainly for the public welfare. It is assuredly in the interests of public welfare to improve the stream, so as to prevent flooding and destruction of county roads and bridges. If the safety of travel by the public is not the public welfare, it is difficult to conceive what would be.

It is determined that the Puyallup river is a navigable river. As such, its sovereignty is in the state, the state having asserted absolute title and control of the beds, shores, and banks of navigable rivers. It is determined that the work by the counties was lawfully performed, and the counties had previously obtained the necessary rights of way and made compensation for any damage by reason of such taking and change of the channel of the stream. Therefore, the damage to appellant, if attributable to respondents, is consequent upon a lawful act of respondents, and is damnum absque injuria. Wiel, Water Rights, § 248; Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 995; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 300; Hill v. Newell, 86 Wash. 227, 149 Pac. 951; Schank v. Hines, 112 Wash. 612, 192 Pac. 1016.

Other authorities could be cited from our own and other courts, but the above citations are sufficient to sustain my view.

I therefore dissent.

ANNOTATION.

May paramount right of public to improve navigability of stream without compensating riparian owner for resulting damage be extended to improvements for purposes not in aid of navigation.

It may be observed that in the majority of the cases cited in the annotation the improvement consisted in a diversion of the water, or an alteration along the shore, which deprived the riparian owner of access, and not in such a change in the channel of the river itself as caused overflow or erosion. The cases are cited not because of their similarity on facts, or because they are necessarily controlled by the same principles, but for the reason that, at least in the discussion of the particular question before the court, they throw light on the subject indicated in the above title and passed upon in the reported case (CONGER v. PIERCE COUNTY, ante, 393).

The courts have gone far toward relieving the public from liability for damages to riparian owners on a navigable stream, due to alterations in the stream by or under public authority for the purpose of improving navigation. The theory seems to be that such owners hold their property subject to the paramount right of the government to improve the stream for navigation purposes, and must bear the incidental consequences of the lawful and proper use of a governmental power. This doctrine is well illustrated by the holding in Gibson v. United States (1897) 166 U. S. 269, 41 L. ed. 996, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578, which is followed in numerous decisions of the Federal and state courts. In this case, the owner of a valuable farm having a frontage on the Ohio river was unable to use the landing for the shipment of products from and supplies to the farm for the greater part of the gardening season on account of obstruction, except during a high stage of the water which occurred in the winter and spring months, by a dike constructed under authority of an act of Congress to improve navigation in the river. The court, in holding that the claimant could not recover damages from the government, although the value of her land had been greatly reduced, said: "All navigable waters are under the control of the United States for the purpose of regulating and improving navigation, and, although the title to the shore and submerged soil is in the various states and individual owners under them, it is always subject to the servitude in respect to navigation created in favor of the Federal government by the Constitution. . . . The 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that private property shall not 'be taken for public use without just compensation.' Here, however, the damage of which Mrs. Gibson complained was not the result of the taking of any part of her property, whether upland or submerged, or a direct invasion thereof, but the incidental consequence of the lawful and proper exercise of a governmental power. . . . Moreover, riparian ownership is subject to the obligation to suffer the consequences of the improvement of navigation in the exercise of the dominant right of the government in that regard. The legislative authority for these works consisted simply in an appropriation for their construction, but this was an assertion of a right belonging to the government, to which riparian property was subject, and not of a right to appropriate private property, not burdened with such servitude, to public purposes."

And by way of illustration, attention is called to the more recent case of Tempel v. United States (1918) 248 U. S. 121, 63 L. ed. 162, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56, where the court, in a suit by a riparian owner to recover the value of property taken by the Federal government by dredging in the Chicago river for the purpose of improving navigation, said: "Under the law of Illinois, neither the United States nor the state owns the lands under a navigable river. Riparian owners own the fee to the middle of the stream . . . subject to the paramount right of the government to use the same and to make improvements therein for purposes of navigation, without the payment of compensation."

On the general rule, it is said in 27 R. C. L. § 242: "It is generally held that riparian ownership is subject to the obligation to suffer the consequences of the improvement of navigation in the exercise of the dominant right of the government to make it. The rule that a state is not liable for consequential injuries inflicted on private property by the improvement of the navigation of a river is based on the principle that the improvement is part of the state's governmental duties; that the work which is done towards such improvement is done in the discharge of the governmental powers of the state; that the land of the riparian proprietor within the state is subject to the just exercise of this power; and that, when the state undertakes to exercise its governmental power, the public good is paramount to the consequential injury to land which is incidentally and naturally affected by the improvement."

In view of the doctrine, above indicated, that riparian owners on a navigable stream hold their property subject to the right of the Federal government, or of the states, to make alterations in the stream for the purpose of improving navigation, without awarding compensation where there is not a direct taking of the property, the question arises as to whether this doctrine is limited to cases in which the purpose of the alterations is to improve navigation, or whether the riparian owner may be regarded as holding his property subject to the paramount authority of the public to make alterations or improvements in the stream, without compensation, for other purposes. This question, which seems to have evoked discussion in only a few cases, should not be confused with the question whether, under the particular circumstances, there has been such a taking of the property, distinguished from merely consequential damages, as gives rise to a valid claim for compensation. The latter is an entirely different question from the one under consideration, although it arises in many cases, on facts similar to those in the cases cited in the annotation. Thus, if for some purpose other than improving navigation the riparian owner is cut off from access to the stream, or there is an interference with such access, and the public claim the right to make the alteration or improvement in question without compensation to the riparian owner, such claim may be asserted on the ground that the public has a paramount right, not only to improve the stream for navigation purposes, but for other purposes, without making compensation; or on the ground that private property is not taken within the meaning of constitutional provisions. The present annotation is concerned only with cases where a claim of nonliability is predicated on the former ground. It should not, therefore, be regarded as covering such questions as whether a riparian owner on a navigable stream has a right to damages for interference with his access to the stream through improvements made by or under public authority (many of these being made, of course, in aid of navigation), or whether water may be diverted from a navigable stream by the public, without a liability for damages to riparian owners injuriously affected. In fact, it should be recognized that the annotation purports to include only those cases which have discussed the question indicated in the above title.

Although, as before indicated, the question under consideration has arisen in only a few cases, the authorities directly, or, at least, by the language of the opinions, support the view that the doctrine which permits the public to improve a navigable stream without compensation to riparian owners injuriously affected,—in other words, the doctrine which subjects such riparian owners to the paramount right of the government in this regard,—does not extend to improvements for other purposes. See Beidler v. Sanitary Dist. (1904) 211 Ill. 628, 67 L.R.A. 820, 71 N.E. 1118; Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall (1841) 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 404; Re New York (1901) 168 N. PIERCE COUNTY* (reported herewith) ante, 393; Green Bay & M. Canal Co. v. Kaukauna Water Power Co. (Patten Paper Co. v. Kaukauna Water Power Co.) (1895) 90 Wis. 370, 28 L.R.A. 443, 48 Am. St.

Rep. 937, 61 N. W. 1121, 63 N. W. 1019.

An important case on the question is CONGER v. PIERCE COUNTY (reported herewith) ante, 393, in which the court held that the rule of nonliability of the state for injury to riparian property, caused by improving the navigation of a stream, is not applicable to improvements to prevent the overflow of the stream to protect the roads and bridges of a county; and that a county in straightening the course of a navigable stream under legislative authority, for the protection of its roads and bridges against floods, is not exercising the police power so as to be protected against liability for injuries thereby done to private property. It may be noted that it was held, also, that injuries to riparian property by turning the course of a stream against it within the channel, and changing the course of the channel to protect the roads and bridges of the county, is not consequential within the rule that no recovery can be had for consequential injuries from public improvements.

In the CONGER CASE the action was to recover damages by erosion, alleged to have been caused by improvements made by the county under legislative authority, in straightening, deepening, and otherwise improving a navigable stream, the controlling purpose being the protection of the roads and bridges of the county. Through the straightening of the channel and the placing of concrete blocks on the banks for their protection, the waters were deflected in such a way as to cause the erosion of the plaintiff's land. There seems little doubt that under the doctrine of the United States Supreme Court cases previously cited, and others of that nature, had the improvement been for the purpose of improving navigation, the county would not have been liable. But the court held that the law applicable to improving navigable streams in aid of navigation was not directly involved, and that the county might, under the circumstances, be held liable.

The rule itself, which places the loss arising from improvements in aid of navigation on the riparian owner, seems a harsh one, and in view of this the limitation of the rule made in the CONGER CASE seems commendable from an equitable point of view.

Although the improvement was not in the stream itself, and, so far as the facts are concerned, the case is merely representative of a class of decisions not included herein, the limitation last referred to, where the improvement is not made in aid of navigation, is supported also by Re New York (1901) 168 N. Y. 134, 56 L.R.A. 500, 61 N. E. 158, where an owner of property fronting on the Harlem river, in New York city, sought damages from the city for injury to his riparian rights through the construction by it, under legislative authority, of a speedway along the tideway of the river, thereby depriving him of access to the river. The use of the speedway was limited to the pursuit of pleasure in driving, riding, or walking, and all forms of commercial traffic were rigidly excluded therefrom. It was held that there was no authority in the public for constructing the same, without compensation to the riparian owner for the injury caused thereby, although, if the improvement had been in aid of navigation, the court said, there would have been no right to compensation.

Because of the small amount of judicial discussion on the present question, it seems advisable to refer at some length to the reasoning of the court in Re New York (N. Y.) supra. It was said: "The appellant herein, while conceding the right of the state or municipality to make improvements for the benefit of navigation without compensation to riparian proprietors for invasion of their private rights, contends that the construction of a speedway, from which are excluded all forms of commercial traffic or intercourse, is not an exercise of that right, and that, therefore, his riparian rights cannot be taken or destroyed without due compensation. . . . The state holds the title in fee in the tideway, and to the lands under water beyond the same, as trustee for the public in its organized capacity. As such trustee, and in the exercise of its governmental functions, it may improve the tideway, or the adjacent waters, for the benefit of navigation, even to the detriment of abutting upland owners, and without compensation to them. As stated in Sage v. New York (1897) 154 N. Y. 70, 38 L.R.A. 606, 61 Am. St. Rep. 592, 47 N. E. 1096, this rule is based upon the principle that, 'when any public authority conveys lands bounded by tidewater, it is impliedly subject to those paramount uses to which government, as trustee for the public, may be called upon to apply the water front for the promotion of commerce and the general welfare.' Does this principle of implied or reserved power extend to any public use of the tideway, or the waters beyond the same, for purposes not related to, or connected with, navigation and commerce? The basis of the theory upon which the trusteeship of the state in our tideways and tidewaters is founded seems to be that there are certain rights of navigation and commerce by water which are common to all, and are, therefore, paramount to the rights of individuals. As was said in People v. New York & S. I. Ferry Co. (1877) 68 N. Y. 77: 'The sea and navigable rivers are natural highways, and any obstruction of the common right or exclusive appropriation of their use is injurious to commerce, and, if permitted at the will of the sovereign, would be very likely to end in materially crippling, if not destroying, it.' Therefore, the state, which is the public in concrete form, is charged with the duties and vested with the powers essential to the establishment and preservation of these common rights. The very implication of the trust upon which the state holds the tideway and tidewaters speaks of the definite purpose for which it was created. If the state may use the waterways for any purpose whatsoever, then it is no longer a trustee, but an irresponsible autocrat. If it may erect upon our tide-

ways or tidewaters any kind of structure that may be suggested by the whim or caprice of those who happen to be in power, it will be possible to destroy navigation and commerce by the very means designated for their preservation and improvement. . . . If the trusteeship of the state in the tideway exists only for the purposes above enumerated, it would seem to follow that, when, in the exercise of its general right of eminent domain, the state appropriates the tidewater to uses inconsistent with the trust upon which it is held,—that is, to some use not for the benefit of navigation,—compensation should be made to the riparian proprietor whose rights have been abridged or taken away. Any other conclusion would necessarily admit the arbitrary and unlimited powers of the state over its tideways and tidewaters for any and every purpose, whether connected with the subject of navigation or not; and no such admission should find its way into our laws. . . . If these changed conditions are the result of improvements to general navigation, then, as we have seen, the injured upland owner is remediless, for it was simply the exercise by the state of its reserved and paramount power over its tideways and tidewaters. If, on the other hand, such changes are created by the state or municipality, not as trustee for the people of the tideways and tidewaters, not for any improvement of navigable waters or any matter connected therewith, but by the building of a public work which, in its whole length and breadth, is utterly destructive of navigation and commerce, then it would seem to follow that the persons whose property has been taken, or whose easements have been destroyed thereby, are entitled to compensation, under the constitutional guaranty that no private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation."

The distinction which is made in the last case, where the improvement is not for the purpose of navigation, is further shown by reference to the decision in Sage v. New York (1897)

The court in Re New York (1901) 168 N. Y. 134, 56 L.R.A. 500, 61 N. E. 158, supra, referred to Smith v. Rochester (1883) 92 N. Y. 464, 44 Am. Rep. 393, in support of the distinction above referred to, the latter case denying the right of a municipality, under authority from the state, to draw from a lake, a navigable body of water, a supply of water for the use of its inhabitants, without compensation to riparian owners on a stream flowing from the lake. This particular class of cases, of course, is not covered in the annotation. But the case is cited for the reason that it is referred to in the later New York decision, as holding that the public has an easement in such waters for purposes of travel, as on a highway, which entitles the state to use, regulate, and control the waters for purposes of navigation; but that the right to divert the water for other uses, although public in their nature, can only be acquired by virtue of the sovereign right of eminent domain, and upon making just compensation.

See, however, in this connection, among other cases on possibly similar facts, Minneapolis Mill Co. v. Water Comrs. (1894) 56 Minn. 485, 58 N. W. 33, holding that the rights of riparian owners on navigable or public streams of water are subordinate to public uses of such water, and that the navigation of the stream is not the only public use to which such waters may be applied. And it was held that a municipality might, without awarding compensation to a mill owner whose power was injuriously affected, divert the water for purposes of supplying the city with water for domestic use, and that the public nature of the use was not affected by the fact that consumers were charged by the municipality for water used, as a means of paying the cost of maintaining the plant. The decision is affirmed in (1897) 168 U. S. 349, 42 L. ed. 497, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 157, in which the court held that the appropriation of the waters of a lake for a city water supply, thereby preventing their flowing past a water power in a river, without compensation for the resulting injuries to riparian owners, is a matter of local law, on which the Federal court must follow state decisions.

The limitation of the doctrine that the public may improve the navigation of a stream, without the consent of, and without compensation to, riparian owners who are injuriously affected, is shown in several other cases.

The right of the public to improve navigation without liability for consequential injuries to riparian rights was held in Beidler v. Sanitary Dist. (1904) 211 Ill. 628, 67 L.R.A. 820, 71 N. E. 1118, not to include the right to take the water of a navigable stream to supply an artificial channel or canal. In this case a drainage district, which was a public corporation, by drawing the water of a navigable stream through a drainage ditch, lowered it in the stream and in canals which led from it and were used for dockage purposes. The owners of the lots fronting upon the canals were held to have acquired by prescription the same riparian rights in the water therein as they would have had if the canals had been natural waterways. The court held that, under a constitutional provision that private property should not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, damages were recoverable for injuries sustained due to the lowering of the water in the river and canals, which impaired the value of the latter for dockage purposes; and that this liability for damages could not be defeated on the ground that incidentally the public had created a navigable channel, through making the improvements, in that the drainage canal was by statute declared a navigable stream, the case not being within the rule that the public is not liable for injuries to riparian owners in consequence of the improvement of navigation.

The court, also, in Beidler v. Sanitary Dist. (Ill.) supra, held that a liability for damages could not be defeated on the ground that the act was an exercise of the police power for the promotion of the public health.

The court in Beidler v. Sanitary Dist. (Ill.) supra, said that the primary purpose of the creation of sanitary districts under the statutes was to provide for the preservation of the public health, by improving the facilities for the disposition of sewage, and by supplying pure water; and that the fact that a navigable waterway might be created was a mere incident, and not one of the purposes for which the sanitary district was created. The court also took the view that the superior right of the public to improve navigation without compensation to riparian owners extended only to the right to improve navigation in the stream in question, or in a tributary, and not the right to divert the water for the purpose of making navigable and artificial channels.

And it was held in Fulton Light, Heat & P. Co. v. State (1911) 200 N. Y. 400, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 307, 94 N. E. 199, that the right of the state to use the bed and waters of a river for the improvement of navigation does not extend to the diverting of the waters from the river to an artificial channel along the bank, constructed not for the improvement of the navigation of the river, but as a separate navigable waterway; and that, if the state attempts to do so, it must make compensation to the riparian owner for the injuries thereby caused him. It was said: "The right of the state to make improvements in the river for the benefit of the public, in facilitating navigation and transportation thereon, must be fully conceded. It may do so without regard to the private ownership of the bed of the river. The proprietary interest of the riparian owner is subordinate to the public easement of passage, and the state may be regarded as the trustee of a special public servitude, as it was termed in Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall (1841) 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 404. In the exercise of its authority in that respect, the legislature may direct the performance of acts by state officers, which tend to promote the public right of passage and transportation, without subjecting the state to liability. When, however, it is not the channel or bed of the river which is to be regulated, and land is taken, and the river waters are diverted for the purpose of constructing and operating some other channel distinct from that of the river, then the limit of the state's authority freely to intrude upon the riparian owner's rights has been reached. . . . The state, by the exercise of its power of eminent domain, could take these claimants' lands and divert from their power-plant properties the water power which operated them, upon making just compensation therefor; but, in my opinion, it had no unlimited right to make use of the river for a public purpose, except as such purpose was related to the improvement of the channel, or bed, of the river itself, for purposes of navigation or transportation."

It was held in Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall (N. Y.) supra, referred to in the last case, that where, in the construction of an aqueduct across a navigable stream under authority of the state, water was temporarily diverted from the mill of a riparian owner on the stream, the owner was entitled to damages, since his rights were only subject to the rights of the public as to navigation.

Where discharge from a sewer into a navigable river caused large quantities of sand and filth to be deposited in the bed of the river, around and near the piles on which the plaintiff's building was constructed, and in order to provide a settling basin, and to avoid the expense of frequent removals of the deposit, the city caused excavations to be made in the river bed around and near the piles, whereby they were undermined, it was held in Pomroy v. Granger (1894) 18 R. I. 624, 29 Atl. 690, that the work did not constitute merely the legitimate dredging which the city might be entitled to do for the improvement of navigation, but that the city was liable for damages.

In Green Bay & M. Canal Co. v. Kaukauna Water Power Co. (Patten Paper Co. v. Kaukauna Water Power

Co.) (1895) 90 Wis. 370, 28 L.R.A. 443, 48 Am. St. Rep. 937, 61 N. W. 1121, 63 N. W. 1019, it is said: "The riparian rights of the lower owners of land upon the bank of the stream are property such as cannot be taken by the state even for a public use,—except in aid of navigation,—without compensation to the owner, and cannot be taken at all, or impaired, for a private use. . . . The right of the state to improve the stream as a highway, and for the purpose of aiding its navigation, is superior to the rights of riparian owners. It may take and divert, absolutely and without compensation, so much of the water of the stream as may be required to improve its navigation. But that is the limit of its right." A later appeal in (1896) 93 Wis. 287, 66 N. W. 601, 67 N. W. 432, is reversed on grounds beyond the scope of the annotation, in (1898) 172 U. S. 58, 43 L. ed. 364, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 97.

Attention is called, also, to Barney v. Keokuk (1876) 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224, where the title to a marginal street bordering on the Mississippi river, in Iowa, was in the adjacent proprietor, subject to the public easement, and the court held that while the public authorities had the right to use the street for wharves and levees, and to make other improvements thereon, necessary or incidental to navigation, including a packet depot used in connection with shipping, without the consent of the adjacent proprietor and without making compensation to him, they had no right to authorize the erection of a permanent railroad depot along such water front, so as to cut off his riparian rights, without his consent and without compensation.

Although the facts do not bring it within the scope of the annotation, attention is called, also, to Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige (1880) 83 N. Y. 178, 38 Am. Rep. 407, in which the court, referring to a fresh-water stream which has been declared a public highway, and subject to the public easement for purposes of navigation, said: "The legislature, except under the power of eminent domain, upon making compensation, can interfere with such streams only for the purpose of regulating, preserving, and protecting the public easement. Further than that, it has no more power over these fresh-water streams than over other private property. It may make laws for regulating booms, dams, ferries, and bridges only so far as is necessary to protect and preserve the public easement; and when it goes further, it invades private rights protected under the Constitution."

In Lewis on Eminent Domain, 3d ed. § 84, it is said that any interference with the rights of a riparian owner on a private navigable stream, under legislative sanction, for any purpose not connected with the navigation of the stream, is a taking; and that any interference with the accustomed flow of the stream, in its quantity, quality, or uniformity, to the damage of a riparian proprietor, except for the improvement of navigation, will be actionable.

If the main purpose of the improvement is in aid of navigation, it has been held that the fact that incidentally other purposes may be served does not take the case out of the rule relieving the public from payment of compensation for injuries suffered by riparian owners, from the improvement of navigable streams for purposes of navigation. Thus, in Home for Aged Women v. Com. (1909) 202 Mass. 422, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 79, 89 N.E. 124, it was held that the fact that a plan for the improvement of a tidal body of water, for the benefit of navigation, included the construction of a public park along a strip formerly occupied by the tidewater in front of riparian property, so as to cut such property off completely from access to the water, did not cause it to exceed the power of the government over the land under the water owned by it, so as to entitle the riparian owner to compensation for the injury thereby caused to his property. The court said: "It is contended by the petitioners that the changes made by the commission were not made for the improvement of navigation, and therefore were not authorized under the rules of law stated above. In the first place, we think it would be too strict a doctrine to hold that the trust for the public, under which the state holds and controls navigable tidewaters and the land under them, beyond the line of private ownership, is for navigation alone. It is wider in its scope, and it includes all necessary and proper uses in the interest of the public. In Com. v. Roxbury (1857) 9 Gray (Mass.) 483; Shaw, Ch. J., in speaking of the seashores and the land under the sea, said of the King 'that he held the same publici juris, for the use and benefit of all the subjects, for all useful purposes, the principal of which were navigation and the fisheries.' As the state is not only the holder of the title, but the representative of the people, it may exercise the police power over the property, for their good. The rights of individuals, both in their persons and in the use of their property, are subject to the exercise of the police power. The change in the Charles river under these statutes was for the improvement of navigation as well as for other useful purposes. If that was one of the purposes of the legislature, it was enough to warrant the legislation and the action under it, even if such a change in the river could not be authorized for other useful purposes alone without compensation to these petitioners. . . . Connected with the plan, there were doubtless other important considerations, relative to the public health and the public comfort, which properly appealed to the legislature as the representative of the police power. In the interest of safer and more convenient navigation over the flats along the Charles river, and of the public health and comfort, the construction of the dam and the filling of a strip of land outside of the sea wall were treated by the legislature as parts of a single project for the public good. The building of a new wall or embankment, and the taking of the intervening land for a public park, are required by the same statute that directs the construction of the dam, and are natural, if not necessary, incidents of the change in the level of the water. There was a sufficient reason, in the conditions and in the objects to be accomplished, for the exercise of the paramount power of the legislature over the commonwealth's lands under tidewater."

The annotation does not cover such questions as what is a public use or improvement in aid of navigation. It does not, therefore, include cases such as Cohn v. Wausau Boom Co. (1879) 47 Wis. 314, 2 N. W. 546, where a boom company was held to be a quasi public corporation, or an agent of the state for the improvement of the river, and was held entitled, under legislative authority, to construct a boom for the receiving, assorting, and distributing of logs, without compensation to a riparian owner in front of whose land the boom was constructed. EPHRAIM LEDERER, Collector of Internal Revenue, Plff. in Err.,

v.
JOHN CADWALADER, JR.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Third Circuit — August 18, 1921.

(274 Fed. 753.)

Internal revenue — income tax — fees of executor.

The office of executor of a single estate is not, although held by an attorney at law, a trade or business within the meaning of a statute imposing a tax on the income of a trade or business having no invested capital.

[See note on this question beginning on page 414.]

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania (Dickinson, Dist. J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to recover a tax paid, under protest, on commissions received by him as executor of a certain estate, to defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Buffington, Woolley, and Davis, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Charles D. McAvoy and T. Henry Walnut for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Thomas Raeburn White for defendant in error.

Davis, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

John Cadwalader, Jr., plaintiff below, was appointed executor and trustee of the estate of Mr. Eckley B. Coxe, who died in 1916. His account, filed in 1917, showed that he received in commissions as executor $28,974. Ephraim Lederer, collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania, imposed an excess profits tax under the Revenue Act of October 3, 1917 (40 Stat. at L. 300, chap. 63, Comp. Stat. §§ 6336½a et seq. Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp.

1918, p. 341), for the calendar year of 1917, of $1,971.23 on these commissions, which plaintiff paid under protest and for the refund of which he immediately filed a claim, which was rejected. These proceedings were instituted to recover the tax thus paid. The case was tried to a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant is here on writ of error.

The tax was levied under the authority of § 209 of the act (§ 6336½j), which provides "that in the case of a trade or business having no invested capital or not more than a nominal capital there shall be levied, assessed, collected and paid, in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this act, in lieu of the tax imposed by section two hundred and one, a tax equivalent to eight per centum of the net income of such trade or business."

This is the only section of the act designed to reach the income derived from a trade, business, or profession in which no capital, or only a nominal capital, is invested. The tax "equivalent to 8 per centum," assessed by this section, is in lieu of the higher tax imposed by § 201, in which capital is invested.

The determination of this case depends upon what is meant by "trade or business," which, as defined by § 200 of the act (§ 6336³a), includes "professions and occupations."

The defendant contends that "trade or business," as used in § 209, comprehends all the activities of an individual of every kind which may be followed and called a trade, business, profession, occupation, or vocation; and the income received from such activity, if engaged in only a single time, is taxable under this section, because such activity may be followed as a vocation or profession. According to this view, it makes no difference whether the income is received from a vocation or avocation, if the activity is such that it may be followed by someone as a trade, business, or profession. If this position is correct the defendant's motion for a nonsuit should have been granted.

The plaintiff tried his case on the theory, which he is seeking to maintain here, that, to be taxable under § 209 of the act, the income, in the case of an individual, must be derived from some activity engaged in with such frequency and to such extent that it may be called his trade, business, profession, occupation, or vocation, and that income derived from any activity not so engaged in by an individual is not taxable under this section as "war excess profits tax."

This section has been construed by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is charged with the administration of the act, in article 8 of Regulation No. 41 in the following language:

" 'Trade' in the Case of Individuals.—In the case of an individual, the terms, 'trade' 'business,' and 'trade or business,' comprehend all his activities for gain, profit, or livelihood, entered into with sufficient frequency, or occupying such portion of his time or attention as to constitute a vocation, including occupations and professions. When such activities constitute a vocation they shall be construed to be a trade or business whether continuously carried on during the taxable year or not, and all the income arising therefrom shall be included in his return for excess profits tax.

"In the following cases the gain or income is not subject to excess profits tax; and the capital from which such gain or income is derived shall not be included in 'invested capital:' (a) Gains or profits from transactions entered into for profit, but which are isolated, incidental, or so infrequent as not to constitute an occupation; and (b) the income from property arising merely from ownership, including interest, rent, and similar income from investments except in those cases in which the management of such investments really constitute a trade or business."

The testimony discloses that the plaintiff is a lawyer and has no other profession. He had nothing to do with the preparation of the will, and never represented the testator professionally. There was no testimony tending to show that the defendant ever held himself out as a person specially qualified to act, or desirous of acting, as executor, and, so far as the testimony shows, this was the first and only time that he ever acted as such. While it may be true, as defendant contends, that an attorney's training and experience qualify him to be a good executor, they may also qualify him to be efficient in many other pursuits which professionally he never touches. The training of men in other professions and occupations may fit them also to be good executors, but this does not, in our opinion, furnish a ground for taxing income under this section of the act, if it is received by such persons for a single, isolated, avocational activity, requiring no more of those taxed than the record discloses was required of the plaintiff.

The defendant's argument to sustain his position is as follows: Section 206 of the act (§ 6336g) provides that the net income of an individual shall be ascertained and returned "for the taxable year, upon the same basis and in the same manner" as provided in title 1 of the Act of September 8, 1916 (39 Stat. at L. 756, chap. 463), as amended by this act. Section 2 of that act, as amended by § 1200 of this act (§ 6336b [a]), provides that "net income of a taxable person shall include gains, profits, and income, derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal service of whatever kind and in whatever form paid, or from professions, vocations, businesses, trade, commerce, or sales, or dealings in property, whether real or personal, growing out of the ownership or use of or interest in real or personal property, also from interest, rent, dividends, securities, or the transaction of any business carried on for gain or profit, or gains or profits and income derived from any source whatever."

He therefore concludes that income derived from any source whatever forms the basis of ascertaining and returning excess profits, or additional income, tax of individuals having no invested capital or only a nominal capital, but this conclusion is a non sequitur.

The defendant tries to sustain his position by applying the provision regarding trades and businesses of corporations to the trades, businesses, and professions of individuals. Section 201 (§ 6336b), after setting forth the taxes to be paid by corporations, partnerships, and individuals, provides in the case of corporations and partnerships that "for the purpose of this title every corporation or partnership . . . shall be deemed to be engaged in business, and all the trades and businesses in which it is engaged shall be treated as a single trade or business, and all its income from whatever source derived shall be deemed to be received from such trade or business."

So, also, defendant says, in the case of individuals having no invested capital, all their trades, businesses, or professions are treated as a single trade, business, or profession, and income from whatever source derived is deemed to be received from that business or profession. Consequently the commissions of the plaintiff, though not received strictly from his profession, are deemed to have been so received, and are therefore subject to the excess profits tax. The provision, however, is expressly limited to corporations and partnerships. But it was meant, defendant argues, to apply to individuals, because "under the provisions of § 206 whereby an individual's net income for the purpose of the act is to be figured in the manner provided in title 1 of the 1916 Act, his income 'derived from any source whatever' is specially made subject to the tax," and it is, therefore, not necessary expressly to make the provisions applicable to individuals. But defendant loses sight of the fact that identically the same language was used as to the basis and manner in which income is to be ascertained and returned in the case of individuals, as in the case of corporations and partnerships. Consequently Congress could not have intended that income derived from any source whatever, whether vocational or avocational, should be deemed to be derived from an individual's profession. If it had so intended, the provision would have expressly included individuals as well as corporations and partnerships.

Section 2 of the Act of 1916, which simply defines income, cannot be made the basis for imposing an excess profits tax under § 209, as defendant contends. On income, thus defined, a tax must, of course, be paid, and as a matter of fact the defendant did make return of and pay the tax on his commissions, but not as excess profits tax. There is not a word in the statute which says, or even hints, that this additional tax of "8 per centum," "in the case of a trade or business having no invested capital," shall be ascertained and returned or paid on a single avocational activity, on the basis of income as defined in § 2 of the Act of 1916.

The taxes provided for in § 209 are "in addition to taxes under existing law." Sections 201-208 (§ 6336§b-6336§i) provide for taxes on income derived from trades or businesses having invested capital. Section 209 provides for taxes on income from a "trade and business," including professions and occupations "having no invested capital." Section 2 of the Act of 1916 simply defines income, and does nothing more. It does not attempt to declare when a tax on income, thus defined, shall be imposed under § 209. It does not provide a "basis" or "manner" for ascertaining and returning income under § 209 of the Act of 1917, except in so far as it defines what income is. As a matter of fact, there were no taxes ascertained and returned under the Act of 1916 in the case of a "trade or business having no invested capital."

Taxes on income from a "trade or business" clearly mean taxes on the trade, business, profession, or occupation of the taxpayer himself. This is the plain meaning of the statute, and any other construction distorts the simplicity of the language and requires that we read into the language something it does not contain. A single, isolated activity of the character of the executorship of the plaintiff does not constitute a trade, business, profession, or vocation under the facts of this case. We agree with the Secretary of the Treasury and the learned trial judge in the interpretation of this section.

Internal revenue—Income tax—fees of executor.

The question of whether acting as executor of this estate was the business, occupation, or profession of the plaintiff was correctly submitted to the jury, whose verdict settled the fact in the negative, and the judgment of the District Court will therefore be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Commissions as executor, administrator, guardian, etc., as income subject to income tax.

As to income tax in respect of salaries of public officers and employees, see annotation in 11 A.L.R. 532.

Apparently there has been no judicial decision upon the question whether or not commissions received by an executor or other fiduciary, as such, constitute income within the meaning of the Federal Income Tax Acts. And as a matter of fact there would seem to be no question that such commissions are taxable as income, since the law expressly provides that the gross income of a person shall include gains, profits, and income derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal services, of whatever kind and in whatever form paid, or from professions or vocations. This seems to have been the view taken by the Treasury Department. For instance, it held in T. D. 2135 that, where a trustee's compensation for services for a period of years was not determined until the trust was terminated, the full amount allowed must be returned as income for that year, and not prorated over the period for which the services were rendered. And see Jackson v. Smietanka (1921) — C. C. A. —, 272 Fed.

970, wherein it was held that a receiver of a railroad, who had been paid a monthly sum during his term as such, but who at the end of five years, and upon the termination of the receivership, applied for and received additional compensation as a final allowance, must enter as income for that year the whole amount of the additional compensation, rather than prorate it through the five years.

There was an inferential ruling in United States v. Vanderbilt (1921) 275 Fed. 109, 545 U. S. Tax Cases, 577, to the effect that the commissions of a fiduciary are taxable income, it having been held that a bequest made to executors and trustees, in lieu of "all compensation or commissions to which they would otherwise be entitled as executors or trustees," were not exempt as "bequests," but were "compensation" for personal services, and as such taxable as income. In reaching this conclusion the court said: "There seems to me no question whatever that these legacies—in part, anyway—are compensation for personal services. Where the testator provided that they should be 'in lieu of all compensation or commissions to which they would otherwise be entitled as executors or trustees,' he could only have meant to substitute the legacies in the place of their statutory compensation. If a substitute, these legacies must in themselves be compensation, and since the commissions would certainly have been for 'personal services,' the substitute itself was the same. It is true that the form of the compensation is a 'bequest,' and a 'bequest' is exempt; hence there is a verbal contradiction between one part of the statute and the other. Yet I cannot doubt that all bequests are not exempt. Suppose, for instance, that a man agreed to leave another a legacy if he would take care of him while he lived. The legacy would be a 'bequest,' but can anyone suppose that it would not be 'compensation' for personal services, which would be taxable?"

A materially different question is presented by the query whether or not commissions of the kind under consideration herein constitute "income" within the meaning of the excess profits tax. This tax, it will be remembered, was directed against profits and income derived from trade or business, so that the question resolves itself into a determination of whether or not the acting as a fiduciary amounts to a trade or business. Upon considering this point, the court in the reported case (LEDERER v. CADWALADER, ante, 411), held that an attorney who acted as executor of a single estate, and did not make a business of acting as such, or hold himself out as especially qualified to do so, was not subject to a tax upon commissions received as executor under the provisions of the Excess Profits Tax Act of 1917. But, as is intimated in this case, it would seem that if the taxpayer made a business of acting as a fiduciary, his commissions as such would be subject to the excess profits tax. G. J. C.

Headnotes by MARSHALL, J.

The rule itself, which places the loss arising from improvements in aid of navigation on the riparian owner, seems a harsh one, and in view of this the limitation of the rule made in the CONGER CASE seems commendable from an equitable point of view.

Although the improvement was not in the stream itself, and, so far as the facts are concerned, the case is merely representative of a class of decisions not included herein, the limitation last referred to, where the improvement is not made in aid of navigation, is supported also by Re New York (1901) 168 N. Y. 134, 56 L.R.A. 500, 61 N. E. 158, where an owner of property fronting on the Harlem river, in New York city, sought damages from the city for injury to his riparian rights through the construction by it, under legislative authority, of a speedway along the tideway of the river, thereby depriving him of access to the river. The use of the speedway was limited to the pursuit of pleasure in driving, riding, or walking, and all forms of commercial traffic were rigidly excluded therefrom. It was held that there was no authority in the public for constructing the same, without compensation to the riparian owner for the injury caused thereby, although, if the improvement had been in aid of navigation, the court said, there would have been no right to compensation.

Because of the small amount of judicial discussion on the present question, it seems advisable to refer at some length to the reasoning of the court in Re New York (N. Y.) supra. It was said: "The appellant herein, while conceding the right of the state or municipality to make improvements for the benefit of navigation without compensation to riparian proprietors for invasion of their private rights, contends that the construction of a speedway, from which are excluded all forms of commercial traffic or intercourse, is not an exercise of that right, and that, therefore, his riparian rights cannot be taken or destroyed without due compensation. . . . The state holds the title in fee in the tideway, and to the lands under water beyond the same, as trustee for the public in its organized capacity. As such trustee, and in the exercise of its governmental functions, it may improve the tideway, or the adjacent waters, for the benefit of navigation, even to the detriment of abutting upland owners, and without compensation to them. As stated in Sage v. New York (1897) 154 N. Y. 70, 38 L.R.A. 606, 61 Am. St. Rep. 592, 47 N. E. 1096, this rule is based upon the principle that, 'when any public authority conveys lands bounded by tidewater, it is impliedly subject to those paramount uses to which government, as trustee for the public, may be called upon to apply the water front for the promotion of commerce and the general welfare.' Does this principle of implied or reserved power extend to any public use of the tideway, or the waters beyond the same, for purposes not related to, or connected with, navigation and commerce? The basis of the theory upon which the trusteeship of the state in our tideways and tidewaters is founded seems to be that there are certain rights of navigation and commerce by water which are common to all, and are, therefore, paramount to the rights of individuals. As was said in People v. New York & S. I. Ferry Co. (1877) 68 N. Y. 77: 'The sea and navigable rivers are natural highways, and any obstruction of the common right or exclusive appropriation of their use is injurious to commerce, and, if permitted at the will of the sovereign, would be very likely to end in materially crippling, if not destroying, it.' Therefore, the state, which is the public in concrete form, is charged with the duties and vested with the powers essential to the establishment and preservation of these common rights. The very implication of the trust upon which the state holds the tideway and tidewaters speaks of the definite purpose for which it was created. If the state may use the waterways for any purpose whatsoever, then it is no longer a trustee, but an irresponsible autocrat. If it may erect upon our tide-

ways or tidewaters any kind of structure that may be suggested by the whim or caprice of those who happen to be in power, it will be possible to destroy navigation and commerce by the very means designated for their preservation and improvement. . . . If the trusteeship of the state in the tideway exists only for the purposes above enumerated, it would seem to follow that, when, in the exercise of its general right of eminent domain, the state appropriates the tidewater to uses inconsistent with the trust upon which it is held,—that is, to some use not for the benefit of navigation,—compensation should be made to the riparian proprietor whose rights have been abridged or taken away. Any other conclusion would necessarily admit the arbitrary and unlimited powers of the state over its tideways and tidewaters for any and every purpose, whether connected with the subject of navigation or not; and no such admission should find its way into our laws. . . . If these changed conditions are the result of improvements to general navigation, then, as we have seen, the injured upland owner is remediless, for it was simply the exercise by the state of its reserved and paramount power over its tideways and tidewaters. If, on the other hand, such changes are created by the state or municipality, not as trustee for the people of the tideways and tidewaters, not for any improvement of navigable waters or any matter connected therewith, but by the building of a public work which, in its whole length and breadth, is utterly destructive of navigation and commerce, then it would seem to follow that the persons whose property has been taken, or whose easements have been destroyed thereby, are entitled to compensation, under the constitutional guaranty that no private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation."

The distinction which is made in the last case, where the improvement is not for the purpose of navigation, is further shown by reference to the decision in Sage v. New York (1897)

The court in Re New York (1901) 168 N. Y. 134, 56 L.R.A. 500, 61 N. E. 158, supra, referred to Smith v. Rochester (1883) 92 N. Y. 464, 44 Am. Rep. 398, in support of the distinction above referred to, the latter case denying the right of a municipality, under authority from the state, to draw from a lake, a navigable body of water, a supply of water for the use of its inhabitants, without compensation to riparian owners on a stream flowing from the lake. This particular class of cases, of course, is not covered in the annotation. But the case is cited for the reason that it is referred to in the later New York decision, as holding that the public has an easement in such waters for purposes of travel, as on a highway, which entitles the state to use, regulate, and control the waters for purposes of navigation; but that the right to divert the water for other uses, although public in their nature, can only be acquired by virtue of the sovereign right of eminent domain, and upon making just compensation.

See, however, in this connection, among other cases on possibly similar facts, Minneapolis Mill Co. v. Water Comrs. (1894) 56 Minn. 485, 58 N. W. 33, holding that the rights of riparian owners on navigable or public streams of water are subordinate to public uses of such water, and that the navigation of the stream is not the only public use to which such waters may be applied. And it was held that a municipality might, without awarding compensation to a mill owner whose power was injuriously affected, divert the water for purposes of supplying the city with water for domestic use, and that the public nature of the use was not affected by the fact that consumers were charged by the municipality for water used, as a means of paying the cost of maintaining the

The court concludes, as to matters of law:

"That plaintiff is entitled to judgment against defendant for temporary total disability to date for $42.60; for partial disability to date, 75 weeks at $7.50 per week $552.50; in the aggregate lump sum of $595.10; also interest on amounts from respective dates when due, in the sum of $——.

"That the plaintiff should endeavor to effect a cure of his condition by submitting to the operation as tendered by defendant, and, in case of his failure so to do, his compensation shall cease at the end of twenty-five weeks, after May 26, 1920, and during said twenty-five weeks, beginning June 2, 1920, defendant shall pay plaintiff compensation in the sum of $7.50 per week, in weekly instalments.

"Should plaintiff accept the tendered operation, defendant shall pay, in addition to the operation expenses, compensation weekly in the sum of $10.60 per week during the time the operation renders plaintiff totally incapacitated, and $7.50 per week for the remainder of the said twenty-five weeks, after June 2, 1920.

"In case the operation proves successful, the compensation shall cease with said twenty-five weeks; but if plaintiff's disability is not thereby removed, compensation should then become due and payable at the rate of $7.50 per week for the remainder of the period of eight years as provided by law, either in a lump sum or in payments as the court may determine, and jurisdiction should be retained for the purpose of determining the length of time the operation results in total incapacity, whether or not the plaintiff is restored by the operation, and compensation ceases; if not, whether compensation shall thereafter be paid per week or in a lump sum and any other matters necessary for determination; such jurisdiction to be exercised upon motion of either party upon proper notice.

"That the defendant is not es-topped from maintaining this proceeding."

Judgment was rendered accordingly, and from that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff gave the following as his reasons for refusing to have the operation performed: "I think I am too old. I am fifty-four years of age. That is one reason; another is that I do not think I could stand it under my present age and condition. A man has to be perfectly healthy to undergo an operation and have it successful. I am not in condition, because I was 'jammed through here' [indicating]. By jammed through here, I mean my ribs was pulled away from my breastbone; and my spine is numb. That happened when I was thrown into the car. Another reason that I do not want to submit to an operation is that there is a chance of a man not living. I heard Dr. Stemen testify and say there was a chance of losing."

1. The principal question presented is, Did the court have power to reduce the amount of compensation that should be paid to the plaintiff if he refused to submit to an operation?

The principle, which the defendant seeks to have applied, has been recognized in actions to recover damages for personal injuries. Note to Donovan v. New Orleans R. & Light Co. in 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 110-113; note in 12 N. C. C. A. 59; 6 Thomp. Neg. § 7210. This rule was applied in this state in Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. v. Duncan, 6 Kan. App. 178, 51 Pac. 310, where that court said: "The next allegation of error is that the court withdrew from the jury all evidence as to the probable result of a surgical operation. This we think was error, as the probabilities of a cure of the disability would, to some extent, affect the amount of damages. This should have been allowed to go to the jury and be weighed by them in assessing the amount of the recovery, as should also the probable expense attending such an operation. This is not in mitigation of damages, but is a proper method of showing the actual damages sustained. If the plaintiff could be certainly cured by an operation that was safe and inexpensive, the injury would surely be less serious than one for which there was no hope; and to the degree that the certainty, safety, and inexpensiveness of a cure could be assured, in such a degree would the actual damages decrease." 6 Kan. App. p. 181.

The present proceeding is not an equity case; but two of the oldest principles in equity jurisprudence are that "he who seeks equity must do equity" (21 C. J. 172), and, "he who comes into equity must come with clean hands" (21 C. J. 180). This is but another way of saying that he must do right who seeks to compel another to do right.

In a "Digest of Workmen's Compensation Laws in the United States and Territories, with Annotations, Sixth Edition, Revised to December 1, 1919," published by the Workmen's Compensation Publicity Bureau, is found a tabulated résumé of the statutory provisions contained in the several states of the American Union. This digest shows that in the following states the Workmen's Compensation Laws provide for the reduction, suspension, or rejection of compensation for the unreasonable refusal of an injured employee to accept medical treatment, or to submit to a surgical operation, or for persisting in insanitary practices which retard recovery: Alabama, California, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Porto Rico, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and Wyoming. Why were these provisions placed in the Workmen's Compensation Laws of these states? There is but one answer, and that is because their legislatures thought that the principles there enacted into law were right.

In England and Scotland it is held that if an injured employee unreasonably refuses to submit to an operation he is not entitled to compensation. Donnelly v. Baird & Co. [1908] S. C. 536, 45 Scot. L. R. 394, 1 B. W. C. C. 95; Warncken v. Richard Moreland & Son [1909] 1 K. B. 184, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 332, 100 L. T. N. S. 12, 25 Times L. R. 129, 53 Sol. Jo. 134, 2 B. W. C. C. 350; Paddington Borough Council v. Stack, 2 B. W. C. C. 402; Wheeler, R. & Co. v. Dawson, 107 L. T. N. S. 339, 5 B. W. C. C. 645; O'Neill v. John Brown & Co. [1913] S. C. 653, 50 Scot. L. R. 450, 6 B. W. C. C. 428; Walsh v. Locke & Co. (Newland) 110 L. T. N. S. 452, 7 B. W. C. C. 117; Dolan & Son v. Ward, 8 B. W. C. C. 514; Wright v. Sneyd Collieries, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1332, 113 L. T. N. S. 633, 8 B. W. C. C. 537.

In Donnelly v. Baird & Co. 1 B. W. C. C. 95, Lord Justice Clerk used the following language: "I hold it to be the duty of an injured workman to submit to such treatment, medical or surgical, as involves no serious risk or suffering, such an operation as a man of ordinary manly character would undergo for his own good, in a case where no question of compensation due by another existed." Page 100.

Lord M'Laren said: "I can see no general principle except this, that if the operation is not attended with danger to life or health, or extraordinary suffering, and if, according to the best medical or surgical opinion, the operation offers a reasonable prospect of restoration or relief from the incapacity from which the workman is suffering, then he must either submit to the operation or release his employers from the obligation to maintain him." Page 102.

A workman's compensation case in which an injured employee claimed compensation for hernia is Schiller v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 137 Md. 235, 112 Atl. 272, decided December 2, 1920, where the supreme court of Maryland said:

"It was vigorously contended by appellant that one should not, as a condition precedent to continued compensation during disability, be required to submit to an operation the result of which might be fatal even if such result is so unlikely as to make the danger practically negligible. To support this contention he has cited but three authorities, all being New Jersey cases: Newbaker v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 38 N. J. L. J. 175; McNally v. Hudson & M. R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 455, 95 Atl. 122, 10 N. C. C. A. 185; Feldman v. Braunstein, 87 N. J. L. 20, 93 Atl. 679.

"The overwhelming weight of authority is opposed to this view, holding that a man cannot continue to receive compensation and at the same time refuse to submit to proper medical or surgical treatment such as an ordinarily reasonable man would submit to in like circumstances." 137 Md. 246.

In another hernia case arising under the Workmen's Compensation Law of Michigan, O'Brien v. Albert A. Albrecht Co. 206 Mich. 101, 6 A.L.R. 1257, 172 N. W. 601, the supreme court of that state used the following language:

"The physician of the company and the one of plaintiff's selection both advised an operation for the hernia. Such operation is not attended with danger to life or health, and it appears to be undisputed that it affords the only reasonable prospect of restoration of plaintiff's capacity to labor at his trade, that of a carpenter. Without it he may be able to labor at such light occupation as the condition of his feet and ankles will permit, but he cannot do heavy lifting, as his trade of carpenter requires. During all the time he has refused, and still persists in his refusal, to submit to the operation advised by his own physician, as well as the one in the employ of defendant. Plaintiff is an intelligent man, and whether such refusal is due to a defect of moral courage or not we are unable to say. The board did not find that his refusal was due to any ignorance or misunderstanding on his part, and no such finding would be justified on this record. . . .

"We appreciate the timidity with which the average person contemplates an operation, minor as well as major. But we also appreciate that in thousands of cases, operations, many of them of but minor degree, have restored incapacitated men to the army of wage earners, and put them in position to discharge their duty to their dependents, themselves, and to society. We are impressed that under the undisputed evidence in the case it was the plaintiff's duty to accept the tendered operation. His unequivocal refusal to follow the advice and judgment of both physicians with reference to the operation relieved defendants from further activities in that direction, and, for the time being at least, absolved them from liability." 206 Mich. 104.

The same principle was followed by the supreme court of Wisconsin in Lesh v. Illinois Steel Co. 163 Wis. 124, L.R.A.1916E, 105, 157 N. W. 539, where that court said:

"Where, as in this case, the applicant under the Workmen's Compensation Act unreasonably refuses to undergo a safe and simple surgical operation, which is fairly certain to result in a removal of the disability, and is not attended with serious risk or pain, and is such as an ordinarily prudent and courageous person would submit to for his own benefit and comfort, no question of compensation being involved, the disability which the claimant suffers thereafter, a reasonable time being allowed for recovery, is not proximately caused by the accident, but is the direct result of such unreasonable refusal.

"No question of compelling the applicant to submit to an operation is involved. The question is: Shall society recompense a workman for a disability caused by his unreasonable refusal to adopt such means to effect a recovery as an ordinarily prudent person would use under like circumstances, and which would result in the removal of the disabiliity within the rule as stated above? It is true that the compensation awarded under the terms of the act is not damages in the technical sense, and that the rules relating thereto are not to be applied in cases arising under this act, and cases have been cited simply for the purpose of showing that damages accruing as a direct result of claimant's unreasonable refusal to submit to reasonable medical and surgical treatment, where the results are fairly certain, were not, even in tort cases, held to be proximately caused by the accident.

"The proposition that an applicant, under the provisions of this humane law, may create, continue, or even increase his disability by his wilful, unreasonable, and negligent conduct, claim compensation from his employer for his disability so caused, and thereby cast the burden of his wrongful act upon society in general, is not only utterly repugnant to all principles of law, but is abhorrent to that sense of justice common to all mankind." 163 Wis. 131, 132.

Neither Maryland, nor Michigan, nor Wisconsin has any statute authorizing the refusal, reduction, or suspension of compensation to an injured workman who refuses to submit to an operation. A number of annotators have cited cases on this question. 6 N. C. C. A. 390, "A Note on Hernia and Varicocele under Workmen's Compensation Acts;" 6 N. C. C. A. 675; 10 N. C. C. A. 185; Joliet Motor Co. v. Industrial Bd. 280 Ill. 148, 117 N. E. 423, 15 N. C. C. A. 79; Toner v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 263 Pa. 438, 106 Atl. 797, 18 N. C. C. A. 779; Jendrus v. Detroit Steel Products Co. 178 Mich. 265, L.R.A.1916A, 387, 144 N. W. 563, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 482, 4 N. C. C. A. 864; O'Brien v. Albert A. Albrecht Co. 206 Mich. 101, 172 N. W. 601, 6 A.L.R. 1260.

The last note, however, is on "Duty of injured employees to submit to an operation or to take other measures to restore earning capacity." Cases might be cited from states having statutory restrictions on the right of an injured employee to recover compensation where he refuses to submit to an operation; but it is thought that the reasoning in those cases, while broad enough to include the present discussion, may have been based upon the statutory provisions, and would, therefore, not be very persuasive in this state, where there is no such statute.

Why should the plaintiff permit an operation to be performed? It might not result in his improvement; it would be painful; it is remotely possible that it might result in his death. Many, if not most, of the ordinary activities of men are painful in a sense; the man who works hard all day until his muscles cry for rest, and the man who goes into the field when the temperature is from 90 to 105, and works under the direct rays of the sun, endure sensations that are as unpleasant and many times are as unbearable as pain. They are pain, but of a kind different from that caused by wounded flesh.

Danger to life is everywhere, at all times; it cannot be escaped by anyone. The most trifling accident to the person or the smallest scratch on the skin may result in death. The locomotive engineer and his fireman, when they climb into the cab of their engine and start on their trip, constantly face dangers that may, and often do, result in their death; the miner who goes into the earth to take therefrom ore or mineral faces death every day. These men are not deterred by danger, although they know that injury or death is liable to come at any time. They go because that is their field of labor, and it is their duty to go.

One of the greatest blessings that God has given to men is the ability to work, to work with hand and head and heart. Work produces happiness; refusal to work produces misery. Whatever of happiness there is in the world is the result of hard work. Whatever has been attained by man has been done by hard work, and the greatest achievements have been produced by the greatest efforts. In art, literature, science, and in all industrial enterprises, the greatest achievements have been accomplished by the hardest labor. The last ounce of energy of which the person laboring was capable of putting forth has been what has produced the desired result. It is a man's duty to himself, to his family, to society, and to God, to work, to work hard, to work with all his might, to accomplish in his lifetime all that it is possible for him to accomplish, to keep his mind and body in such condition as will enable him to do his best, and to avoid everything that will detract from any of his powers or prevent him from accomplishing his utmost. If misfortune overtakes him in any way, and that misfortune detracts from his ability and renders him less able to work, mentally or physically, and the effect of the misfortune can be removed, it is his duty to do the thing that will restore him, even if there are pain and danger. There is no law to compel a man to perform any of these duties, but nevertheless they exist.

The state goes to great expense to fit its people for work, to protect them in their work, and to secure to them the result of their labor. Then if a man who receives these favors from the state will not work, he, at least, is not a good citizen.

The plaintiff has been injured. The injury can be remedied, and he can be restored to his former condition. It is his duty to do whatever

compensation—refusal to submit to

is necessary to restore him. If he refuses to perform that duty, he should not ask the state or any person to assist him in that refusal. He cannot be compelled to undergo an operation, but he can be told that if he refuses he shall not receive compensation for that which he voluntarily continues.

2. The reasonableness of the refusal of an injured employee to submit to an operation has been considered in most, if not all, the cases where he has been denied compensation on account of such refusal. That reasonableness has been disposed of in those cases as a question of fact. Trial—question for jury—refusal to submit to operation—reasonableness.

It is a question of fact that must be determined by the trier of facts and when he has determined it, and his conclusion is supported by evidence, that conclusion is binding on this court the same as the determination of any other question of fact. In the present case the district court tried the fact of the reasonableness of the refusal of the plaintiff to permit an operation. The court in substance found that the plaintiff's refusal was unreasonable.

3. The plaintiff argues that "there was no testimony to support the court's finding and judgment that the appellant was not totally incapacitated."

The finding was not made as thus indicated, but in substance it amounted to that. That plaintiff testified: "I have not been able to do any work of any kind since I had the accident, except I did a little work on a neighbor's automobile. I did no lifting, and it took me two weeks to get it done, and I was paid $10. I helped to make a fence. I stapled the wire; I did none of the heavy work; I was paid $5 for that. That is all of the work I have been able to do, and all I have earned since the accident. I cannot do manual labor because I am injured through my shoulders and arms, and the rupture; I cannot get a truss to hold it up and keep it up properly. Have not been able to. When I try to work I do not have the strength I had before, and I suffer pain."

One physician testified: "I think he could do light work without any trouble and without any danger of increasing these hernias."

Another physician testified: "I think this man could do light work very nicely with the aid of a truss, and without danger."

That evidence was sufficient to support the finding of partial disability after the period of total disability expired, and to support the finding that the plaintiff was able to earn $5.25 a week, "approximately 30 per cent of prior wages."

sufficiency.

* 4. The plaintiff contends that the defendant is estopped to question the correctness of the award by reason of its having paid the $500.26, the amount found due by the arbitrator at the time the award was made. The statute, § 16 of chapter 226 of the Laws of 1917, under which this proceeding was instituted, in part reads: "At any time before the final payment has been made under or pursuant to any award or modification thereof agreed upon by the parties, it may be reviewed by the judge of the district court having jurisdiction."

This statute provides for a review of the award after payments have been made under it. The defendant is not estopped to question the correctness of the award.

(5) The plaintiff challenges the power of the court to review the award of the arbitrator on the ground that the statute provides for such review for the following reasons only: "That the award has been obtained by fraud or undue influence, or that the committee or arbitrator making the award acted without authority or was guilty of serious misconduct or that the award is grossly excessive or grossly inadequate, or that the incapacity or disability of the workman has increased or diminished." Laws 1917, chap. 226, § 16.

The plaintiff cites Roper v. Hammer, 106 Kan. 374, 187 Pac. 858. That case does not control here, for the reason that the statute authorizes a review of the award where the amount given is grossly excessive. In its petition to review the award, the defendant alleged "that since the tender of said operation and its refusal by claimant, the defendant says all payments directed to be made thereafter for total disability are grossly excessive, and the award of sums after the refusal of the tender is without authority on the part of the arbitrator."

Compensation for total disability, $10.65 a week, was awarded. The court found that there was no total disability, but that there was partial disability, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover $7.50 a week during partial disability. This amounted to a finding that the award of the arbitrator was grossly excessive, and brought the proceeding within the statute authorizing a review of the award by the district court.

The judgment is affirmed.

West, J., dissenting:

After about twenty-five years of European experiment, this country began to enact workmen's compensation laws. In 1884, Germany, by an accident insurance act, began the change which has thus developed. Maryland enacted a statute of this kind in 1902, followed by Montana in 1909, and New York in 1910. Ours was passed in 1911. In Germany 700,000 accidents, with 10,000 fatalities, occurred annually. The situation was less startling than in the United States, where there were from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 accidents, with from 25,000 to 30,000 fatalities. Americana, vol. 29, p. 520.

"The great object of the workmen's compensation acts is to shift the burden of such economic waste from the employee to the industry, in order that it may ultimately be borne by the consumer as a part of the necessary cost of production." Kiser, Workmen's Comp. Acts, 8.

the liability of injured workmen becoming public charges. Id. page 15.

Sixteen states and Porto Rico are named in the majority opinion as having provided by legislative enactment for the reduction, suspension, or rejection of compensation for unreasonable refusal to accept medical treatment or to submit to surgical operation. But our statute, with all its detail and all its amendments, although providing expressly for medical examination and refusal thereof, is utterly silent as to the duty of the employee to submit to a surgical operation as a condition precedent to receiving compensation. Hence, all the decisions in states which have covered this matter by legislation could be of no avail on the question here.

In 1916, twenty-five states had already enacted compensation acts. 21 New International Enc. 228. Very few of the courts of these states have had this question before them. The matter of compensation covered by our statute has nothing whatever to do with damages for injury in the ordinary acceptance of that term, and hence such decisions as Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. v. Duncan, 6 Kan. App. 178, 51 Pac. 310, have no application. Cases are cited from Michigan, but the reason is not apparent, for in Andrejwski v. Wolverine Coal Co. 182 Mich. 298, 148 N. W. 684, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 724, 6 N. C. C. A. 807, it was held that the Compensation Act of that state was in derogation of the common law requiring strict construction, which is diametrically opposed to our decisions and to our statute which expressly provides that such statutes shall be liberally construed to promote their objects. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 11,829; Southern Paint & Wall Paper Co. v. Perkins, 90 Kan. 725, 136 Pac. 324.

In the cited Schiller Case, where the writer of that opinion said that the overwhelming weight of authority is opposed to this view, one of the cases going to make up this overwhelming weight is United R. & Electric Co. v. Dean, 117 Md. 686, 84

Atl. 75, which, upon examination, turns out to be an action for injury brought by a passenger against a railway company.

Numerous decisions, including some of those cited in the foregoing opinion, treat hernia as a very trivial matter. Inguinal hernia is an escape of a portion of the intestine into the inguinal canal. The known dangers are congestion, inflammation, and strangulation. Strangulation is well understood to be a most serious and dangerous condition; the per cent of fatalities being very large. The modern operation for inguinal hernia is to make an incision, close the walls of the inguinal canal as nearly as possible, and unite by suture.

In an article by Dr. Joseph A. Blake, in volume 5 of the Reference Handbook of the Medical Sciences, published in 1915, going most learnedly and extensively into the subject of hernia, after describing the various modern operations for inguinal hernia, this language is used: "As a rule children under four years of age and adults over fifty should not be operated upon, inasmuch as many children are cured by the wearing of a truss, and in the aged the hernia can be controlled by truss with less inconvenience than in the younger and more active while the dangers of operation are greater." Page 219.

The plaintiff testified he was fifty-four years old; that in pushing a wheelbarrow loaded with 200 or 300 pounds of iron the runway broke and threw the wheelbarrow full of iron to the bottom of the car, and plunged him headlong, so that he struck with all his weight on the upturned edge thereof, striking him in the lower abdominal region; that he had a rupture when he was a boy about eight years old, which healed up when he was about twelve, and he wore a truss until he was about twenty-one, and had never had any trouble about doing any heavy work since. He said he had no particular surgeon he had confidence in, and was not willing to choose a hospital or surgeon and be operated on. "My particular reason for refusing to do so is that I think I am too old, I am fifty-four years of age. That is one reason; another is that I do not think I could stand it under my present age and condition. . . . I am not in condition, because I was jammed through here (indicating). By jammed through here, I mean my ribs was pulled away from my breastbone, and my spine is numb."

Dr. Stemen testified that the plaintiff had a large inguinal hernia; that the percentage of successful operations by the best doctors runs from 80 to 90 per cent. "An operation for inguinal hernia, such an operation as the person here possesses, is a major operation, and attended with some danger. I mean there is always some danger with the anesthetic, and always some danger of streptococcic infection, but the dangers are very, very minute. I would say they have 999 chances out of one thousand in getting well, but I qualify that by saying there is always some danger. . . . The danger of an operation depends upon the individual. Shock and fear have a great deal to do with an operation. . . . The chance of a complete recovery in such an operation as would be necessary in Mr. Strong's case are affected somewhat by the person's age. The cases of complete recovery are greater in young people than in older people, and in the case of a man fifty-four years of age the percentage of chances of complete recovery is much less than it would be in the case of a younger person."

Dr. Gray testified that the plaintiff's heart had some defect in the aortic valves. Dr. Lowman, who had performed 300 or 400 hernia operations, on cross-examination said: "About 10 per cent of the hernia operations are not complete successes. This is partly due to the individual conditions. Part of it is due to infection, and part of it is due to poor quality of gut and the breaking. All kinds of things may occur in a surgical operation, even with the most extreme care."

The legislature, which since 1911 has been making provisions for the recovery of workmen's compensation, has gone into detail in minutiae, and said that one injured in the course of his employment shall receive compensation. It has, with apparent studiousness, avoided any such condition precedent as a refusal to submit to a surgical operation.

That a man like the plaintiff with no family, or one with a wife and children dependent upon him, must be barred from the benefits of the act, and thereby become in a greater or less degree a public charge, and thus bring on the very condition this legislation was confessedly made to avoid, is a startling declaration.

Even the British courts, followed by the very few tribunals which, in the absence of statute, have taken the view of the matter so ably stated by the majority opinion, have spoken almost apologetically, as an examination of the cases of Warncken v. Richard Moreland & Son, 100 L. T. N. S. 12, [1909] 1 K. B. 184, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 332, 25 Times L. R. 129, 53 Sol. Jo. 134, 2 B. W. C. C. 350; Tutton v. The Majestic, 100 L. T. N. S. 644, [1909] 2 K. B. 54, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 530, 25 Times L. R. 482, 53 Sol. Jo. 447; Binns v. Kearley & Tonge, 6 B. W. C. C. 608, 611, and Walsh v. Lock & Co. (Newland) 110 L. T. N. S. 452, 7 B. W. C. C. 117, will show.

With the eloquent eulogy on industry I agree, if industry be considered merely in contradistinction to idleness. But we are told in the sacred account of the creation that after the fall it was said to Adam:

"Because thou hast harkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life;

"Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field;

"In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground. . . ." Genesis iii. 17, 18, 19.

I am not ready to believe that the fallen state of our first parents was better than their primal innocence, that thorns and briars are better than flowers and fruits, that "the man with the hoe" has a more desirable life than one with means of leisure, or that incessant toil is the ultima Thule of human existence. Nothing has more thoroughly marked the process of social economics and modern legislation than the belief that there should be time for recreation and cultivation of the intellectual, emotional, and spiritual elements of our nature, and such leisure is more to be desired than a treadmill, galley-slave life or a self-imposed immolation upon the altar of hard work.

Our Workmen's Compensation Act was passed in order that employees receiving injuries arising out of and in the course of their employment should not have to resort to lawsuits or be compelled to suffer without remedy; that the consumers in paying for the products should have added to their cost a sum sufficient to justify the employer in paying a reasonable compensation. This was in order that the injured workman might have the means of livelihood, and not become a pauper to be supported by the public. The scheme involves no loss to the employer, because it assumes that he will fix the price of his products so as to save himself from any sacrifice whatever. And why should he be rewarded by the public by being permitted to withhold compensation because a workman suffering with an inguinal hernia does not at the age of fifty-four, feel safe in submitting to a surgical operation?

This class of legislation is in its infancy. The progress of events in relation thereto is all in one direction. Where the legislature has been silent, the courts should also be silent. If a prophecy might be ventured, it would be that before this generation shall have passed the decisions followed and announced by the few courts constituting the present small numerical majority will not only be repudiated, but will be pointed to with anything but pride.

But we are told that "the state has gone to great expense to fit its people for work, to protect them in their work, and to secure to them the result of their labor. Then if a man who receives these favors from the state will not work he, at least, is not a good citizen."

I do not like the paternalistic ring of these words. The state does nothing for "its people." The people do things for themselves through the instrumentality of "their state." They are under no load of gratitude to the state for laws which their own chosen representatives have enacted. The state has gone to no expense at all in providing compensation for the plaintiff. It does not pay or promise to pay him one cent. His employer has simply been authorized to charge enough more for its output to compensate him when disabled in the line of duty. His good citizenship does not depend on his submitting to what Dr. Stemen pronounces a major operation in order to receive what the legislature has provided for him without such submission. As a good citizen he is to be commended for asking what his own representatives have declared he may receive in case of disablement in the course of his employment, on the exact terms laid down. No duty rests on him to add to those plain terms a dangerous condition precedent, and thereby run the risk of adding himself to the number of those whose earning capacity is destroyed by death or diminished by helpless infirmity.

It is hard to believe that courts have hanged witches, sentenced men to death for shooting hares, and in effect told injured employees, when asking for safe places to work, that they could quit or starve. Indeed the ancient and ever comparatively recent disregard of the law for life and limb and human comfort is almost unbelievable. But be it said to the credit of the law that in all these matters we are in a new dispensation. Let us not go back to the old.

under the Workmen's Compensation Act, to submit to an operation or to take other measures to restore earning capacity, is the subject of annotation in 6 A.L.R. 1260, which is supplemented by the annotation following HENLEY v. OKLAHOMA UNION R. Co. post, 431.

NOTE.

The duty of an injured employee,

J. H. HENLEY, Appt.,

v.

OKLAHOMA-UNION RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

Oklahoma Supreme Court — February 15, 1921.

Workmen's compensation — power to require operation.

1. Section 7, Sess. Laws 1919, chapter 14, provides: "The employer shall promptly provide for an injured employee such medical, surgical or other attendance or treatment, nurse and hospital service, medicine, crutches and apparatus as may be necessary, during sixty days after the injury or for such time in excess thereof as in the judgment of the commission may be required. If the employer fails to provide the same, the injured employee may do so at the expense of the employer. The employee shall not be entitled to recover any amount expended by him for such treatment or services unless he shall have requested the employer to furnish the same and the employer shall have refused or neglected to do so." Held, said section is for the benefit of the injured employee, providing for him proper medical and surgical treatment at the expense of the employer in addition to the compensation provided for in said act resulting from injuries arising in the course of his employment, and that under the provisions of § 7, supra, the state industrial board is without jurisdiction to order the injured employee to submit to a major operation involving a risk of life, however slight, in order that the pecuniary obligations created by the law in his favor against his employer may be minimized.

—liberal construction of rules.

2. The Workmen's Compensation Laws of this state deprive the injured employee of the right of action in the courts of the state to recover damages for injury received, and provide a limited amount of compensation during disability, and said laws were adopted with the view of enabling employer and employee to settle their differences without litigation, and to enable each employee, not guilty of wilful misconduct, to receive quickly a reasonable recompense for the injuries accidentally received in the course of his employment, under certain fixed rules. These laws must be liberally construed in favor of the injured employee.

—award on condition of operation.

3. An award of the state industrial commission, in case of injuries resulting in hernia, requiring claimant to undergo an operation or forfeit his right to compensation, is error. The rule is that the industrial commission must award compensation as provided for by law for the disability of an injured employee as it exists at the time of making the award, and the commission is without jurisdiction to impose upon the injured employee the option of submitting to a major operation or forfeiting his right to compensation. [See note in 6 A.L.R. 1260.]

APPEAL by claimant from a decision of the State Industrial Commission directing him to submit to an operation or forfeit his right to compensation in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for an injury received while in the employ of defendants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. M. Springer and E. G. Wilson for appellant.

Messrs. Abernathy & Howell and S. P. Freeling, Attorney General, for respondents.

Kenamer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This matter is before the court upon a petition filed by J. H. Henley, claimant, to review an award made by the state industrial commission on the 3d day of May, 1920, which is as follows:

"Now on this 3d day of May, 1920, the above cause coming on to be heard pursuant to legal notice given and the commission having examined all reports on file, and being well and sufficiently advised in the premises, finds: That the claimant, while in the employ of the respondent and in the course of his employment, was injured March 13, 1920, and as a result of said injury developed a hernia, and that it would be to his best interest to receive an operation for said injury.

"The commission further finds that he is entitled to an operation and compensation for four weeks at the rate of $14.58 per week, being a total sum of $58.32.

"It is ordered: That within ten days from this date the Aetna Life Insurance Company or the Oklahoma Union Railway Company pay to the above claimant compensation computed from March 13, 1920, at the rate of $14.58 per week, continuing until termination of disability, unless within ten days from this date the respondent will notify the claimant and the commission of its willingness to pay for the operation. In such event claimant shall in ten days thereafter notify the insurance carrier or respondent and the industrial commission of its willingness to accept said operation.

"It is further ordered: If the claimant agrees to accept said operation, the insurance carrier or respondent shall make all necessary arrangements for claimant to receive said operation and pay all cost incident thereto, including the hospital, surgical, nurse, cost of medicine, and other expenses incident thereto, and the traveling expenses of the claimant from his home to the place where said operation will be performed, said operation to be performed within thirty days after the claimant agrees to accept same, unless additional time is agreed upon by the parties thereto.

"It is further ordered: That in the event said operation is accepted, upon its performance the respondent pay to the claimant four weeks' compensation at the rate of $14.58, being a total sum of $58.32. If said operation is refused by claimant, the respondent's liability shall cease upon payment of four weeks' compensation."

The award found that the claimant had developed a hernia as a result of an accident occurring in the course of his employment, and gave him the alternative of an operation or accepting $58.32, four weeks' compensation, and in the event the claimant failed or refused to submit to the operation as ordered by the commission, further compensation, irrespective of the condition of the claimant, was denied.

Section 7, chapter 14, Session Laws of 1919, provides: "The employer shall promptly provide for an injured employee such medical, surgical or other attendance or treatment, nurse and hospital service, medicine, crutches and apparatus as may be necessary, during sixty days after the injury or for such time in excess thereof as in the judgment of the commission may be required. If the employer fails to provide the same, the injured employee may do so at the expense of the employer. The employee shall not be entitled to recover any amount expended by him for such treatment or services unless he shall have requested the employer to furnish the same and the employer shall have refused or neglected to do so."

It is apparent that the state industrial commission has misconstrued § 7, supra, in that they have exercised jurisdiction to order the claimant herein to submit to a major operation under penalty, in case of his failure to comply with the order, of forfeiting his right to compensation. A careful reading of § 7, supra, herein, fails to disclose the authority for the commission directing the injured employee to submit to a major operation under penalty or forfeiting his right to compensation. Section 7, supra, of said act, provides for the injured employee proper medical and surgical treatment at the expense of the employer; and the treatment provided for is in addition to the compensation provided for under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1919, during disability; but nowhere in said act is the commission authorized to require the injured employee to submit to a serious operation involving a risk of life, however slight, in order that the pecuniary obligation created by the law in his favor may be minimized. The award in the case at bar presupposes that the operation would be successful, and that the claimant would be cured. This is in excess of the commission's authority. The respondents in their brief contend that an operation for hernia is not regarded as a dangerous or serious operation, but is a comparatively slight inconvenience, and results in a permanent cure. The record in the present cause does not disclose the kind of hernia the claimant was afflicted with; but we cannot agree with the contention that an ordinary operation for hernia is to be regarded as a slight inconvenience, and we know of no medical authority or reputable physician that would class an operation for hernia as a minor operation. On the other hand, ordinary hernia requires the administration of an anesthetic and an incision of the abdominal wall, and in some instances it proves fatal. The rule appears to be supported by the overwhelming weight of authority that no man shall be compelled to take a risk of death, however slight, in order that the pecuniary obligation created by law in his favor against his employer may be minimized. Tutton v. The Majestic [1909] 2 K. B. 54, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 530, 100 L. T. N. S. 644, 25 Times L. R. 482, 53 Sol. Jo. 447; Blate v. Third Ave. R. Co. 44 App. Div. 163, 60 N. Y. Supp. 732; McNally v. Hudson & M. R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 455, 95 Atl. 122, 10 N. C. C. A. 185; Donovan v. New Orleans R. & Light Co. 132 La. 239, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 109, 61 So. 216. See note in 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 110; McNamara v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 133 Mo. App. 645, 114 S. W. 50; Guild v. Portland R. Light & P. Co. 64 Or. 570, 131 Pac. 310; Jendrus v. Detroit Steel Products Co. 178 Mich. 265, L.R.A.1916A, 381, 144 N. W. 563, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 476, 4 N. C. C. A. 864.

In the case of McNally v. Hudson & M. R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 455, 95 Atl. 122, 10 N. C. C. A. 185, supra, the supreme court of New Jersey, in considering a case almost identical with the case at bar, said: "The consensus of opinion of the medical witnesses is that the operation is a major one, accompanied with some peril to life. Although the peril to life seems to be very slight, 48 chances in 23,000, nevertheless the idea is appalling to one's conscience that a human being should be compelled to take a risk of death, however slight that may be, in order that the pecuniary obligation created by law in his favor against his employer may be minimized. The English cases cited by counsel for defendant do not lay down any such doctrine. . . . We think the sound rule on the subject to be as stated by Lord McLaren, in Donnelly v. Baird [1908] S. C. (on page 536), which is as follows: 'In view of the great diversity of cases raising this question, I can see no general principle except this, that if the operation is not attended with danger to life and health, or extraordinary suffering, and if, according to the best medical or surgical opinion, the operation offers a reasonable prospect of restoration or relief from the incapacity from which the workman is suffering, then he must either submit to the operation or release his employers from the obligation to maintain him.' . . . It cannot, however, be properly said that where it appears, as it does in the present case, that a risk of life is involved, that the refusal of the prosecutor to submit to an operation is unreasonable. There was, therefore, no basis for the order made by the trial judge that the prosecutor should submit to an operation. The compensation adjudged by the court is a weekly compensation. In the event that the prosecutor chooses to submit to an operation and recovers, the defendant can petition the trial court to reduce the compensation or stop it, if the proper number of weeks have elapsed for which compensation should have been made."

In the case of McNamara v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 133 Mo. App. 645, 114 S. W. 50, supra, the court said: "We do not think plaintiff should be criticized and punished on account of his failure to undergo a surgical operation. He should be accorded the right to choose between suffering from the disease all his life or taking the risk of an unsuccessful outcome of a serious surgical operation. Certainly, defendant, whose negligence produced the unfortunate condition, is in no position to compel plaintiff again to risk his life in order that the damages may be lessened. To give heed to such contention would be to carry to an absurd extreme the rule which requires a person damaged by the wrong of another to do all that reasonably may be done to minimize his damages."

The Workmen's Compensation Laws of this state abolish the right of the injured employee to maintain an action for damages in the court, and vests the state industrial commission with jurisdiction to award compensation for injuries sustained by the employee in the course of his employment at a fixed rate prescribed by the statute, which amount is 50 per cent of the average weekly earning, during the disability, or partial disability, of the injured employee until the maximum amount prescribed by the act has been paid. In view of the fact that the law has abolished the right of action of the injured employee to recover damages for his injuries, the law should be liberally and fairly construed in favor of the injured employee; and in making an award the industrial commission has no authority to impose any condition upon the injured employee not authorized by law.

That part of the award, in the case at bar, directing the claimant to submit to an operation or forfeit his right to compensation, is unauthorized and beyond the jurisdiction of the commission, and the award herein made is reversed and remanded, with directions that the claimant be allowed compensation during disability as prescribed by law.

All the Justices concur, except Miller, J., absent and not participating.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: duty of injured employee to submit to operation, or to take other measures to restore earning capacity.

This annotation is supplementary to that in 6 A.L.R. 1260, on the above question.

Generally, as to duty of injured person to submit to operation to reduce damages, see annotation to Gibbs v. Almstrom, 11 A.L.R. 230.

As stated in the prior annotation, it is a settled rule that an injured workman will be denied compensation for incapacity which may be removed or modified by an operation of a simple character, not involving serious suffering or danger.

And it will be observed that in STRONG v. SONKEN-GALAMBA IRON & METAL CO. (reported herewith) ante, 415, where the employee had sustained a hernia, it was held that the unreasonable refusal of an injured employee to permit a surgical operation, where the danger to life therefrom would be very slight, and the probabilities of a permanent cure very large, justifies a refusal of an award under the Compensation Act, and that the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the refusal of an injured employee to permit an operation is a question of fact to be determined from the evidence.

And in Schiller v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1920) 137 Md. 235, 112 Atl. 272, the court stated that, by the overwhelming weight of authority, an injured employee cannot continue to receive compensation and at the same time refuse to submit to proper medical or surgical treatment such as an ordinarily reasonable man would submit to under like circumstances, and it held that evidence as to the safety of an operation for hernia and its probable effect in removing the claimant's disability was relevant.

In Myers v. Wadsworth Mfg. Co. (1921) — Mich. —, 183 N. W. 913, where the only medical witness who testified stated that the proposed operation to the claimant's arm would be a minor one, attended with little or no risk or pain, and that the hand certainly would be no worse, and that there was a good chance of improving the function by the operation, it was held the duty of the claimant to submit to an operation, and that his refusal to do so was unreasonable.

And in Rosenthal & Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 295 Ill. 182, 129 N. E. 177, where the Compensation Act vested the industrial commission with the right to suspend the compensation of an injured employee if he shall refuse to submit to such surgical treatment as is reasonably essential to promote his recovery, it was held that whether the operation is reasonably essential is for the industrial commission to determine upon the evidence submitted to it, and that it is only in a case where the commission has acted unreasonably or has abused its discretion that the court will interfere with its finding; and it was held that a finding of the commission suspending the award because of the employee's refusal to submit to an operation for hernia was justified, there being evidence that his life would not be jeopardized by the operation, and that the condition caused by the hernia could be so corrected that he could resume work, and that the operation would be a minor one.

And in Mt. Olive Coal Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 295 Ill. 429, 129 N. E. 103, where the operation to the employee's wrist which was necessary to restore its use was a simple one, unattended with danger, and with no pain, under an entirely safe anesthetic, the continuance of his total disability was held due to his unreasonable refusal to submit to an operation. The court said: "It is conceded that there is no power in the industrial commission or elsewhere to compel defendant in error to submit to an operation, but, on the other hand, it must be conceded that whether the loss of 80 per cent of the use of the right hand of defendant in error is attributable to the accident or to the refusal of defendant in error to have the adhesions in the tendons forcibly broken up is a question for the commission, in the first instance, to determine. The uncontradicted evidence in the record shows that there was no possibility of danger to defendant in error from the operation. It is such an operation as any reasonable man would take advantage of, if he had no one against whom he could claim compensation. A reasonable and salutary rule, which has been followed by the American and English courts of last resort, is this: 'If the operation is not attended with danger to life or health or extraordinary suffering, and if, according to the best medical or surgical opinion, the operation offers a reasonable prospect of restoration or relief from the incapacity from which the workman is suffering, then he must either submit to the operation or release his employer from the obligation to maintain him.' Kricinovich v. American Car & Foundry Co. (1916) 192 Mich. 687, 159 N. W. 362; Jandrus v. Detroit Steel Products Co. (1913) 178 Mich. 265, L.R.A.1916A, 381, 144 N. W. 563, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 476, 4 N. C. C. A. 864; Lesh v. Illinois Steel Co. (1916) 163 Wis. 124, L.R.A.1916E, 105, 157 N. W. 539. The evidence here shows, without dispute, that there is a solid union of the bone, and that the only thing the matter with defendant in error is the adhesions in the tendons of his wrist and hand. The operation is a simple one, attended with no danger whatever, and with no pain under a mild and entirely safe anesthetic. We must therefore hold the permanent disability of defendant in error is due to his refusal to submit to this simple operation, and not due to the accident. Joliet Motor Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 280 Ill. 148, 117 N. E. 423, 15 N. C. C. A. 75. For the errors appearing in the record this cause must be remanded to the industrial commission for further proceedings consistent with the views expressed in this opinion. If the operation should be had and prove unsuccessful, plaintiff in error would be liable for whatever loss of use of his hand defendant in error suffers, as well as surgical and hospital services necessary for the operation and for treatment already received, but if successful its liability would be for temporary loss of time, and for treatments had and surgical and hospital expenses incurred in the operation. Whatever time the commission finds, from the evidence, defendant in error has lost by his unreasonable refusal to submit to this operation, must be credited to plaintiff in error in awarding compensation. Such loss of time must be attributed to the voluntary act of defendant in error in refusing to submit to proper medical treatment, and must not be attributed to the accident."

In Shea v. O'Neill (1919) 13 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 560, where a workman sustained an injury to his finger, which rendered the first joint stiff and painful, it was held that his refusal to undergo a slight operation was unreasonable, where one doctor stated that if the top of the finger were removed the workman's capacity for work would be increased, and that the operation would not be dangerous, except for the danger arising from the anesthetic, and another doctor agreed with the other's opinion, but stated that if the top joint of the finger were removed there would be a serious risk that a still larger portion of the finger might have to be removed.

In HENLEY v. OKLAHOMA UNION R. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 427, however, the section of the Compensation Act providing that the employer should promptly provide an injured employee with such medical, surgical, or other attendance or treatment, or hospital service, as might be necessary during sixty days after injury, or for such time thereafter as in the judgment of the commission might be required, was held not to authorize the commission to order an injured employee to submit to a major operation for hernia, under penalty, in case of failure to comply with the order, of forfeiting his right to compensation.

In Smith v. Battjes Fuel & Bldg. Material Co. (1918) 204 Mich. 9, 169 N. W. 943, the finding of the board that the refusal of the injured employee to submit to proposed operations upon his arm was not unreasonable was held warranted by the evidence, and an order refusing to allow the discontinuance of payments was affirmed.

In Grant v. State Industrial Acci. Commission (1921) — Or. —, 201 Pac. 438, where the statute provided for suspension of compensation for the time that a workman should refuse to submit to such medical treatment as the commission deemed "reasonably essential to promote his recovery," it was construed to mean that the workman's right to compensation should be suspended if he refused to submit to an operation to which an ordinarily reasonable man would submit, if similarly situated, and the determination whether he had so refused was held a question of fact for the jury, and where there was evidence, in part, that an operation on the workman's knee would be a major one, and might result in a "stiff knee," the jury found that his refusal to submit to an operation was reasonable, and the court was held bound by the jury's decision.

In Fife Coal Co. v. Cant (1920) 65 Sol. Jo. (Eng.) 204, 90 L. J. P. C. N. S. 69, [1921] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 79, 124 L. T. N. S. 545, 13 B. W. C. C. 449, the evidence was held sufficient to support the arbitrator's finding that the employers had not established that the employee's incapacity was due to his unreasonable refusal to undergo a surgical operation, there being testimony that the employee had sustained an injury to his thumb, and that the employer's physicians were of opinion that an operation to the thumb would enable him to have much more use of that member, but the employee's physician stated that the operation contemplated was of an experimental nature, and that it would not restore the hand so as to make it of real service.

Missouri Supreme Court (In Banc)—May 24, 1921.

(— Mo. —, 231 S. W. 997.)

Covenant — tiers of double houses.

1. A restriction of the use of a lot to not more than one dwelling house on each 50-foot frontage forbids the erection on 125 feet of frontage of a building divided by solid walls into six double buildings, to open two on the street and four on a court in the rear, and designed to accommodate thirty-six separate families.

Appeal — suit to enjoin violation of restrictive covenant — effect of expiration of covenant.

2. Although the time during which the use of real estate for building purposes is restricted by the deed of conveyance expires pending appeal from 18 A.L.R.—28.

a judgment dismissing a bill to enjoin its violation, the appellate court does not lose jurisdiction, where appellant has become liable on his injunction bond and for costs if the case is not reversed.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis (Falkenhainer, J.) dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from constructing a dwelling house in alleged violation of the restrictions in a deed under which they claimed title, and overruling a motion for new trial. Reversed.

Statement by Railey, C.:

This action was commenced in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, Missouri, on October 3, 1916, by the above-mentioned plaintiffs, who are residents and owners of homes in city block 4864 of the city of St. Louis, Missouri, to enjoin said defendants from constructing, upon a portion of said block 4864, a three-story apartment house, containing thirty-six separate and distinct apartments, in violation of the restrictions in the deed under which said defendants claim title, which recites that not more than one dwelling house may be constructed on the 50-foot front of said lot.

The defendants answered, partially admitting the allegations of petition, denying other averments therein, and pleading, by way of waiver and abandonment, that the above restriction was no longer in force. The reply is a general denial of the new matter contained in the answer.

The evidence shows that Selah Chamberlain, a resident of Ohio, was the owner of city block 4864, in St. Louis, Missouri, bounded on the south by Maple avenue, running east and west, and by Chamberlain avenue on the north, also running east and west; that prior to May 31, 1887, said Chamberlain and wife sold all of the property in said block 4864 to various persons; and that each and every deed made by him contained the same covenants and restrictions as are recited in the deed to defendant Hess. On May 31, 1887, said Selah Chamberlain, who was then the owner of five or six tracts of land lying in the vicinity of said block 4864, filed a plat in the recorder's office, laying off said last-described tracts of land into lots and blocks, and designating the same as Chamberlain park. The latter entirely surrounded block 4864, supra, except on the south.

It was stipulated and agreed at the trial "that all of the plaintiffs and the defendants own property in city block No. 4864 and hold title to their said property by and through deeds from Selah Chamberlain, and that all of the deeds through which all of the plaintiffs and all of the defendants held title contained the same covenants and restrictions as those contained in the deed from Selah Chamberlain and wife to Josiah A. Parker, . . . and that all of the property in city block No. 4864 is subject to the same restrictions, and is held under a common source of title, namely, Selah Chamberlain and that all of the property in city block No. 4864 had been sold by said Selah Chamberlain, prior to May 31, 1887."

The deed from Chamberlain and wife to Josiah A. Parker aforesaid is dated February 19, 1887, and, among other things, contains the following: "The foregoing conveyance and grant is hereby declared to be subject to and limited by the following exceptions, reservations, conditions, and reversion: That neither said grantee nor anyone claiming by, through, or under him prior to the last day of December,

A. D. 1920: I. Shall construct or allow to be constructed on the premises above described any dwelling house less than two stories in height. II. Shall construct or allow to be constructed more than one such dwelling on each 50-foot front of said lot. III. Shall construct or allow to be constructed thereon any dwelling to cost less than $4,000 in cash, nor locate or erect such dwelling nearer than 30 feet to the line of the street on which such dwelling fronts. IV. Shall construct or allow to be constructed any stable, shed, or out-house nearer to any public driveway than 100 feet. V. Shall construct or allow to be constructed or erected, or to exist, any nuisance, or any livery stable or manufacturing establishment of any kind on said premises. VI. Shall construct or allow to be constructed, used, or occupied, any grocery store, bar-room, or business place for the bargain and sale of any kind of merchandise on said premises."

It is conceded that defendant Hess, about sixty days before the trial below, bought from defendant Schwenker the following-described property, to wit: "A lot in Chamberlain park in block No. 4864 of the city of St. Louis, having a front of 125 feet on the north line of Maple avenue, by a depth northwardly between parallel lines of 155 feet to a line, bounded on the west by a line 130 east of the east line of Clara avenue."

It is admitted that the above deed to Hess contains the same covenants, restrictions, etc., as are recited in the deed from Chamberlain to Parker aforesaid. It is also undisputed that defendant Hess knew of the above restrictions when he was negotiating for said property, and when he received his deed therefor.

It appears from the evidence that all of the property in said block 4864, except about 200 feet which was vacant, had been improved, before defendant Hess purchased his property, with high-class residences, owned by the plaintiffs; that each of said houses was used as a single-family dwelling house, was more than two stories in height, and each cost from $10,000 to $15,000; that each house occupied 50 feet or more of ground, fronting on either Chamberlain avenue or Maple avenue; that all of said houses were built and used in accordance with the covenants and restrictions contained in the Parker deed, supra. It does not appear from the evidence that buildings of any kind were ever constructed in said block 4864, other than single private dwelling houses.

Plaintiffs offered in evidence a copy of the plans for the construction of the proposed building of defendant Hess, which is marked exhibit C, and, in order to avoid repetition, will be considered in the opinion with such matters as may be deemed of importance.

On April 7, 1919, the court below entered a decree in favor of defendants against all of the plaintiffs and dismissed the bill of latter. Plaintiffs, in due time, filed their motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the cause duly appealed by them to this court.

Mr. S. T. G. Smith, for appellants:

Courts should give effect to the plain intention of the parties in imposing restrictions on land, and not seek ingenious subtleties of interpretation by which to avoid the same.

The words, "neither said grantee, nor anyone claiming by, through, or under him, . . . shall construct, or allow to be constructed, more than one such dwelling on each 50-foot front of said lot," when contained in the covenant of the deed by which title is held, are violated by the erection of six separate groups of apartments.

Railey, C., filed the following opinion:

1. Upon the issuing of a temporary restraining order by the trial court in this case, plaintiffs were required to, and did, give a $5,000 injunction bond. On November 29, 1916, the restraining order aforesaid was dissolved by the court, and the temporary injunction denied. On December 2, 1916, defendants filed herein a motion to assess the damages on the bond aforesaid.

Appeal—suit to enjoin violation of restrictive covenant—effect of expiration of covenant.

The restrictions in the deed to defendant Hess terminated on December 31, 1920. While this court could not issue, or direct the lower court to issue, a restraining order enjoining defendants from constructing said building on block 4864 aforesaid, by reason of the termination of said restrictions, yet, as plaintiffs have incurred liability on said bond for damages, and have become responsible for the costs of this litigation, should the judgment below be affirmed, or the appeal dismissed, they, as well as the public, still have an interest in the result of the litigation, which requires at our hands an investigation of the merits. *Civic League v. —effect on right to assess damages on injunction bond.

2. It is contended by respondents that the covenants and restrictions aforesaid are in derogation of the right of unrestricted use of property, and should not be extended by implication, or to include anything not plainly prohibited. We are cited, in support of this contention, to Zinn v. Sidler, 268 Mo. 689, L.R.A.1917A, 455, 187 S. W. 1172; Kitchen v. Hawley, 150 Mo. App. 503, 131 S. W. 142; Pank v. Eaton, 115 Mo. App. 176, 89 S. W. 586; and Hartman v. Wells, 257 Ill. 167, 100 N. E. 500, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 901. On the other hand, appellants contend that the courts should give effect to the plain intention of the parties imposing restrictions on land, and not seek ingenious subtleties of interpretation by which to avoid the same. In support of this contention we are cited to Zinn v. Sidler, 268 Mo. 680, L.R.A.1917A, 455, 187 S. W. 1172; Reed v. Hazard, 187 Mo. App. 547, 174 S. W. 111; Noel v. Hill, 158 Mo. App. 426, 138 S. W. 364; Sanders v. Dixon, 114 Mo. App. 229, 89 S. W. 577. Keeping in mind the contention of both parties, supra, is there anything in the foregoing covenants and restrictions which precludes the defendant from building an apartment on his lot, provided it is constructed as other dwelling houses were required to be built, under the covenants and restrictions aforesaid?

It is possible that if the attention of the parties had been called thereto, in devising the plan for selling lots in block 4864, they might have excluded apartments therefrom, but they did not do so, and hence we conclude that, under the covenants and restrictions before us, the defendant had the right to construct a single building in the nature of a flat or apartment, subject to the same limitations as would apply to an ordinary dwelling house; that is to say, only one such dwelling should be permitted on each 50-foot front of the lot, subject to the other covenants and restrictions aforesaid.

We are therefore of the opinion that the building of an apartment, within itself, would not be violative of the covenants and restrictions aforesaid, if constructed as above indicated.

(a) By parity of reasoning, we do not find anything in said covenants and restrictions which precludes the plural use of a single dwelling house or single apartment.

3. The real question, however, in this case, is not whether a single apartment, built on the same terms and subject to the same restrictions as an ordinary dwelling house, would violate the covenants and restrictions aforesaid, but whether the structure contemplated by defendant Hess was to include more than one dwelling on each 50-foot front on said lot. Mr. Hess bought 125 feet frontage on Maple avenue. Under the covenants and restrictions in his deed, he could only have constructed thereon two ordinary dwelling houses, as not more than one could be built on each 50-foot frontage of his lot. This does not mean that the covenants and restrictions aforesaid authorized him to build one dwelling house on each 50-foot front of his lot, and another of the same character on the same lot in the rear of the former building; that is to say, if his lot contained a 50-foot frontage on Maple avenue, and extended back to the alley, a depth of 155 feet, he could only build on the entire lot a single dwelling house or apartment. This proposition, to our mind, is too plain for argument. We are thus brought face to face with the main question in the case, to wit, whether the plan for the Hess apartment calls for more than one dwelling house on each 50-foot frontage of his lot.

4. It is undisputed that the plan for the foregoing structure called for six double buildings, with an outside entrance into each of said double buildings; that after passing through each of the outside entrances aforesaid, into a hall inside of each double building, there was to be placed a separate door, leading from said hall into each of the buildings constituting said double building. In each of the single buildings constituting the double building the plan called for an apartment, composed of a living room, dining room, kitchen, bathroom, and another room. In other words, there was to be constructed on this lot of 125-foot frontage and 155 feet in depth, six double buildings, with six outside entrances respectively, or the equivalent of twelve single buildings, with each containing, on the ground floor, a living room, dining room, bathroom, and another room, each to be used by separate families as a separate dwelling, without any connection whatever with each other, except through the general entrances aforesaid. The plan called for two of said double buildings to front on Maple avenue, and the remaining four double buildings were to open on a court in the rear of said 155 feet in depth by 125 feet in frontage. It further appears from said plan and the evidence that the masonry walls of said structure, between each of said double buildings, were to extend from the ground to the first floor of the respective ground floor buildings, and that 13-inch brick walls were to be constructed on the respective tops of said masonry walls, extending through the top of the building and 8 or 10 inches above the top of same.

Passing, for the present, the question as to whether each of said twelve ground floor buildings, composing the six double buildings aforesaid, constitute twelve separate and distinct dwelling houses, on a lot 125 feet by 155 feet, we are still confronted with the undisputed fact that said plan calls for the construction of at least six double buildings, two fronting on Maple avenue and four opening into the court in the rear, with six separate solid walls between the respective double buildings, with six separate outside entrances, one opening into each double building, without any intercommunication between said double buildings, and all six of same to be used as a dwelling place for thirty-six separate and distinct families.

We held, under the facts of this case, that the six double buildings could not be legally constructed on the Hess lot with a frontage of 125 feet and a depth of 155 feet. We are of the opinion that no well-considered case can be found announcing a contrary view. The Belin and Darr Cases, relied on by defendants, do not authorize the construction of such an apartment as that called for by the foregoing plans.

5. The latter, as shown by plaintiff's exhibit C, provides that two of the double buildings heretofore mentioned were to front on Maple avenue, with a granitoid passway between them, leading through the court in the rear of said 155 feet. Each of the two double buildings on Maple avenue was to have an outside entrance leading into a hall and from the latter separate doors were to be constructed opening into each of the single buildings composing said group of double buildings. If each of the buildings composing the double buildings on Maple avenue be considered a separate dwelling house, then we would have four separate dwelling houses, to be constructed on a frontage of 125 feet on Maple avenue, in the face of restriction II., supra, which provides that not more than one such dwelling house shall be constructed on each 50-foot front of said lot.

Respondents mainly rely upon the ruling in Bolin v. Tyrol Invest. Co. 273 Mo. 257, L.R.A.1918C, 869, 200 S. W. 1059, and Morrison v. Darr, — Mo. —, 201 S. W. 1147, in support of their contention that there was only a single dwelling house to be constructed on Maple avenue instead of four separate and distinct dwelling houses.

Judge Goode, in Sanders v. Dixon, 114 Mo. App. loc. cit. 253, 89 S. W. 585, very forcefully and clearly stated the law in respect to this matter as follows: "In St. Louis, and all other large cities, there are numerous dwelling houses built together in solid rows. Such structures often have continuous outside walls and foundations, but inside partition walls. They are always spoken of and regarded as different residences or dwellings; and sometimes they cover an entire block. It would be preposterous to call them one dwelling. Unquestionably a building of that kind was prohibited by the covenant in Dixon's deed; that is, putting more than one dwelling of the kind on a single lot. If it was not, what is the restriction worth? It might hinder the building of two detached residences, but two or three semidetached residences would be lawful; that is to say, houses having continuous outside walls and constituting more than one dwelling on a lot. We think such a structure is no less obnoxious to the covenant because designed for use as flats by different families."

"Defendants' counsel lay much stress on the division wall of Dixon's flats being a fire wall put in to comply with certain municipal regulations, and not a party wall. The city ordinances are not before us, but we do not regard the point as material. It is no party wall in the legal sense, because both houses belong to one owner. It hardly would be claimed that the houses are one dwelling if two men owned them. Are they any the less plural dwellings because owned by one man? A brick wall 13 inches thick, resting on a foundation 18 inches thick, entirely separating the two halves of a building 45 feet wide, each half of which is prepared for a home or homes, is, for all practical purposes, a partition wall between two dwellings, if not a party wall. It is as much a partition wall as the dividing wall between residences built in a solid row, each of two or more stories, but all the stories designed for the use of a single family. Our opinion is that the only ambiguity in the covenant is as to whether or not it prohibits one house planned for plural use as a dwelling. It certainly prohibits two houses planned for separate dwellings and divided by a partition wall which bisects the lot; and this is enough to sustain the plaintiffs' case against the continued use of Dixon's houses as now arranged."

The law, as declared by Judge Goode, supra, meets with our approval, and is directly applicable to the case before us. In our opinion, the conclusion reached by the court in Bolin v. Tyrol Invest. Co., and Morrison v. Darr, supra, is unsupported by either reason or authority in respect to the above matter, and should be overruled.

6. In the Bolin Case, supra, the authorities relied upon by respondents are cited and discussed, while those relied on by appellants are fully considered and reviewed by Judge Goode, in Sanders v. Dixon, 114 Mo. App. 229, 89 S. W. 577. We have preferred to consider this case, and discuss the questions presented, along common-sense lines, based upon sound reason, rather than upon the technical definitions of lexicographers, law writers of similar import, etc. We are clearly of the opinion that the structure which defendant Hess contemplated building on the lot contained in block 4864 aforesaid, if constructed as planned, would be violative of the covenants and restrictions contained in the deed under which he claims title. We are further satisfied that the principles of law announced in the Bolin and Darr Cases, in respect to foregoing matters, are not in accord with our views as to what the law ought to be under the circumstances of this case, and should not be followed. In view of the foregoing, we are of the opinion that the case should be certified to the court in banc.

7. Appellants have not sought to recover any damages by reason of the acts complained of in petition, and as the restrictions aforesaid terminated on the last day of December, 1920, we cannot issue an injunction to restrain the completion of said structure.

We therefore simply reverse and remand the cause, with directions to the trial court to set aside its former orders and judgments, and to enter a new decree finding the issues in favor of plaintiffs, and entering judgment in their behalf for nominal damages and for costs.

Per Curiam:

The foregoing opinion of Railey, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur, James T. Blair, J., in paragraphs 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and result, except Woodson, J., who dissents.

KATHRYN E. ELTERICH et al., Appts.,

v.

LEICHT REAL ESTATE COMPANY.

Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals — June 16, 1921.

(Elterich v. Leight Real Estate Co. — Va. —, 107 S. E. 785.)

Covenant — against apartment house — two-family flat.

1. A building divided into two apartments, one on the ground floor and one on the floor above, with a common entry in front and in the rear, is within a covenant in a deed of the property, forbidding the construction of an apartment house thereon.

[See note on this question beginning on page 451.]

Deed — construction — most strictly against grantor.

2. The rule that a deed must be construed most strictly against the grantor has no application where, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the meaning of the language in the deed is plain.

[See 8 R. C. L. 1051.]

Covenant — construction — object.

3. In construing a restrictive covenant in a deed, regard must be had to the object which the covenant was designed to accomplish.

— waiver — negotiation — effect.

4. An agreement between the parties must be reached to waive a covenant in a deed of real estate, forbidding the erection of an apartment house upon the premises, where the matter becomes a subject of negotiation, and is not affected where grantor insists that rooms on the second floor, designated on the plans as pantry, kitchen, and dining room, shall be used only as bedrooms, to which grantee refuses to agree.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Norfolk County (Coleman, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin defendants from erecting a certain dwelling house on a lot purchased from plaintiff, alleged to be in violation of a restriction contained in the deed.

Affirmed.

Statement by Sims, J.:

This suit was instituted by the appellee against the appellants (who will be hereinafter designated plaintiff and defendants, respectively, in accordance with their positions in the court below), having for its object the obtaining of a permanent injunction restraining the defendants from proceeding with the erection of a certain building, alleged to be in violation of certain restrictions or conditions contained in the deed from plaintiff to one of the defendants, which conveyed to the latter the lot on which the building was being erected.

A preliminary injunction was granted on the filing of the bill; subsequently depositions were taken and filed in behalf both of plaintiff and defendants, and upon consideration of the cause on the merits the court below entered the decree under review, which granted the permanent injunction sought by the bill.

The material facts, the issues, and conflicts in the evidence, are as follows:

The plaintiff is engaged in the business of developing a residential section known as Winona, located in Norfolk county, constituting one of the suburbs of Norfolk city. The plaintiff was chartered in 1909, acquired the ownership of the real estate in that section, subdivided it into lots, with streets and avenues, and undertook to build sidewalks, macadamize the streets and avenues, lay gas and water mains, provide a drainage and sewerage system, etc., and sold the lots to purchasers with certain restrictions and conditions contained in all of the deeds to purchasers. The purchasers united in the deeds. These restrictions and conditions were the same as those contained in the deed to the defendant Mrs. Kathryn E. Elterich, presently to be more specifically mentioned, except that about five years before this suit the words "apartment house" were added to the restrictions as contained in the sixth clause of the last-named deed.

By deed dated February 5, 1919, in which the defendant Mrs. Elterich united as the party of the second part, the plaintiff conveyed to such defendant the lot above mentioned, subject to certain conditions and restrictions set forth in the deed, a portion of which are as follows:

"First. The property hereby conveyed shall not, for a period of twenty-one years, be sold, rented or otherwise disposed of to persons of African descent.

"Second. No intoxicating liquor or ardent spirits shall be sold upon the property hereby conveyed.

"Third. No swine shall be kept upon the property hereby conveyed.

"Fourth. Wood posts may be used in constructing fences on and around said property, but otherwise no wood fences shall be erected or placed on or around the property hereby conveyed.

"Fifth. Not more than one house, outbuilding excepted, shall be erected or placed upon one lot designated on said plat, nor shall such house be erected or placed upon said property, except in conformity to the building line established by the said company, nor shall any house or any part thereof, except outside steps, be erected or placed within 15 feet of the front of any lot shown on said plat.

"Sixth. No flat roofed or double house, storehouse, factory building or apartment house, shall be erected or placed upon the property hereby conveyed, nor shall it be used for commercial or manufacturing purposes.

"Seventh. No residence shall be erected or placed upon the property hereby conveyed to cost less than four thousand ($4,000) dollars, and no house shall be erected or placed upon said property so as to throw the rear part thereof toward the side of any adjoining lot, and for a period of ten years from January 1, 1910, all dwelling houses erected upon said property shall be built according to plans submitted to the directors of said company and approved by them.

"Eighth. No stable shall be placed or erected upon any of the lots shown on said plat without the consent in writing of the said company as to the plans and location thereof; nor shall outbuildings be placed within 70 feet of the front of any lot shown on said plat, and no stable or outbuildings shall be erected or placed on any water-front lot shown on said plat, except a garage, the plans and location of which shall be subject to approval of said company.

"Ninth. Live stock, owned or controlled by the said purchaser, shall not be permitted to roam beyond the boundary lines of such property as may be owned or controlled by said purchaser, nor shall such live stock be fastened to any trees upon the streets or avenues shown on said plat.

"Tenth. No use shall be made of the said property or any part thereof, which may constitute a nuisance or injure the value of any of the neighboring lots, and no signboards shall be erected or placed upon said property, without the consent in writing of said company.

"Eleventh. All houses erected upon any lots shown on said plat shall, when required by the company, be connected by the owner thereof with such sewerage system as may be installed by the company, as herein provided.

"Eighteenth. The said company shall not be required to enforce said conditions, restrictions, rules and regulations except so far as it has lawful right to enforce the same.

"The above restrictions and conditions shall be inserted in all deeds of conveyance hereafter made by the said company. Except that required cost of house may be changed according to location.

"The said purchaser, in consideration of the premises, agrees and promises not to violate any of the aforesaid conditions, and it is hereby agreed that should the said purchaser violate the first of the above conditions, the said company shall, in addition to the remedies provided by law, have the right to re-enter for such breach of condition and be seised of its former estate, subject to the lien of any deed of trust created by said purchaser or ——— successors to secure a debt hereafter contracted, and in the event of the violation of any of the other of the aforesaid conditions, the said company shall, in addition to all remedies provided by law, have the right of re-entry and abatement without liability for damages."

The bill quotes the sixth and seventh clauses of the restrictions or conditions in the deed, and alleges that the defendants had commenced the erection on said lot of a dwelling house according to certain plans, of which copies were filed with the bill, and that the erection of such home on such lot would be in violation of the sixth clause of said restrictions or conditions, in that such house would be a double house or an apartment house.

The testimony both for plaintiff and defendants concurs in showing that the house which the defendants were proceeding to erect, and which they claim by answer filed in the case and by their proof that they have the right under their deed to erect, was a two-story dwelling house, in addition to the basement, with but one outside front door and one outside back door, but both of such doors opened into front and rear vestibules, respectively, from which vestibules there were separate front and separate rear entrances into two separate apartments; one apartment, on the first floor above the basement, consisting of a kitchen, dining room, living room, bathroom, water-closet, and three bedrooms, together with a hall, pantry, and certain closets; and the other apartment, on the second floor, being the exact duplicate of the first floor with respect to the same number and size of rooms, including a bathroom, water-closet, hall, pantry, and closets; so as to be suitable for the separate occupancy of the building by two families, for living, cooking, and eating therein; the front and rear entrances to the first-named apartment being on the said first floor, and such entrances to the second-named apartment being up front and rear stairways extending from the front and rear vestibules aforesaid to the said second story of the house.

The primary question in issue between the parties plaintiff and defendant is whether such a house is an apartment house within the meaning of the sixth covenant aforesaid in the deed; it not being contended for the plaintiff that the proofs shows that such a house is a double house.

At the time the deed was executed the plaintiff had sold a considerable portion of the lots in Winona, on quite a number of which dwelling houses had been erected and were occupied. During the World War and up to the time of such deed some 50 per cent of such houses were occupied by more than one family, although, with a single exception presently to be mentioned, they were not constructed so that the respective families could occupy separate apartments; but this was considered an exceptional condition, due to the scarcity of houses to accommodate the congested population in that section during that period. Even the president of the plaintiff company at that time rented to another family a portion of the residence in Winona in which he, with his family, lived during such period, and such renting was going on when defendants purchased said lot and the deed thereto was made. When such purchase and deed were made there was one, and but one, dwelling house in Winona which was constructed for separate occupancy by two families. That was what is designated in the record as the "Neff" residence, which was a two-story house constructed into two separate apartments, one on the first and the other on the second floor. All the other dwelling houses in Winona, including that of the president of the plaintiff company, were constructed for the separate occupation of only one family. Many of them, however, were large enough for the joint occupancy of more than one family.

It does not appear from the evidence at what time the deed from the plaintiff was made, conveying the lot on which the one exceptional house just mentioned was located, nor whether such deed contained the restriction against an apartment house. It does appear from the testimony of the secretary of the plaintiff company that such house was erected about four and one half or five and one half years before this suit was instituted, and that the secretary did not discover that that house had been constructed in that way until he moved to Winona, which was about a year and a half before such suit.

At the time the purchase by defendants and the deed to one of them were made, the defendants, as well as the plaintiff, were familiar with the character of construction of all of the dwelling houses which had been built in Winona.

As bearing on the questions of whether the defendants and the plaintiff contracted, in the matter of the restrictions contained in the sixth clause thereof, with the contemplation that the defendants would build a dwelling house which would be large enough for the joint occupancy of more than one family, such as the dwelling house of the president of the plaintiff company and all the other large dwelling houses which had at that time been built in Winona, except the Neff house, but not for the separate occupancy of more than one family, or with the contemplation that they would build a dwelling house with two separate apartments, such as the Neff house, the defendant C. F. Elterich testified as follows, making reference to the time and to what occurred when the purchase of the lot by defendants was closed: "The question was brought up as to what kind of a house we anticipated building, and we told them [Mr. Leicht, the president, and Mr. Sherritt, the secretary of the plaintiff company] that we anticipated building a house for ourselves and to make it a little large so in case we saw fit we could give somebody else a home that would appreciate it. . . . Mr. Leicht stated, 'If you are going to build that kind of a house, fix it so that it won't look like an apartment house.' I said, 'Mr. Leicht, I don't want it to look like an apartment house, because this is my home.' He says, 'You will have one door in front and one door in the back?' I said, 'That is my idea exactly.' I said, 'Being familiar with the requirements of the Winona property, I want to strictly adhere to them.' He said, 'Well, if you put one door in the front and one door in the back and build you a nice house, we won't have anything to say about it.'"

Mrs. Elterich testified on the same subject as follows: ". . . . Mr. Sherritt asked us what kind of a house we were going to build, . . . and I told him . . . that we were going to build a large house. He said, 'What do you mean by a large house?' I said: 'A house large enough that can be used by two families.' Mr. Leicht said: 'That is a very good idea. I am renting my house now at the present time, and making enough out of it to pay interest on $6,000, and I think it a fine idea.' Mr. Sherritt said: 'Well, you remember that you are not to have but one entrance in the front.' I said: 'We thoroughly understand that. We understand what the restrictions are in Winona, and it is just going to be a home, but we are going to have it made large enough, so if we wish to rent out part of it we can'—and they both agreed it was a very good idea."

The defendants shortly thereafter had an architect make for them the plans above mentioned, and they let the contract for the building to be erected in accordance therewith.

Both the plaintiff and defendants introduced a number of architects and builders as witnesses in their behalf, respectively. All of them, in substance, concur in the statement that a building constructed in accordance with the plans aforesaid would be a two-family apartment house, although the witnesses for the defendants balk at the word "apartment," and, for the most part, prefer to designate the house as a "two-family house."

The testimony for the plaintiff is to the effect that in the ordinary and popular understanding generally, and in Winona and also in Norfolk city, such a house as that mentioned in the last paragraph above is considered to be an "apartment house," sometimes designated a "two-family apartment house."

The testimony for the defendants is to the effect: That in the United States at large many cities have adopted the Building Code recommended by the National Board of Fire Underwriters of New York, of which Code § 9 gives the following definition of an apartment house, namely: "An apartment house shall be taken to mean and include every building which shall be intended or designed for, or used as the home or residence of three or more families or households, living independently of each other," etc. (Italics supplied.) That the Building Code of Norfolk city defines an apartment house as, "Any building or any portion thereof designed or used as a residence for more than two families or households living independently of each other and in which every such family or household shall have provided for it a separate bathroom and water-closet, separate and apart from each other." (Italics supplied). That irrespective of such Codes "there is no generally accepted, or hard and fast rule for the characterization of buildings of this character accepted everywhere by everybody." But that, "generally speaking, the common acceptance of the term, 'an apartment house,' is a house where separate residences are furnished for families," which would include a two-family apartment house.

When the contractor had just begun work on the building for defendants,—had "only dug the basement,"—the plaintiff called upon the defendants to submit the plans for the house to the directors of the plaintiff company, in accordance with the seventh clause of the restrictions and conditions contained in the deed of Mrs. Elterich. Promptly on April 22, 1919, the defendants submitted the plans to such directors. There is a conflict between the testimony for plaintiff and defendants with respect to what occurred at this meeting of the directors.

According to the testimony for the plaintiff, the following minutes of the meeting of said directors on April 22, which were formally adopted by the board on April 23, correctly set forth the substance of what occurred at said meeting on April 22:

"Minutes of Meeting of the Board of Directors of the Leicht Real Estate Company, Incorporated.

"At a meeting of the board of directors of the Leicht Real Estate Company, Incorporated, held by adjournment from a meeting of said board, held on April 22, 1919, and adjourned at 2 P. M. of said day, to be now reconvened and held on this, the 23d day of April, 1919, at the hour of 7 o'clock in the evening, at the residence of Mr. Jacob Leicht, the president of the company, at No. 1201 on Huntington place, in Winona, in Norfolk county, Virginia, with a quorum of directors present as follows:

"Jacob Leicht, Martha F. Leicht, and H. C. Sherritt.

"Mr. Jacob Leicht, president of the company, presiding as chairman, called the meeting to order, and announced the same open for the transaction of business at the above place, date, and hour:

"The plans submitted by Mrs. Kathryn E. Elterich for the building proposed to be erected by her on her lot number three (3) in block number eight (8), as shown on the plat of said company, in that place in said county, known as 'Winona,' which said lot had recently been conveyed to her by said company, were then presented and inspected (no specifications being submitted), and after consideration, upon motion duly made and unanimously carried, it was ordered and directed that said plans be approved, upon condition that there shall be no kitchen or kitchen plumbing upon or in the second floor of said building, and upon the assurance of said Mrs. Kathryn E. Elterich that said building is not being or to be constructed for use as an apartment house, and that such use is not intended: And upon the further condition that this approval is not to have force or effect until the said Kathryn E. Elterich has signed the said plans in duplicate, with a certified copy of these minutes attached thereto (to each separate plan), to indicate her acceptance of the above conditions; Duplicate copy of said plans to be retained by said company with said certified copy of minutes attached.

"There being no further business, the meeting was then declared adjourned."

The testimony for defendants of Mr. Elterich and the contractor is to the effect that the directors, at said meeting on April 22, did not require that any change whatever be made in the proposed construction of the building; that the directors said, in substance, that all they desired was that the writing on the original plans of the second floor above the basement of the words "pantry," "kitchen," and "dining room," as designating those rooms, be altered to the words "closet," "bedroom," and "bedroom," respectively, and that fair copies of the plans so altered be made and furnished to the plaintiff, so that the plaintiff could have same on file to exhibit to any persons interested, inclined to complain on the subject of the character of the house defendants were being allowed to erect; that Mr. Elterich agreed to this; that the contractor thereupon, at the time, made the alterations in verbiage aforesaid on the original draft of the plans with a pencil; that the directors thereupon said that, with the understanding that the contractor would have the fair copies of the plans as altered made and furnished to the plaintiff, the contractor could go ahead with the construction of the building; that the contractor did make such fair copies promptly, delivered them to the plaintiff, and proceeded with the erection of the building until stopped by the temporary injunction awarded on the filing of the bill, which was subsequently made permanent.

The testimony of Mr. Shelton (a witness for defendants, who was present at the meeting of April 22), in regard to the correctness of the above-copied minutes, and with respect to what occurred at such meeting, is as follows:

I would say that the minutes ought to be corrected to the following extent: I don't remember any question arising about there being no kitchen plumbing. It was understood there was to be no kitchen. The minutes are correct, in that Mrs. Elterich was to sign the plans in duplicate after they were again prepared by the contractor, but I don't recollect about the certified copy of the minutes of the meeting being attached thereto. I don't see where that makes any difference, however, I think that is more detail than otherwise. The minds of the parties met after they had discussed the situation. The agreement that Mr. Cox, the general contractor, had, was to remake two sheets, I think, or certainly one sheet, in order that the records in Mr. Sherritt's office would be consistent and correct.

Q. Was anything said at that meeting or any agreement entered into as to the manner or use of the house?

A. It was frankly stated that some other persons would use those rooms, but that the house would not be an apartment house in any sense of the word, or used as an apartment house.

Cross-examination by Judge Willcox:

Q. As a matter of fact, Colonel, you thought the parties had reached an adjustment of the matter, which was to be carried out by the change in the plans to a certain extent by the contractor, which were then to be submitted to Mr. Sherritt. Was there any formal resolution adopted on the 22d, while you were there, by the board of directors?

A. No, not to my knowledge. I understood that the directors were then in meeting, and we were talking for their benefit.

Q. But no formal action was taken by the directors while you were there?

A. No formal action was taken in my presence. It was just agreed that the only thing remaining to be done was that Mr. Cox should put these pages in the final shape that they should be, he having marked them with his pencil to comply with the changes demanded. That, I think, is the whole thing.

Promptly after the receipt by the plaintiff of the fair copies of the plans, altered as aforesaid, the plaintiff presented such copies to Mrs. Elterich for her signature in duplicate, with a copy of the minutes of the said directors' meetings attached, whereupon Mrs. Elterich refused to sign such plans. Thereupon, on the next day, the bill in this cause was filed, and the preliminary injunction was awarded as aforesaid.

Messrs. Thomas W. Shelton and Alfred Anderson, for appellants:

The house proposed to be erected is neither a double house nor an apartment house, and is not in violation of the sixth restriction of the deed, although it can be used by two families.

Sims, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions presented for our decision will be disposed of in their order as stated below:

1. Is the building proposed to be erected an "apartment house" within the meaning of the sixth clause of the restrictions and conditions contained in the deed to the defendants, the appellants, and hence in violation thereof?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

No authority precisely in point has been cited before us in argument.

No authorities whatever have been cited in argument for the defendants, except South & W. R. Co. v. Mann, 108 Va. 557, 62 S. E. 354, and 8 R. C. L. § 104, p. 1051, to sustain the following familiar rule, namely: "A deed is construed most strongly against the grantor and in favor of the grantee. This rule has been called one of the most just and sound principles of the law because . . . the grantor selects his own language. . . . If, therefore, the deed can inure in different ways, the grantee, it is said, may take it in such way as will be most to his advantage."

This rule, however, has no application where, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the meaning of the language of the deed is plain. "Quod id certum est quod certum reddi potest."

For the plaintiff are cited the note in 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 727 et seq.; Kitching v. Brown, 180 N. Y. 414, 70 L.R.A. 742, 73 N. E. 241, and some other cases which we need not here mention. These authorities refer, among other things, to the following well-understood general rules, which are not controverted in the argument before us for the defendants, namely:

As said in Kitching v. Brown, supra, 180 N. Y. at page 419:

"When a word or phrase used in a covenant has more than one meaning, judicial knowledge of existing circumstances and conditions is indispensable to a correct exposition of the law upon the subject, and to that end parol evidence is admissible" (citing cases).

"One of the familiar rules applicable to the interpretation of ambiguous covenants and agreements is to ascertain, as nearly as may be, the situation of the parties, their surroundings and circumstances, the occasion and apparent object of their stipulations, and, from all these sources, to gather the meaning and intent of their language" (citing numerous cases).

As said in the note in 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) supra, at page 727: "Regard must be had to the object which the covenant was designed to accomplish, and the language used is to be read in an ordinary or popular, and not in a legal and technical, sense" (citing numerous cases).

As said of covenants such as that in question before us, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 728: "The language used must be given its obvious meaning, and be construed in accordance with the intention of the parties, assuming that the restriction was put into the deed not simply for the benefit of the grantor, but for the benefit of every owner of property and of every resident on the street" (citing a Michigan case, Harris v. Roraback, 137 Mich. 292, 109 Am. St. Rep. 681, 100 N. W. 391).

As said (45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 728): "Particular words in such a covenant are to be given the meaning that was commonly given to them at the time the instrument containing the covenant was executed" (citing a New York case, White v. Collins Bldg. & Constr. Co. 82 App. Div. 1, 81 N. Y. Supp. 434).

And as said (45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 727): "The primary rule of interpretation of such covenants is to gather the intention of the parties from their words by reading, not simply a single clause of the agreement, but the entire context; and, where the meaning is [otherwise] doubtful, by considering such surrounding circumstances as they are presumed to have considered when their minds met" (citing a number of cases), "or in connection with the surrounding circumstances at the time the deed was executed" (citing cases).

From reading the whole context of the deed in question in the cause before us, in the light of the surrounding circumstances which appear from the statement preceding this opinion, it plainly appears that the restriction with respect to prohibition of the erection of apartment houses was in furtherance of the undertaking which the plaintiff had entered into to develop Winona as a high-class residential suburb of Norfolk city.

It is in substance admitted by the appellants that a three-family apartment house would be in violation of the sixth clause of the restrictions contained in the deed. The proof shows that the building in question would be a two-family apartment house. We are of opinion that a two-family apartment house would be, in kind, as much a violation of the object which the covenant in the deed with respect to apartment houses (the sixth clause aforesaid) was designed to accomplish as would a three-family apartment house.

Further: We think that when the sixth clause aforesaid is read in the light of the circumstances disclosed by the testimony of the defendants themselves and by the other evidence in the cause, which is set forth or referred to in the statement preceding this opinion, it is plain that the words "apartment house" were used in such clause, not with the meaning that the defendants might erect a building such as was the one exceptional building then existing in Winona, known as the "Neff" residence, which was a two-family apartment house, but with the meaning that the defendants were not to erect such a house, although they would be permitted to erect a house of the same character as that of the president of the plaintiff company, and of all the other large dwelling houses then existing in Winona; namely, a house larger than necessary for one family, which might be occupied by more than one family, but which would not be constructed with any separate apartments suitable for the use of more than one family.

One of the surrounding circumstances, shown by the preponderance of the evidence, as we view it, which perhaps should be specifically mentioned, is that in Winona, and also in Norfolk city, according to the ordinary and popular understanding at the time the deed in question was executed, such a building as that proposed to be erected by the defendants would have been considered "an apartment house."

There is evidence for the defendants to the effect that, in accordance with the Building Codes referred to in the statement preceding this opinion, a building is not defined as an apartment house unless it is constructed or used for the separate occupancy of more than two families or households. But there is no evidence in the cause tending to show that the parties, in entering into the covenant in question in the deed aforesaid, contracted with reference to either of those Codes. Indeed, by the very terms of the definition aforesaid in such Codes, if the building was used by more than two families, although not constructed for the separate use of more than one family, the building would be an apartment house. That very thing was unquestionably admissible under the covenant in question, as expressly understood by both parties thereto. This of itself shows that the parties did not contract with reference to the definition contained in such Codes. Further: An apartment house, as we understand it, within the definition of said Codes, must, according to the requirements of such Codes, have a certain construction with a view to safety, sanitation, etc. As said in Kitching v. Brown, 180 N. Y. 414, 70 L.R.A. 742, 73 N. E. 241, supra, of a definition of a "tenement house" in a statute requiring a certain construction of such houses with a view to safety, sanitation, etc.: "The definition was coined for a limited and specified purpose. . . . It is obvious, therefore, that this statutory definition, in and of itself, throws no light upon the question before us," which question was the proper interpretation of a covenant in a deed not to erect a "tenement building" on a certain lot.

2. Was the objection to the building proposed to be erected by defendants, on the ground that it would be an apartment house, waived by the plaintiff, by what occurred at the board of directors meeting on April 22d, set forth in the statement preceding this opinion?

This question must be answered in the negative.

The evidence does indeed show that the plaintiff, at the directors' meeting mentioned, agreed to waive any objection to the proposed building on account of its being constructed into two separate apartments; but, as we think is shown by the preponderance of the evidence, only upon condition that the upstairs kitchen should not be constructed for use as a kitchen, and that the defendant Mrs. Elterich would personally agree that the rooms on the second floor above the basement, designated on the original plans, "pantry," kitchen," and "dining room," respectively, would not be used as such, but only as bedrooms; that is to say (in the language of Mr. Shelton, a witness for defendants): "It was understood that there was to be no kitchen," and that "the house would not be an apartment house in any sense of the word, or used as an apartment house." (Italics supplied.)

This agreement on the part of Mrs. Elterich was to be evidenced by her signing in duplicate the altered copy of the plans designating the rooms in question as "closet" and "bedrooms," respectively, as set forth in the statement preceding this opinion. Mrs. Elterich refused to sign such plans, and refused to enter into such an agreement, and both of the defendants insisted upon their right to proceed with the construction of the building without any actual alteration of the original plan of construction, which included the construction of the upstairs kitchen in a way to make it suitable for use as a kitchen, and which, of course, included the necessary plumbing of a kitchen, etc. In view of such failure of defendants to comply with the condition aforesaid, the waiver on the part of the plaintiff, predicated thereon, never came into effect.

The precise point of difference between the plaintiff and the defendants on the subject under consideration is that defendants claim that no objection to the proposed construction of the building itself existed on the part of the plaintiff; that all the plaintiff demanded was that the plans for the second floor above the basement should not disclose on their face that rooms on that floor were to be constructed and used as a separate pantry, kitchen, and dining room, respectively, from those on the floor below; that the plaintiff was entirely willing that such actual construction and use should proceed; whereas the plaintiff claims that its objection in the premises was a substantial objection, which went to the actual construction of the upstairs kitchen as a kitchen, and to the use of the second floor as a separate apartment from that below. We are of opinion that the preponderance of the evidence sustains the claim of the plaintiff.

It may be that the defendants may have considered that, by what occurred at the April 22d meeting of the board of directors, the plaintiff had in effect waived the aforesaid sixth covenant in the deed, and had stipulated in lieu thereof for a personal agreement of Mrs. Elterich, which amounted substantially to nothing. It is not uncommon for a party to erroneously convince himself that he has secured an agreement which will operate wholly in his favor. There was room in the case before us for such a misunderstanding on the part of defendants as to the result of the April 22d directors' meeting. But we are satisfied that the evidence shows that when the deed was made the minds of the parties met on the sixth covenant, with the meaning which we have held above its words import; and, while it may be true that their minds did not meet on the subsequent agreement, which is relied on by defendants to discharge the former covenant, that fact, instead of sustaining, is sufficient of itself to defeat such claim of the defendants; the fact being that the defendants did not perform the condition aforesaid as it was stipulated by the plaintiff.

I. Introductory.

As will be seen by the cases subsequently cited, covenants restricting the class of building which may be placed on granted premises are valid, and will be enforced if their meaning is clear, but they are to be construed most strongly against the grantor, and the two elements of clarity of meaning and strictness of construction furnish sufficient grounds for difference of opinion to cause considerable diversity of decision among the courts upon similar states of fact, and to throw some uncertainty into the question just what ruling will be made on any particular form of covenant.

For the convenience of the user, the cases, with the exception of those merely declaring general principles, have been duplicated under a double classification; they being classified first with reference to the form of the covenant, and, second with reference to the kind or character of the building involved.

The owner of property may, in selling it, impose such restrictions on its use as he sees fit, provided they violate no law and are not contrary to public policy; and a restriction of the use of the buildings which may be erected will be binding on each purchaser with notice. Dick v. Goldberg (1920) — III. —, 128 N. E. 723.

But courts of equity do not aid one man to restrict another in the uses to which he may put his land, unless the right to such aid is clear. Fortesque v. Carroll (1910) 76 N. J. Eq. 583, 75 Atl. 923, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 79.

In Davison v. Taylor (1917) 196 Mich. 605, 162 N. W. 1033, in which the attempt was made to erect a four-family flat on a lot which was restricted to a building for one single residence, questions of estoppel were raised, and the court stated that the enforcement of such covenants by a court of equity was not a matter of absolute right, but was governed by the same general rules that control equitable relief by specific performance.

The primary rule of interpretation of such covenants is to gather the intention of the parties from their words, by reading not simply a single clause of the agreement, but the entire context; and, where the meaning is doubtful, by considering such surrounding circumstances as they are presumed to have considered when their minds met (Kitching v. Brown (1905) 180 N. Y. 414, 70 L.R.A. 742, 73 N. E. 241; White v. Collins Bldg. & Constr. Co. (1903) 82 App. Div. 1, 81 N. Y. Supp. 434; Sonn v. Heilberg (1899) 38 App. Div. 515, 56 N. Y. Supp. 341; Gillis v. Bailey (1850) 21 N. H. 149); or in connection with the surrounding circumstances at the time the deed was executed (Hutchinson v. Ulrich (1893) 145 Ill. 336, 21 L.R.A. 391, 34 N. E. 556; Kenwood Land Co. v. Hancock Invest. Co. (1913) 169 Mo. App. 715, 155 S. W. 861).

Such covenants must also be considered with reference to the situation of the property affected and its present and prospective use. Kenwood Land Co. v. Hancock Invest. Co. (Mo.) supra.

Attempts to give precise scope and meaning to common words of human speech are bound to fail unless resort is had to the surroundings of both the parties and subject-matter, the writer and the matter written about. Arnoff v. Chase (1920) — Ohio St. —, 128 N. E. 319.

Regard must be had to the object which the covenant was designed to accomplish; and the language used is to be read in an ordinary or popular, and not in a legal and technical, sense. Pearson v. Adams (1912) 27 Ont. L. Rep. 87, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1660, 7 D.L.R. 139; Rogers v. Hosgood [1900] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 388, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 652, 83 L. T. N. S. 186, 16 Times L. R. 489, 48 Week. Rep. 659; Re Robertson (1911) 25 Ont. L. Rep. 286, 20 Ont. Week. Rep. 712, 3 Ont. Week. N. 431.

The purposes to be achieved by the covenant should be kept in mind.

Godfrey v. Hampton (1910) 148 Mo. App. 157, 127 S. W. 626.

The court must look to the context and attending circumstances, and to the intention of the parties, and must give effect to that intention in good faith, and not seek by ingenious subtleties to evade the restrictions. Sanders v. Dixon (1905) 114 Mo. App. 229, 89 S. W. 577.

The language used must be given its obvious meaning, and be construed in accordance with the intention of the parties, assuming that the restriction was put into the deed not simply for the benefit of the grantor, but for the benefit of every owner of property and of every resident on the street. Harris v. Roraback (1904) 137 Mich. 292, 109 Am. St. Rep. 681, 100 N. W. 391.

Particular words in such a covenant are to be given the meaning that was commonly given to them at the time the instrument containing the covenant was executed. White v. Collins Bldg. & Constr. Co. (1903) 82 App. Div. 1, 81 N. Y. Supp. 434.

Restrictive covenants are not to be extended by implication. Rohrer v. Trafford Real Estate Co. (1918) 259 Pa. 297, 102 Atl. 1050.

Restrictions on the mode of enjoyment of a lot will be enforced, but are not favored, and doubts will, in general, be resolved against them. Walker v. Haslett (1920) — Cal. App. —, 186 Pac. 622.

Covenants are to be construed strongly against, rather than liberally in favor of, the grantor. Reformed Protestant Dutch Church v. Madison Ave. Bldg. Co. (1915) 214 N. Y. 263, L.R.A.1915F, 651, 108 N. E. 444; Casterton v. Plotkin (1915) 188 Mich. 333, 154 N. W. 151.

Where the right to enforce a restrictive covenant in the conveyance as to the use of the property conveyed is doubtful, all doubt should be resolved in favor of the free use thereof for lawful purposes by the owner of the fee. Hunt v. Held (1914) 90 Ohio St. 280, L.R.A.1915D, 543, 107 N. E. 765, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 1051.

If a reasonable and substantial doubt is raised by the words employed in the covenant, it must be resolved against the grantor. Bolin v. Tyrol Invest. Co. (1918) 273 Mo. 257, L.R.A. 1918C, 869, 200 S. W. 1059.

Within fairly wide limits, the question whether a particular structure is or is not within the covenant is one of fact, and not of law. Pearson v. Adams (1912) 27 Ont. L. Rep. 87, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1660, 7 D. L. R. 189.

II. Construction of particular forms of covenants.

a. Residence purposes only.

The rule seems to be that any kind of building devoted exclusively to residence purposes, whether a duplex house or an apartment house, may be erected under a covenant limiting the use of the property to residence purposes only.

Kentucky. — McMurtry v. Phillips Invest. Co. (1898) 103 Ky. 308, 40 L.R.A. 489, 45 S. W. 96; Struck v. Kohler (1920) 187 Ky. 517, 219 S. W. 435.

New York. — McDonald v. Spang (1907) 55 Misc. 332, 105 N. Y. Supp. 617.

Ohio. — Hunt v. Held (1914) 90 Ohio St. 280, L.R.A.1915D, 543, 107 N. E. 765, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 1051; Arnoff v. Williams (1916) 94 Ohio St. 145, 113 N. E. 661.

Canada.—Re Robertson (1911) 25 Ont. L. Rep. 286, 20 Ont. Week. Rep. 712, 3 Ont. Week. N. 431.

Thus, a covenant in that form does not prohibit an apartment house costing $40,000, with accommodations for a common dining room, laundry tubs, and storage rooms. McMurtry v. Phillip Invest. Co. (Ky.) supra.

In that case it was contended that the words "residence purposes" conveyed the idea of a single residence for a single family; or, at any rate, excludes the idea of a number of residences under the same roof or in the same house. The court says: "We think, however, that to give the language used this meaning would be to extend its scope beyond the expressed intention of the parties." As the house in controversy is to be used for residence purposes only, it is construed as not prohibited by the restrictive clause.

And a covenant that property shall be used for residence purposes only; the residences to be at least two stories high, does not prohibit the erection of a four-family flat building two stories high. Tillotson v. Gregory (Mich.) supra.

A restriction that the buildings shall be used for residence purposes only does not preclude the erection of an apartment house. Struck v. Kohler (Ky.) and Teagan v. Keywell (Mich.) supra.

In the latter case, the court says there is a clear distinction between a restriction that property shall be used for residence purposes only, and one where the restriction is confined to a dwelling house.

So, a restriction to residence purposes only does not prevent the erection of a fourteen-family apartment house if the building can be kept within the permitted size and style of architecture. Casterton v. Plotkin (1915) 188 Mich. 333, 154 N. W. 151.

And a covenant that the land shall be used for residence purposes only, and not for any trade or business, is not violated by the erection of a three-suite dwelling house with one entrance. Re Robertson (Ont.) supra.

A restriction to residence purposes only does not prevent the erection of a double or two-family house on the premises. Hunt v. Held (Ohio) supra. The contention was that the use of the term "only" prevented the erection of houses to accommodate more than one family. But the court says: "We are unable to see the distinction. . . . The word 'only,' in our opinion, does not change the meaning of the words 'residence purposes.' . . . The word 'residence,' as we view it, is equivalent to 'residential,' and was used in contradistinction to 'business.' If a building is used as a place of abode, and no business carried on, it would be used for residence purposes only, whether occupied by one family or a number of families."

An agreement that premises shall be used for residence purposes only, and that no more than one residence building shall be located upon a lot, does not prohibit the erection of a four-suite apartment house. Arnoff v. Williams (Ohio) supra.

And in the case of a covenant that buildings erected should be used for residence or dwelling purposes only, and not in any objectionable manner whatever, it was held that a two-family or flat house is not legally objectionable, though perhaps less desirable in a fine residence section; and that such a building is certainly not a violation of the covenant for residence or dwelling purposes only. McDonald v. Spang (1907) 55 Misc. 332, 105 N. Y. Supp. 617.

In Maine v. Mulliken (1913) 176 Mich. 443, 142 N. W. 782, the covenant restricted the use of the property to residence purposes only, and defendant placed a structure on it which he used for manufacturing purposes, and when objection was made he announced the purpose of changing it into a four-family flat, and the court held that, if used for this purpose, there would be no ground for complaint.

But in Burton v. Stapely (1904) 4 Ohio N. P. N. S. 65, 17 Ohio Dec. 1, it was held that a covenant to use premises for residence purposes only, and not for various kinds of business named, is violated by the erection of a three-story apartment house intended to accommodate from fifteen to twenty families, the court interpreting the term "residence" to mean a "private dwelling," because it was thought that those terms were used as synonyms in Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen (1900) 63 Ohio St. 183, 58 N. E. 576. It is added that there is no difference between a tenement house and an apartment house, except that one is for poor people and the other is for well-to-do people. Hence, the court concluded that if the erection of a tenement house would violate this covenant, so also would an apartment house.

The common pleas decision in Burton v. Stapely (Ohio) supra, was reversed in the circuit court (see 4 Ohio N. P. N. S. 73) upon the ground that the covenant to use the premises for residence purposes only had, as its chief purpose, the exclusion therefrom of all business of every kind; and inasmuch as the only kind of business possible in connection with the apartment house in question, the renting of apartments, was not to be done on the premises, the apartment house would not violate the covenant. And although this holding was reversed in (1906) 74 Ohio St. 461, 78 N. E. 1120, and the common pleas decision above referred to affirmed without opinion, yet, in view of the fact that the covenant expressly prohibited various kinds of business named, and in view of the very words used, the construction put upon it by the circuit court would seem to be the proper one. It is also borne out by the construction put upon similar covenants in other jurisdictions, as shown above. And the mere fact that, in the Linwood Park Co. Case, the covenant read, "for the purposes of a private dwelling or residence only," would not appear to sustain the opinion of the common pleas.

b. Dwelling house or houses.

A covenant against any building except "a dwelling house," or "one dwelling house," or "a dwelling," is generally interpreted to forbid any building except one designated for a single family; and therefore such a covenant will be broken by the erection of a double house or a block of flats.

Massachusetts.—Powers v. Radding (1916) 225 Mass. 110, 113 N. E. 782.

Michigan.—Harris v. Roraback (1904) 137 Mich. 292, 109 Am. St. Rep. 681, 100 N. W. 391; Bagnall v. Young (1908) 151 Mich. 69, 114 N. W. 674; Schadt v. Brill (1913) 173 Mich. 647, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 726, 139 N. W. 878; Kingston v. Busch (1913) 176 Mich. 566, 142 N. W. 754; Misch v.

New Hampshire. — Gillis v. Bailey (1845) 17 N. H. 18.

England. — Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. 388, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 652, 48 Week. Rep. 659, 83 L. T. N. S. 186, 16 Times L. R. 489.

A restriction that but one dwelling shall be erected upon the lot, in deeds of lots in a residence district, defines the use to which the dwelling shall be put, and not simply its form, so that a house cannot be erected under one roof to accommodate more than one family. Powers v. Radding (Mass.) supra.

Also a covenant that no more than one message or dwelling house shall be erected on one plot is broken by a block of residential flats, thirty or forty in number, eight on each floor, with a single public entrance and staircase, giving separate entrances through them to each flat. Rogers v. Hosegood (Eng.) supra.

In that case it was held that the erection not only involved a breach of a covenant that no more than one message or dwelling house should be erected or standing on a plot, and that such message should be adapted for and used as and for a private residence, but also violates a covenant that every house to be erected on the premises or any part thereof should at all times thereafter be adapted for and used as and for a private residence only.

A condition in a conveyance of lots on a tract of residence property, that no building other than a dwelling house shall be erected on a lot prohibits the construction of a double house on the lot, although it is under one roof, with a single front entrance. Schadt v. Brill (1913) 173 Mich. 647, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 726, 139 N. W. 878. The contemplated house in that case was to be divided vertically into two dwellings, with entrances from a single front hall. The court says, defendant figures on building two houses in a suite together,—a pair,—a house multiplied by two,—composed of two equivalent or corresponding parts, containing the same portion of measure as to size, strength, etc., repeated. A double house is one step from a private home dwelling towards the apartment house. If a dwelling house in the connection in which it is used does not mean a house designed and constructed for the dwelling of a single family on each lot, a treble or quadruple house on each lot, designed for three or four families, if under one roof, and with a single entrance, would be a departure from a single dwelling only in the degree of physical difference, and not in violation of any legal restriction. Either this restriction means one dwelling for a single family on each lot, or there is no restriction except one house on each lot, designed to be a dwelling for as many families or persons as the owner sees fit.

And a covenant not to occupy the premises except for one dwelling house prohibits a two-story building designed for two families, one on each floor, with separate entrances and cellars. Harris v. Roraback (1904) 137 Mich. 292, 109 Am. St. Rep. 681, 100 N. W. 391. It appeared in this case that no such building had been erected in the vicinity at the time the deed was made. The court says a building planned and designed for two or more dwellings cannot properly be described as one dwelling house.

And a covenant reciting its object to be that buildings might not be crowded together, providing that only one single dwelling house shall be erected upon each lot, is violated by a building two stories high, to accommodate six families, although constructed with doors affording communication from one tenement to another through all parts of the building; this provision for internal communication was deemed a mere subterfuge to evade the force and effect of the covenant, the court stating that the building was substantially a block of six houses. Gillis v. Bailey (1845) 17 N. H. 18.

Upon another appeal, this decision was reaffirmed, the case being reversed, however, on another point in (1850) 21 N. H. 149. In the later opinion, it was said that the restriction gave a right to erect a dwelling house intended and calculated for the convenient accommodation of only one family, and the court declared that, although the building erected in that case might have been "a house" or a "dwelling house," it was not "a single dwelling house."

In Rosenzweig v. Rose (1918) 201 Mich. 681, 167 N. W. 1008, the covenant was that the grantee would not occupy the premises except for a dwelling house, and he attempted to put upon it a twenty-four-family flat. The court said it needs no argument to demonstrate that the erection of such a building would destroy the privacy of a neighborhood and make it much less desirable as a residential district, and, if such a flagrant violation of the building restrictions were permitted, the practical result would be the cancelation of all the restrictions imposed upon the entire subdivision.

Likewise, a covenant not to erect any dwelling house of less than a certain value means that no building shall be erected except a single dwelling house, and prohibits the erection of a "duplex" or two-family residence. Kingston v. Busch (1913) 176 Mich. 566, 142 N. W. 754.

Also a covenant against anything but a two-story dwelling house means one two-story dwelling house designed and used for a single dwelling, and prohibits a two-story flat or dwelling house building designed and intended for two families. Bagnall v. Young (1908) 151 Mich. 69, 114 N. W. 674.

In like manner, a covenant that, for a certain period, no dwelling house shall be erected to contain more than two tenements, or be constructed for more than two families, is violated by the construction of a house three stories high, containing seventeen rooms, and available for three families, although it is not to be used for more than two families until after the time limited expires. Ivarson v. Mulvey (1901) 179 Mass. 141, 60 N. E. 477.

But where there had been a considerable number of two-family houses erected, and the restriction was not to erect any building other than a dwelling house and its appropriate buildings, the court declined to enjoin the erection of what was termed "a modern high-class apartment house," the apartment house being three stories high, and most of the buildings on the restricted tract being three stories high. Underwood v. Herman & Co. (1913) 82 N. J. Eq. 353, 89 Atl. 21. The court referred to the doctrine that restrictions should be strictly construed against the restrictor, and said: The grantors in their covenant made no attempt by language to define the meaning of a "dwelling house and its appropriate buildings," but allowed each grantee, in the practical adaptation of the land to his personal requirements, to construe the language of the covenant to meet the personal exigency. In this manner language of an uncertain and indefinite character received a practical interpretation upon the land by the grantees, presumably with the acquiescence of the grantors and prior grantees.

And in Hamnett v. Born (1915) 247 Pa. 418, 93 Atl. 505, it was held that a restriction that no more than one dwelling house shall be erected or maintained on each 40 feet of land is not transgressed by a duplex house designed for the occupancy of two families under one roof, so arranged as to furnish each family with a complete and independent apartment having independent and separate entrances after the common front entrance has been passed.

So, a covenant in deeds of a subdivision of city property, inserted so that buildings or structures upon the property might harmonize and tend to beautify the entire neighborhood and advance values, which provides that nothing but a church or dwelling house and the necessary outbuildings shall ever be erected upon any part of the land, is not violated by a four-story apartment house, each apartment being suitable only for separate use as a housekeeping apartment. Johnson v. Jones (1914) 244 Pa. 386, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 325, 90 Atl. 649.

And Reformed Protestant Dutch Church v. Madison Ave. Bldg. Co. (1915) 214 N. Y. 268, L.R.A.1915F, 651, 108 N. E. 444, held that limiting the use of a lot to a dwelling house does not exclude an apartment house. The court says it seems very clear that the simple term "dwelling house," used in the covenant, is broad enough to include and permit an apartment house. Where a covenant in plain and complete language limits the use of real estate to the erection of a certain and general class of buildings by reference to their fundamental purposes, the law will not still further extend the restriction by enforcing it against all but a limited variety of buildings which happened to be in use when the covenant was made.

A provision that only a single dwelling house shall be erected upon a lot does not prevent the erection of a duplex house. Rohrer v. Trafford Real Estate Co. (1918) 259 Pa. 297, 102 Atl. 1050.

In Bolin v. Tyrol Invest. Co. (1918) 273 Mo. 257, L.R.A.1918C, 869, 200 S. W. 1059, it is held that an apartment house, with its apartments, is a dwelling house within a covenant that a grantee shall not construct upon the property a dwelling house less than two stories in height, or more than one such dwelling on each 50-foot frontage. The court states that the only contention upon which the grantor rests his case is that each apartment in this house is a house within the meaning of the restriction. This implies the absurdity that one house, if it be an apartment house, is six houses, and does mortal violence to the dictionary definition of the word.

That case was followed in Morrison v. Darr (1918) — Mo. —, 201 S. W. 1147, but both cases were overruled in MORRISON v. HESS (reported herewith) ante, 433.

But a covenant against any building except "dwelling houses" is quite different, and obviously much less restrictive in its meaning.

Thus, a covenant that only dwelling houses shall be built is not violated by the erection of a four-story tenement house designed for eight families. Roth v. Jung (1908) 79 App. Div. 1, 79 N. Y. Supp. 822.

Nor does a covenant to erect only first-class dwelling houses prohibit a six-story elevator apartment house, especially where the character of the neighborhood has radically changed (Bates v. Logeling (1910) 137 App. Div. 578, 122 N. Y. Supp. 251); or a seven-story apartment house (Holt v. Fleischman (1902) 75 App. Div. 593, 78 N. Y. Supp. 647). In the latter case the chief controversy was upon another point.

And a covenant to erect a substantial two-story dwelling house of a certain minimum cost does not prohibit a three-story building of a greater cost, with stores on the first floor and flats or apartments above; the court remarking that in no event would the erection of a flat or tenement house be a violation of the covenant, even if it meant to prohibit everything but dwelling houses. Hurley v. Brown (1899) 44 App. Div. 480, 60 N. Y. Supp. 846.

c. One dwelling or a single dwelling.

It is doubtful if there is any material distinction between a restriction to one dwelling on a lot and one dwelling house on a lot. But since the covenants have been passed upon in the different forms, the cases have been separately classified to facilitate the finding of the cases upon the particular covenant involved in any case in hand.

It has been held that a covenant against the erection of more than one dwelling on each lot prohibits a three-story apartment house or flat building containing seven separate suites on each floor, each with a separate entrance (Thompson v. Langan (1913) 172 Mo. App. 64, 154 S. W. 808); or a building containing four flats, two below and two above, standing on a continuous foundation under one roof, each flat having a separate front entrance, and the whole building being bisected by a brick wall extending from the cellar floor to the roof (Sanders v. Dixon (1905) 114 Mo. App. 229, 89 S. W. 577). In the latter case, the court, in addition to the quotation made in MORRISON v. HESS (reported herewith) ante, 483, said: "Whether a building is one dwelling house or more depends on whether it was planned and constructed for plural homes, as much as on the actual use of it by several families for their homes. It may be occupied by two families and still be a single dwelling house; and likely its continuance never would be enjoined, although arranged for plural residences, if not thus used. . . . Now the edifice we are dealing with is so constructed as to be two houses, unless any building, however large, is one house if it rests on a continuous foundation and has a continuous roof. It is not a single two-story and attic building having two suites of separate apartments, one on the lower floor and one on the upper floor; but a double two-story and attic building of that sort, with a divisional wall running through it on the center line of the lot, from front to rear and from the cellar to the roof. On either side is a swelled or embayed front. The question is whether that building infringed the covenant against more than one dwelling. We concede that, in disposing of this question, we must resolve any doubt in favor of the free use of the property."

But in Jamés v. Irvine (1905) 141 Mich. 376, 104 N. W. 631, it was held that a covenant to erect only "a dwelling" does not prohibit the erection of a double house designed for two families, one on each floor, where other houses of the same character have been erected in the same subdivision without objection.

And a covenant for the erection of "only a single dwelling" means only one dwelling house, and does not prohibit a flat or apartment building four stories high. Hutchinson v. Ulrich (1893) 145 Ill. 836, 21 L.R.A. 391, 34 N. E. 556. Here other deeds by the same grantor contained covenants which used the word "one" as synonymous with "single," and there were at the time flats and apartment houses in that vicinity, so that the grantor must have been familiar with them, yet no reference was made in this covenant to a "flat" or a "private residence," and this was deemed of importance.

d. One house.

A covenant against the erection of more than one house on each lot does not prohibit a structure planned for separate occupation by two families, one on the first and one on the second floor, or "flats" with separate entrances. Such a building may constitute two dwellings, but certainly does not constitute two houses. Pank v. Eaton (1905) 115 Mo. App. 171, 89 S. W. 586.

In the above case it is said that a covenant against more than one dwelling on a lot deals with the use of the premises, and is intended mainly to prevent plural occupancy of the lot; but a covenant against more than one house on a lot is not directed against plural use or occupancy, but against plural structures.

And a block of flats, two on each floor, and two floors, is a "house" within a covenant not to erect more than a stipulated number of houses upon certain premises, where there is nothing in the context to alter or cut down the popular interpretation of that term. "House" means the whole structure,—the physical erection,—and not the interior arrangement. Kimber v. Admans [1900] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 412, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 296, 82 L. T. N. S. 136, 16 Times L. R. 207, 48 Week. Rep. 322.

But, in a more recent case, it was held that a covenant against the erection of more than one house is violated by a double tenement house, one tenement on each floor, each distinct and complete in itself, and with no internal communication, and with separate approaches from the street. Ilford Park Estates v. Jacobs [1903] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 522, 1 B. R. C. 988, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 699, 89 L. T. N. S. 295, 19 Times L. R. 574. The court says, the building constitutes two houses which are structurally separate in every respect, with separate approaches to the street, and no internal communication. It is quite different from a case where one building is erected, containing separate flats. In that case there is internal communication between the flats by means of a common staircase. In the present case, there is no internal communication whatever. It is merely a case of one house superimposed on another, from which it is divided horizontally, while in the ordinary case of semidetached houses the division is vertical.

Under a covenant that one house only shall be erected on each lot, an apartment house cannot be erected. Arnoff v. Chase (1920) — Ohio St. —, 128 N. E. 319. The court holds that the word "house" is used, both in literature and common usage, as the equivalent of the sort of a home technically known as a single-family residence.

A covenant that the improvement on a lot shall consist of only one building does not preclude the erection of an apartment house which shall cover several adjoining lots. Struck v. Kohler (1920) 187 Ky. 517, 219 S. W. 435. The court says if one residence building large enough to cover two lots was erected, it could not be said that there was more than one building on a lot.

In Brigham v. H. G. Mulock Co. (1908) 74 N. J. Eq. 287, 70 Atl. 185, it was held that a covenant forbidding more than one building to be erected upon each lot, for dwelling-house purposes, is violated by a double house under one roof. Such a structure was said to be as much two buildings for dwelling-house purposes as though separate roofs existed; the two dwellings might pass to separate owners, and the dividing wall become a party wall.

But in Fortesque v. Carroll (1910) 76 N. J. Eq. 583, 75 Atl. 923, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 79, where the covenant provided that not more than one building should be erected on each lot, it was held, without reference to the Brigham Case, that a structure which is one building so far as its exterior walls, foundation, and roof are concerned, is not so clearly a violation of the covenant as to be enjoined, simply because it is so arranged internally and so provided with entrances as to serve for two residences.

The term "one building" should not be construed so as to mean "one building to be occupied as one residence;" the terms "building" and "residence" refer to different things, rest upon different considerations, and set up two totally distinct criteria by which to determine whether there has been a violation of the covenant. The word "building" normally connotes matters of construction; whereas the word "residence" directs attention solely to the use or mode of occupancy to which a building may be put. Ibid.

f. Detached dwelling house.

In Re Robertson (1911) 25 Ont. L. Rep. 286, 20 Ont. Week. Rep. 712, 8 Ont. Week. N. 431, it was held that a covenant that every residence erected upon the land should be a detached house is not violated by the erection of a three-suite dwelling house with one common entrance. This covenant deals only with the character of the physical structure, and not with the internal arrangement or purpose for which it is used.

But in Pearson v. Adams (1914) 50 Can. S. C. 204, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 416, it was held that an apartment house to accommodate six families is not, although it is under one roof, and constructed to have the external appearance of one house, permitted by a covenant that the lot shall be used only as a site for a detached brick or stone dwelling house, to cost at least $2,000. Anglin, J., said in his opinion it would be a most extraordinary description of a modern apartment house, such as defendant proposes to erect, to call it a detached dwelling house,—a description that nobody would ever dream of using colloquially. The court thereby reversed (1913) 28 Ont. L. Rep. 154, where it appeared that the restriction was for a use for an isolated dwelling house, and the court said: That the apartment house is a dwelling house no one can reasonably deny, and that it will be isolated is obvious. The number of persons living in it cannot, nor can the manner in which they live in it, change the obvious facts. "To call one isolated house within four walls under one roof, and with outer doors for one house only, several houses, merely because several persons may occupy different parts of that one isolated house, would, I cannot but think, amuse rather than convince the minds of ordinary people." And the court thereby reversed (1912) 27 Ont. L. Rep. 87, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1660, 7 D.L.R. 139, where the court held that the building in question could not be called a detached dwelling house.

And a covenant that no building shall be constructed or maintained other than for a single family or as a double or semidetached house prohibits the alteration of a one-family house already upon the premises into a three-story tenement house or "three decker," regardless of the extent to which the old building may enter into its construction. Allen v. Barrett (1912) 218 Mass. 86, 99 N. E. 575, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 820.

Restricting the use of a lot to the erection of detached dwelling houses on lots 50 feet or more permits the erection of semidetached two-family dwellings. Liebman v. Hall (1920) 110 Misc. 365, 180 N. Y. Supp. 514.

An apartment house with a vertical division wall extending the whole height of the building, dividing it into two equal parts, each part containing seven or eight apartments, with no opening through the division wall, and each half having an independent entrance, is a "pair of semidetached buildings," within a covenant that every pair of semidetached buildings erected upon the premises should have appurtenant thereto lands having a stipulated frontage upon a certain avenue, and accordingly such an apartment house must have the stipulated frontage. Holden v. Ryan (1912) 22 Ont. Week. Rep. 767, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1585, 4 D. L. R. 151.

But in Harmon v. Burrow (1919) 263 Pa. 188, 106 Atl. 310, it was held that the erection of a duplex dwelling house does not violate a restriction which limits the grantee to the erection of a single building; "namely, a detached dwelling house."

g. Family residence.

A covenant not to erect any building less than three stories in height, the same to be in every way adapted for use as a family residence, and not to erect any one of a long list of objectionable manufacturing plants, does not prohibit the erection of a six-story apartment house. The evident object of such a covenant is to restrict to residence purposes. And a structure does not cease to be a family residence simply because more than one family reside therein. Sonn v. Heilberg (1899) 38 App. Div. 515, 56 N. Y. Supp. 341.

But a covenant that no building shall be constructed or maintained other than for a single family prohibits the alteration of a one-family house already upon the premises into a three-story tenement house or "three decker." Allen v. Barrett, 213 Mass. 86, 99 N. E. 575, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 820, supra.

h. Private residence or dwelling.

A private residence is held to mean a residence for one family only, and accordingly a covenant providing for a private residence only forbids a flat house.

Thus, a covenant against everything except a private residence is broken by the erection of a block of residential flats (Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 388, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 652, 83 L. T. N. S. 186, 16 Times L. R. 489, 48 Week. Rep. 659); and prohibits a two-family house arranged for one family on each floor (Koch v. Gorruffio (1910) 77 N. J. Eq. 172, 140 Am. St. Rep. 552, 75 Atl. 767).

A restriction to a first-class private residence prohibits a double or duplex house designed for two families, living separate, and it is immaterial whether the building is divided horizontally or vertically. Walker v. Haslett (1920) — Cal. App. —, 186 Pac. 622. The court says such a structure is as much two buildings for residence purposes as though separate roofs existed; and, if sanctioned, would enable the owner of the lot to violate indirectly the covenant in the deed that any residence erected on the lot shall cost and be fairly worth $5,000. The court further says the building is not a private residence or private dwelling. A house designed for the accommodation of more than one family cannot be deemed to be a private residence or a private dwelling.

Also a covenant against any building other than one for the use or purpose of a private dwelling prohibits a three-story frame flat house with five rooms on each floor, suitable for three families. Skillman v. Smatheurst (1898) 57 N. J. Eq. 1, 40 Atl. 855.

Likewise, a covenant to use premises for the purposes of a private dwelling or residence only is violated by using a structure thereon as a lodging house or tenement house. Linwood Park Co. v. VanDusen (1900) 68 Ohio St. 183, 58 N. E. 576.

In Levy v. Schreyer (1904) 177 N. Y. 293, 69 N. E. 598, there was a covenant against a tenement house or any house except private dwellings; a building of three stories was erected, each floor arranged to accommodate a separate family. Since the evident purpose of the grantor, as gathered from all the covenants, was to restrict the use of the land to attractive dwellings of a certain minimum cost, it was held that this building answered the requirements of the covenants so far as outside appearances and cost were concerned, and violated the covenants only in so far as the interior arrangement was concerned; and its use as a tenement house or for any other purposes than a private residence was enjoined, but an order for the destruction of the building was refused.

This decision modified the one in (1902) 71 App. Div. 616, 76 N. Y. Supp. 1018. On a former appeal (1898) 27 App. Div. 282, 50 N. Y. Supp. 584, this building had been held (two judges out of five dissenting) to violate the covenant on the theory that the covenant was one against construction, and not against use, and that therefore the manner in which the owner proposed to occupy it was of no importance.

And in a still earlier decision in this case (1897) 19 Misc. 227, 43 N. Y. Supp. 199, it had been held that since this building was to be occupied by the defendant, his children and grandchildren, grouped in two families, it was not a "tenement house;" and since it was not open to the public, nor affected with any public use, it was no other than a "private dwelling."

If a flat is conceded to be a number of private dwellings, built one upon another, it violates a covenant for "a private dwelling," which contemplates a single private dwelling, not a bunch of private dwellings. Smatheurst v. Smatheurst (N. J.) supra.

A flat of three stories for three families is not a "private" dwelling, but is really a multiple house, designed for the accommodation of more than an individual and his household; if such a structure should be conceded to be a private dwelling, so must a flat twenty stories high, with forty or eighty apartments; but such a multiplication obviously destroys individuality, and creates community; it illustrates the distinction between privacy and publicity. Ibid.

A covenant for the erection of not more than one residence on a lot deals with the number of buildings to be constructed, and is intended to prevent plural structures. Kenwood Land Co. v. Hancock Invest. Co. (1913) 169 Mo. App. 715, 155 S. W. 861.

A two-family house is not a private residence, but a collection of apartments; and if two families are not prohibited by a covenant against anything but a private residence, where shall we stop? A family might be put in each room, and still the claim be made that the building was occupied as a private residence. Koch v. Gorrufo (1910) 77 N. J. Eq. 172, 140 Am. St. Rep. 552, 75 Atl. 767.

A covenant that there shall not be erected on said land any building other than a private dwelling house, that such dwelling house shall not be occupied by more than one family, is violated by the construction of a so-called duplex dwelling house. Baker

v. Lunde (1921) 96 Conn. 530, 114 Atl. 673.

1. Tenement house.

The rule is clearly settled that a covenant against the erection of a tenement house, made at a time when the only structures of that character were inferior buildings, rented to several families who were in lowly circumstances, does not prohibit the erection of a modern apartment house. This is not at all what must have been meant by the term "tenement house."

Thus, a covenant not to erect any one of several manufacturing establishments named, or tenement house, or any other trade, manufactory, business, or calling which may be dangerous, noxious, or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants, does not prohibit the erection of a modern apartment house, six or seven stories high, each apartment renting at a high rate, completely and elegantly equipped with every modern improvement, and designed to promote convenience, comfort, and sanitation. Kitching v. Brown (1905) 180 N. Y. 414, 70 L.R.A. 742, 73 N. E. 241, affirming on this point (1904) 92 App. Div. 160, 87 N. Y. Supp. 75; White v. Collins Bldg. & Constr. Co. (1903) 82 App. Div. 1, 81 N. Y. Supp. 434; Marx v. Brogan (1906) 111 App. Div. 480, 98 N. Y. Supp. 88, reversed for lack of jurisdiction in (1907) 188 N. Y. 431, 81 N. E. 231, 11 Ann. Cas. 145.

Nor is such a covenant violated by the erection of an apartment house or "French flats." Musgrave v. Sherwood (1878) 54 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 338, reversing (1877) 53 How. Pr. 311, and being practically affirmed in (1881) 23 Hun, 669, although reversed on another point.

In (1877) 53 How. Pr. 311, it was deemed that the object of the covenant against a tenement house was to free the premises from the confusion and disquiet which must surround any building which is the abode of several distinct families; and, while the annoyance and discomfort arising from the apartment house here contemplated might be less than if it were to be the abode of the poorer classes, yet the court was of the opinion that the difference would be in degree, and not in kind.

At least, a five-story flat or apartment house is not so clearly a violation of such a covenant as to warrant a preliminary injunction against its erection. Boyd v. Kerwin (1891) 15 N. Y. Supp. 721.

And a covenant against any slaughterhouse, coal yard, or cowpen, tenement house, tallow chandlery, etc., upon certain premises, is no obstacle to the building of a high-class apartment house, so as to furnish good grounds for objecting to the title on the part of a prospective purchaser who intends to erect such an apartment house thereon. Ranger v. Lee (1910) 66 Misc. 144, 121 N. Y. Supp. 328.

The fact that in such a covenant the term "tenement house" is in juxtaposition with uses which produce disagreeable odors or noises, or which attract to the neighborhood large crowds or undesirable persons, goes to show an intention to prohibit such a tenement house as was then known in that locality; that is, cheap, and rented to people of very limited means, and one which therefore might be "dangerous, noxious, or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants." The modern apartment house is a building entirely distinct from that sort of tenement house, is not now, and never has been, known by that name, and does not tend to produce any of the evils that it was clearly the intention of the parties to guard against. White v. Collins Bldg. & Constr. Co. (1903) 82 App. Div. 1, 81 N. Y. Supp. 434; Boyd v. Kerwin (N. Y.) supra.

The fact that a covenant forbidding the erection of a tenement house includes also a great many trades, industries, and callings that are dangerous, offensive, or noxious to the neighboring inhabitants, may afford a definition of the term "tenement house" much more exact and practical than any legislative or lexicographic definition; when classed with such a list of recognized nuisances, the term "tenement house," as used in such a covenant, must be taken to mean the abode of squalor, filth, disease, disorder, and crime; especially when it appears that the only tenement house known in that locality at the time the covenant was entered into was of that kind; and therefore such a covenant cannot be construed to forbid the erection of an apartment house, which was then unknown, and which differs as much in every essential of a human abode from the then known tenement house, as the palace of a king differs from the hut of a peasant. Kitching v. Brown (1905) 180 N. Y. 414, 70 L.R.A. 742, 73 N. E. 241.

In the last-named case, however, there was an emphatic dissent by three of the seven judges, upon the ground that, neither in any changed conditions of the neighborhood, nor in any legal distinction between the terms "tenement house" and "apartment house" was there any justification for denying equitable relief against the erection of the apartment house. And the very pertinent question is asked: If the legal meaning of "community house" is not to be given to the term "tenement house," where shall the line of distinction be drawn between the two kinds of tenement houses?

Of course, a tenement house with stores on the first floor, and each of the four other floors arranged for the accommodation of four families, violates a covenant not to erect a tenement house; but if any such tenement houses have already been erected in the neighborhood, a permanent injunction may not be granted, but the objector may be left to an action for damages. Amerman v. Deane (1892) 132 N. Y. 355, 28 Am. St. Rep. 584, 30 N. E. 741.

In one case it appeared that a covenant originally forbidding "any tenement house" was later modified by adding "not meaning, however, what is known as a flat or apartment house, provided that it be equal in class to" certain ones named. It was said that the covenant in its original form was one against use, and not against construction; but, as modified, it became one against construction, and not against use; so that the question then was as to whether the building contemplated was equal or inferior in class to the ones named as the standard of construction. Longworth v. Deane (1897) 15 App. Div. 461, 44 N. Y. Supp. 423.

j. Flat, apartment, or tenement house.

ELTERICH v. LEICHT REAL ESTATE Co. (reported herewith) ante, 441, holds that a covenant against an apartment house will include a two-family flat.

• A covenant against the erection of any building of the character known as flats or tenement houses prohibits the alteration of a two-story house so as to adapt it to the occupancy of two families, one on each floor, with a single entrance,—what is known as a Queen Anne. Godfrey v. Hampton (1910) 148 Mo. App. 157, 127 S. W. 626.

The court holds that a covenant against a flat or tenement house is intended to prevent plural occupancy; that is, to prevent houses from being occupied by more than one family, each living by itself. The word "flat" has no technical legal meaning, and where the testimony as to its application to a particular structure is contradictory, the question is one of fact.

And a covenant not to erect any building that shall be used or occupied as a flat or tenement house prohibits the erection of a two-story and attic house, with one front entrance leading to separate hallways, arranged for two families, and with a complete housekeeping suite upon each floor. Lignot v. Jaekle (1906) 72 N. J. Eq. 233, 65 Atl. 221.

The court holds that a "flat" etymologically is a floor in a building. Later the use of the word became restricted to a floor completely equipped for housekeeping purposes. A building containing such floors, so equipped, each of which is called a "flat," is sometimes itself termed a "flat," but, more properly speaking, should be called a "flat house." Any building consisting of more than one story, in which building there are one or more suites of rooms on each floor, equipped for separate housekeeping purposes, is a "flat" or "flat house." "Tenement house," as here used, means a community house occupied by persons of small means, the distinguishing characteristics of which are the use in common of certain facilities by people crowded into insufficient space, and deprived of many of the essentials of privacy, decency, and health. The fact that a "flat house," as it became more costly, came to be known as an "apartment house," cannot vary or alter the rights of the parties; and the only distinction suggested between an "apartment" and a "flat" is the amount of rent. But even if the distinction is a real one, it cannot be held that a charge of $35 or $40 a month rent turns what is otherwise a "flat" into an "apartment."

Also a covenant to occupy and use the premises for residence purposes only, expressly excluding use for flats and apartment houses, prohibits a "duplex house,"—a double house, two stories high, designed to accommodate one family on each floor. Kenwood Land Co. v. Hancock Invest. Co. (1913) 169 Mo. App. 715, 155 S. W. 861. The court holds that a covenant to use premises for residence purposes only, and forbidding flats and apartment houses, prohibits not only a building designed for an apartment house, or constructed with flats therein, but it also prohibits the use and occupancy of a house in such a way as to turn it into flats or make it an apartment house. Such a covenant is intended to prevent plural occupancy.

Likewise, a covenant against the erection of any buildings except dwelling houses, and against any tenement, apartment, or community house, is violated by the erection of a six-story modern apartment house, containing forty-two independent and separate suites of rooms, the covenant having been entered into at a time when such apartment houses were not unknown; but the form of the remedy against the violation may be affected by the fact that many such buildings have been erected in the neighborhood. McClure v. Leaycraft (1905) 183 N. Y. 36, 75 N. E. 961, 5 Ann. Cas. 45, reversing (1904) 97 App. Div. 518, 90 N. Y. Supp. 233.

In Miller v. Klein (1913) 177 Mo. App. 557, 160 S. W. 562, the covenant was expressly against flats and apartment houses, and the only question was whether there had been a waiver. The court held against such contention and enforced the covenant.

k. Miscellaneous.

A covenant that the land shall not be used for any purpose which might be deemed a nuisance is not violated by the erection of a three-suite dwelling house. Re Robertson (1911) 25 Ont. L. Rep. 286, 20 Ont. Week. Rep. 712, 3 Ont. Week. N. 431.

In the dissenting opinion by Britton, J., in Pearson v. Adams (1912) 27 Ont. L. Rep. 87, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1660, 7 D. L. R. 139, it was stated that in Campbell v. Bainbridge [1911] 2 Scot. L. T. 373, the prohibition was of "houses or buildings of any kind other than villas or dwelling houses with offices," and that it was held that the building of tenements was not prohibited. The lord president is quoted as saying that a tenement of dwelling houses is just a dwelling house, and that in ordinary parlance a set of flats could be called a dwelling house.

A structure available for three families violates a restriction that no dwelling house erected on the premises shall contain more than two tenements, or be constructed for more than two families, although the owner does not intend to use it for more than two. Ivarson v. Mulvey (1901) 179 Mass. 141, 60 N. E. 477.

III. Application of covenants to particular kinds of buildings.

a. In general.

Under the heading, "Construction of particular forms of covenants," the problem here presented has been discussed from the standpoint of the various forms of covenants with which the cases deal, the question there being: What buildings are permitted, and what buildings are prohibited, by this particular form of covenant? The purpose of this division of the note is briefly to restate the result of the inquiry from the standpoint of the various kinds of buildings alleged to be in violation of the covenants, the question here being: What covenants are violated, and what covenants are not violated, by this particular kind of building?

b. Double house.

1. Divided horizontally.

Houses designed for the accommodation of two families, and no more, are here classified under the head "Double houses," no matter whether the courts or the parties called them double houses, flats, apartment houses, or tenements.

It has been held that a two-story house designed for the accommodation of two families, one on each floor, each distinct and complete in itself, and with separate approaches from the street, violates a covenant against the erection of more than one house (Ilford Park Estates v. Jacobs [1903] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 522, 1 B. R. C. 988, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 699, 89 L. T. N. S. 295, 19 Times L. R. 574); or a covenant not to occupy the premises except for one dwelling house (Harris v. Roraback (1904) 137 Mich. 292, 109 Am. St. Rep. 681, 100 N. W. 391); or a covenant against anything but a two-story dwelling house, this being interpreted to mean a dwelling house designed for a single family (Bagnall v. Young (1908) 151 Mich. 69, 114 N. W. 674); or a covenant against anything but a private residence (Koch v. Gorruffo (1910) 77 N. J. Eq. 172, 140 Am. St. Rep. 552, 75 Atl. 767); or a covenant against flats or tenement houses (Godfrey v. Hampton (1910) 148 Mo. App. 157, 127 S. W. 626; Lignot v. Jaekle (1906) 72 N. J. Eq. 233, 65 Atl. 221); or a covenant against flats and apartment houses (Kenwood Land Co. v. Hancock Invest. Co. (1913) 169 Mo. App. 715, 155 S. W. 861).

A two-family apartment divided horizontally is within a covenant against the construction of an apartment house. ELTERICH v. LEICHT REAL ESTATE CO. (reported herewith) ante, 441.

But such a building does not violate a covenant that the buildings erected shall be used for residence or dwelling purposes only, and not in any objectionable manner whatever (McDonald v. Spang (1907) 55 Misc. 332, 105 N. Y. Supp. 617); or a covenant to erect only a dwelling (James v. Irvine (1905) 141 Mich. 376, 104 N. W. 631); or a covenant against more than one house on each lot (Pank v. Eaton (1905) 115 Mo. App. 171, 89 S. W. 586).

2. Divided vertically.

A double house divided vertically into two parts, each one designed for a separate family, violates a covenant against any building other than a dwelling house (Schadt v. Brill (1913) 173 Mich. 647, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, 139 N. W. 878); or a covenant forbidding more than one building upon each lot (Brigham v. H. G. Mulock Co. (1908) 74 N. J. Eq. 287, 70 Atl. 185).

3. Generally.

In the following cases, the statement of facts does not reveal whether the building in question was divided horizontally or vertically:

A "duplex" or two-family residence violates a covenant not to erect any "dwelling house" (Kingston v. Busch (1913) 176 Mich. 566, 142 N. W. 754); but in Hamnett v. Born (1915) 247 Pa. 418, 93 Atl. 505, it was held that a duplex house designed for the occupancy of two families under one roof, so arranged as to furnish each family with a complete and independent apartment, having independent and separate entrances after the common front entrance has been passed, does not transgress a restriction that no more than one dwelling house shall be erected or maintained on each 40 feet of land; and in Fortesque v. Carroll, (1910) 76 N. J. Eq. 583, 75 Atl. 923, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 79, it was held that a duplex does not violate a covenant that not more than one "building" shall be erected on each lot.

Duplex houses, whether divided vertically or horizontally, violate a covenant restricting the use of the lot to a first-class private residence. Walker v. Haslett (1920) — Cal. App. —, 186 Pac. 622.

In Hunt v. Held (1914) 90 Ohio St. 280, L.R.A.1915D, 543, 107 N. E. 765, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 1051, it does not definitely appear whether the two-family house was divided horizontally or vertically; but the implication seems to be that it was vertically; and it was held that such building did not violate a covenant requiring use of the property for residence purposes only.

A duplex house does not violate a restriction to a single detached dwelling house. Harmon v. Burow (1919) 263 Pa. 188, 106 Atl. 310.

Nor does it violate a covenant limiting the use of property to a single dwelling house. Rohrer v. Trafford Real Estate Co. (1918) 259 Pa. 297, 102 Atl. 1050.

c. Flat house.

For the purposes of this classification, only those "flat houses" that were designed for the accommodation of more than two families are included in this subdivision; those designed for two families only, though termed "flats," are here classified as "double houses."

A flat house designed for the accommodation of more than two families violates a covenant against more than one dwelling on each lot (Sanders v. Dixon (1905) 114 Mo. App. 229, 89 S. W. 577); or a covenant that only one single dwelling house shall be erected upon each lot (Gillis v. Bailey (1845) 17 N. H. 18; Harris v. Roraback (1904) 137 Mich. 292, 109 Am. St. Rep. 681, 100 N. W. 391); or a covenant that no more than one message or dwelling house shall be erected, and that such message shall be adapted for a private residence only (Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 388, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 652, 83 L. T. N. S. 186, 16 Times L. R. 489, 48 Week. Rep. 659); or a covenant against any building other than for the use of a private dwelling (Skillman v. Smatheurst (1898) 57 N. J. Eq. 1, 40 Atl. 855); and, of course, such a building violates a covenant that no dwelling house shall be erected to contain more than two tenements or be constructed for more than two families (Ivarson v. Mulvey (1901) 179 Mass. 141, 60 N. E. 477).

And a block of flats is a "house" within the meaning of a covenant not to erect more than a stipulated number of "houses." Kimber v. Admans [1900] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 412, 69 L. J. Ch.

N. S. 296, 82 L. T. N. S. 136, 16 Times L. R. 207, 48 Week. Rep. 322.

But a flat house does not violate a covenant that the property shall be used for residence purposes only (Tillotson v. Gregory (1908) 151 Mich. 128, 114 N. W. 1025); even when arranged for four families (Maine v. Mulliken (1913) 176 Mich. 443, 142 N. W. 782), or for fourteen families (Casterton v. Plotkin (1915) 188 Mich. 333, 154 N. W. 151); or a covenant for the erection of "only a single dwelling," this phrase being taken to mean only one dwelling house, and there being at the time other flats and apartment houses in the vicinity (Hutchinson v. Ulrich (1893) 145 Ill. 336, 21 L.R.A. 391, 34 N. E. 556).

And a covenant to erect a substantial two-story dwelling house of a certain minimum cost does not prohibit a three-story building of a greater cost, with stores on the first floor and flats above. Hurley v. Brown (1899) 44 App. Div. 480, 60 N. Y. Supp. 846.

d. Apartment house.

A modern high-grade apartment house does not violate a covenant to use the premises for residence purposes only (McMurtry v. Phillips Invest. Co. (1898) 103 Ky. 308, 40 L.R.A. 489, 45 S. W. 96; Teagan v. Keywell (1920) — Mich. —, 180 N. W. 454; Struck v. Kohler (1920) 187 Ky. 517, 219 S. W. 435); or a covenant to erect only first-class dwelling houses (Bates v. Logeling (1910) 137 App. Div. 578, 122 N. Y. Supp. 251; Holt v. Fleischman (1902) 75 App. Div. 593, 78 N. Y. Supp. 647); or a covenant limiting the use of the lot to a dwelling house (Reformed Protestant Dutch Church v. Madison Ave. Bldg. Co. (1915) 214 N. Y. 268, L.R.A.1915F, 651, 108 N. E. 444); or a covenant that every residence erected shall be a detached house, that the land shall be used for residence purposes only, and not for any purpose which might be deemed a nuisance (Re Robertson (1902) 25 Ont. L. Rep. 286, 20 Ont. Week. Rep. 712, 3 Ont. Week. N. 431); or a covenant not to erect any building except for use as a family residence (Sonn v. Heilberg (1899) 38 App. Div. 515, 56

N. Y. Supp. 341); or a covenant not to erect any one of several manufacturing establishments named, or any tenement house, or any other trade, manufactory, business, or calling which may be dangerous, noxious, or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants (Kitching v. Brown (1905) 180 N. Y. 414, 70 L.R.A. 742, 73 N. E. 241, affirming on this point (1904) 92 App. Div. 160, 87 N. Y. Supp. 75; White v. Collins Bldg. & Constr. Co. (1903) 82 App. Div. 1, 81 N. Y. Supp. 434; Marx v. Brogan (1906) 111 App. Div. 480, 98 N. Y. Supp. 88, reversed for lack of jurisdiction in (1907) 188 N. Y. 431, 81 N. E. 231, 11 Ann. Cas. 145; Musgrave v. Sherwood (1878) 54 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 338, reversing (1877) 53 How. Pr. 311, and being practically affirmed in (1881) 23 Hun, 669, although reversed on another point; Boyd v. Kerwin (1891) 15 N. Y. Supp. 721); or a covenant against a tenement house (Ranger v. Lee (1910) 66 Misc. 144, 121 N. Y. Supp. 328).

A four-story apartment house, each apartment being suitable only for separate use as a housekeeping apartment, is not a violation of a covenant in deeds of a subdivision of city property, inserted so that buildings or structures upon the property might harmonize and tend to beautify the entire neighborhood and advance values, which provides that nothing but a church or dwelling house and the necessary outbuildings shall ever be erected upon any part of the land. Johnson v. Jones (1914) 244 Pa. 386, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 325, 90 Atl. 649.

But an apartment house violates a covenant against the erection of more than one dwelling on each lot (Thompson v. Langan (1913) 172 Mo. App. 64, 154 S. W. 808); or which restricts the use of the property to one house only (Arnoff v. Chase (1920) 101 Ohio St. 331, 128 N. E. 319); and a covenant that the lands are to be used only as a site for detached dwelling houses (Pearson v. Adams (1912) 27 Ont. L. Rep. 87, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1660, 7 D. L. R. 139); and, of course, it violates a covenant against the erection of any buildings except dwelling houses, or any tenement, apartment, or community house (McClure v.

Leaycraft (1905) 183 N. Y. 36, 75 N. E. 961, 5 Ann. Cas. 45, reversing (1904) 97 App. Div. 518, 90 N. Y. Supp. 233).

And in Burton v. Stapely (1904) 4 Ohio N. P. N. S. 65, 17 Ohio Dec. 1, it was held that such an apartment house violates a covenant to use the premises for residence purposes only, and this was affirmed without opinion in (1906) 74 Ohio St. 461, 78 N. E. 1120. But the circuit court, which was reversed by the supreme court, was of the opposite opinion. See II. a, and see McMurtry v. Phillips Invest. Co. (Ky.) supra.

Also, an apartment house with a vertical division wall extending the whole height of the building, dividing it into two equal parts, each part containing seven or eight apartments, is a "pair of semidetached buildings," within the meaning of a covenant that every pair of semidetached buildings erected upon the premises shall have appurtenant thereto lands having a stipulated frontage upon a certain avenue. Holden v. Ryan (1912) 22 Ont. Week. Rep. 767, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1585, 4 D. L. R. 151.

e. Tenement house.

Buildings designed for the accommodation of only two families, even though designated as tenement houses by the courts, are here treated under the head "Double house," supra.

A tenement house violates a covenant that no building shall be constructed or maintained other than for a single family, or as a double or semidetached house (Allen v. Barrett (1912) 213 Mass. 36, 99 N. E. 575, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 820); and a covenant to use the premises for the purposes of a private dwelling or residence only (Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen (1900) 63 Ohio St. 183, 58 N. E. 576); and, of course, it violates a covenant not to erect a tenement house (Amerman v. Deane (1892) 132 N. Y. 355, 28 Am. St. Rep. 584, 30 N. E. 741).

But a tenement house does not violate a covenant that only dwelling houses shall be built. Roth v. Jung (1903) 79 App. Div. 1, 79 N. Y. Supp. 822.

In Levy v. Schreyer (1904) 177 N. Y. 293, 69 N. E. 589, the covenant provided that no tenement house should be built or any house except private dwellings, and a building of three stories was erected, each floor being arranged to accommodate a separate family. It was held that this building met the requirements of the covenant so far as outward appearances and cost were concerned, and violated the covenant only with respect to the interior arrangement, and an injunction was granted against any use of the building except for private residences, but the destruction of the building itself was not ordered.

f. Detached dwelling house.

A semidetached dwelling is forbidden by a restriction to detached dwelling houses on lots of 50 feet or more. Liebman v. Hall (1920) 110 Misc. 365, 180 N. Y. Supp. 514. H. P. F.

HOMER G. MULLHOLLAND et al., Appts.,
v.
VERNON PATCH.

Michigan Supreme Court—April 3, 1919.

(205 Mich. 490, 171 N. W. 422.)

Partnership — to deal in real estate options — necessity of writing.

1. An agreement to secure options on real estate and afterwards sell them and divide the profits is not required to be in writing under the Statute of Frauds.

[See note on this question beginning on page 484.]

—sufficiency of evidence to establish.

2. No partnership is shown by an agreement to get options on farms and sell them, and divide the proceeds, where no partnership name is adopted, no funds are contributed, and there is no agreement as to losses, and no provision made as to the term of continuance of the undertaking.

[See 20 R. C. L. 823 et seq.]

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Oakland County, in Chancery (Rockwell, J.), in favor of defendant in a suit to obtain a copartnership accounting. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles S. Matthews for appellants.

Messrs. Perry & Lynch for appellee.

Bird, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill was filed to obtain a copartnership accounting. Plaintiffs charge that they had an oral partnership agreement with defendant "to go out and get options on farms and sell them." Defendant denies that any copartnership agreements existed between them. The conflicting claims of the parties were heard by the chancellor, and he reached the conclusion that, if there were a copartnership agreement, it was an oral copartnership agreement to deal in real estate, and therefore void under the holding of this court in Nester v. Sullivan, 147 Mich. 493, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1106, 111 N. W. 85, 1033. The oral copartnership agreement involved in that case was held to be void under the Statute of Frauds, because the agreement not only contemplated, but actually involved, the holding of title to real estate. In this respect it differs from the present controversy. The agreement in the present case involved nothing more than the taking of options on real estate and afterwards selling the options, and, as a matter of fact, that was all that was done under the agreement in the one transaction out of which this controversy arose. If that were all that was contemplated by the claimed agreement, it was not void under §§ 11,977 and 11,981, 3 Compiled Laws of 1915. Carr v. Leavitt; 54 Mich. 540, 20 N. W. 576; Britton v. Smith, 165 Mich. 222, 130 N. W. 599; McGavock v. Ducharme, 192 Mich. 98, 158 N. W. 173.

Partnership—to deal in real estate options—necessity of writing.

In the first case cited, in considering a similar agreement, it is said: "This surely was not a contract 'for the sale of any lands, or any interest in lands,' within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds. How. Stat. § 6181. That statute contemplates a transaction between parties contracting with each other as principals, and this was not such a transaction."

While we do not think the case should have been disposed of on the ground stated, we are impressed that the decree should be affirmed on the ground that the testimony does not make out a copartnership agreement. The substance of the talks out of which it is claimed the agreement arose is that: "We were to go out and get options on farms and sell them. . . . We were to get options, work together to sell the farms, and divide the profits equally."

It is not claimed that the copartnership was given a name, or that it had any funds with which to purchase the options, or that there was any arrangement between the parties that any one of them should advance funds for that purpose.

There appeared to be no agreement with reference to the losses, if any were incurred. Nothing appears as to the term for which it should continue. It had no place of business and no books were kept, and the only option taken was not taken in the name of a partnership, but was taken in the name of defendant and paid for by him. Very few of the indicia usually surrounding the relation of copartners were present. We think the testimony relied upon to establish the agreement was too meager and indefinite to accomplish its purpose. The most that can be said of the agreement is that plaintiff Stoney and defendant Patch were interested together in another enterprise, and they agreed that if they could secure some options and dispose of them they would divide the profits, and afterward it is claimed that plaintiff Mullholland was taken into the deal.

evidence to establish.

The bill must be dismissed, but without prejudice to the plaintiffs to take such steps as are consistent with the law and practice upon the law side of the court.

The decree will be affirmed, with costs of both courts to the defendant.

NOTE.

The general question of the applicability of the Statute of Frauds to joint adventures or partnerships to deal in real estate is treated in the annotation following HOGG v. GEORGE, post, 484.

JAMES M. HOGG

v.

ROBERT L. GEORGE, Admr., etc., of Ora Haley, Deceased.

Wyoming Supreme Court—August 5, 1921.

(— Wyo. —, 200 Pac. 96.)

Contract — Statute of Frauds — joint adventure in purchase of real estate.

1. A contract for joint adventure in the purchase and sale of real estate and division of the profits is not within a statute making void every agreement or contract for the sale of real estate which is not in writing, so as to defeat a suit for accounting of profits.

[See note on this question beginning on page 484.]

Trial — question for jury — existence of joint adventure.

2. Where the existence of the relation of joint adventurers is in issue, and there is substantial evidence tending to prove that the parties intended to join their efforts in furtherance of the enterprise for their joint profit, the question of such existence is for the jury.

Joint adventure — necessity of specifying rights and duties.

3. To justify a finding of joint adventure it is not necessary that the rights and duties of the parties to the contract shall be particularly specified or defined.

— consideration — what is.

4. The consideration for a contract of joint adventure may be a promise, express or implied, to contribute capital or labor to the enterprise.

— implication of agreement to share losses.

5. An agreement to share losses in the same proportion as profits will be implied in case of a joint adventure.

[See 15 R. C. L. 505.]

— facts to support finding.

6. An agreement to join in the purchase of an option on a ranch may be found to be a joint adventure, and not a brokerage contract, although one party has no money to put into the enterprise, and merely assists in purchasing the option and subsequently in finding a purchaser for the property.

Contract — by fiduciary to secure principal's property without disclosing necessary information.

7. An agreement whereby one sustaining a fiduciary relation to a property owner undertakes to induce him to part with the property without informing him of conditions bearing upon its value, for a share of the profits, is unenforceable.

[See 6 R. C. L. 719.]

Fraud — profiting by fiduciary.

8. There is a presumption of fraud in every case where a fiduciary profits by a transaction with the principal, who confides in him.

[See 12 R. C. L. 427.]

Evidence — burden of overcoming presumption of fraud in transaction by fiduciary.

9. A fiduciary seeking to profit by a transaction with the one who confided in him has the burden of showing that he communicated to the other, not only the fact of his interest in the transaction, but all information he had which it was important for the other to know in order to enable him to judge of the value of his property.

Fraud — transaction in relation of confidence — when fraudulent.

10. In order to raise a presumption of fraud in a transaction between persons bearing relations of trust and confidence to each other, it must appear that there was confidence reposed on the one side and accepted on the other, which results in dependence by the one party and influence by the other.

Pleading — invalidity of contract — public policy.

11. Under an answer totally denying the existence of a contract sought to be enforced, evidence may be considered tending to show that the contract relied on was contrary to public policy, although that fact is not specifically pleaded.

Contract — illegal — completion — accounting.

12. That the transaction, under a contract invalid as against public policy, is fully completed, will not sustain an action for accounting and division of profits.

Trial — instruction — caution in receiving testimony.

13. The rule as to caution in receiving testimony of verbal admissions cannot be applied by the court, in its instructions to the jury, to testimony to prove a verbal contract between the parties.

Joint adventure — presumption as to equal division of profits.

14. Joint adventures in a transaction to purchase a parcel of real estate for sale at a profit are presumed to share equally in the profits, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

— effect of unequal contributions.

15. The mere fact that one party to a joint adventure contributes all the money, while the other contributes only services, does not destroy the presumption that the profits are to be equally divided.

[See 15 R. C. L. 502.]

Appeal — request upon erroneous theory — instruction for adversary on such theory.

16. One asking an instruction upon a theory not involved in the case cannot complain if an instruction upon that theory is given for his adversary.

Trial — instruction — “presumption of fact.”

17. The term “presumption of fact” should not be employed in the instruction of juries.

— division of profits of joint adventure.

18. The jury should not be left, by the instructions in an action for division of the profits of a joint adventure, to divide them other than equally, in the absence of evidence that such division was intended.

CROSS WRITS of error to the District Court for Laramie County (Mentzer, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover one half the alleged profits of a joint adventure in the purchase and resale of ranch property, plaintiff assigning as error the amount of the judgment recovered by him, and defendant assigning as error the refusal of the court to direct a verdict in his favor. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Corthell, McCollough, & Corthell, for plaintiff:

Plaintiff was entitled to one half the profits, if he was entitled to anything.

If there had been illegal incidents to the joint adventure in which the parties had been engaged, and which resulted in the proceeds remaining in the hands of Haley, the defense would not be available to him, and there would be no justification for withholding from plaintiff the moneys belonging to him.

Messrs. Clark & Haggard and C. P. Arnold for defendant.

Kimball, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

James M. Hoge sued Ora Haley for $22,752.50, claimed as one half the profits of a joint adventure in the purchase and resale of ranch property. A trial by jury resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for $2,547. The plaintiff brings error and the defendant cross error. Pending the proceedings in error, Ora Haley died, and Robert L. George, administrator with the will annexed of his estate, was substituted by stipulation as defendant in error.

The plaintiff, the defendant, and one Timothy Ross had had business relations of different kinds with each other for a number of years prior to 1907. In the summer of that year Ross bought of the Riverside Live Stock Company all its cattle and sheep on the Riverside ranch, with the use of the ranch until May, 1908, and later, in September, 1907, entered into a contract with said company, the owner of the ranch, for its purchase at the price of $110,000, of which $1,000 was paid down, the balance to be paid in instalments. In the same contract Ross agreed, also, to buy the company's horses and hay. In the summer or fall of the same year Ross sold to Hoge a one-half interest in a part of the sheep, which were thereafter, for several months, owned jointly by Ross and Hoge, under the control of the latter, and kept, for a part of the time at least, upon the Riverside ranch.

In November, 1907, Ross went to Pennsylvania, where he was seriously sick for several weeks, and did not return to Wyoming until April, 1908. During his absence from Wyoming, Hoge, in addition to the services which he rendered as manager of the sheep business in which they were jointly interested, and without any legal duty, but as a friend and neighbor, gave aid and advice in the caring for other property belonging to Ross. Hoge learned that a payment of $5,000 on the land purchase would become due January 1, 1908, and that, if the payments were not made when due, the rights of Ross under the contract would be forfeited. Realizing that Ross would not be able to make the payment, Hoge went to Haley, explained the situation, and got from him $9,500, which was paid to the Riverside Live Stock Company in satisfaction of the $5,000 due upon the ranch, and $4,500 on the hay. Shortly afterward Hoge suggested to Haley that he could make some money by taking over the Ross contract, but Haley declined to act on the suggestion.

Following these events the demand in that vicinity for ranch property increased, and values advanced. Haley sold his own ranch in that county, and Ross, still in Pennsylvania, was negotiating with parties of Waynesburg, in that state, to take over his land-purchase contract for a sum that would allow him a profit of $5,000 on the transaction. The agents of the Waynesburg parties came to Wyoming, where they examined the lands under the guidance of Mr. Hoge. A few days after they had left Wyoming, Haley, then in Denver, wrote Hoge as follows:

"Laramie, Wyo., March 8, 1908.

"Hon. Jas. M. Hoge,

"Laramie.

"Dear Sir:—

"I wish you would wire me c/o the Tremont Hotel, Denver, when Mr. Ross arrives, so I can arrange to meet him and talk over the disposition of the Riverside and if he has not sold to those Waynesburg parties can't we get it and handle it in some way to make some money out of it? If not too late don't let him sell it to those people for a song or a small margin, for the way its contracted as I understand it we can have good long time to work on and I think we can make some good easy money to get it. I think I can find buyers soon or we could cut it up.

"Yours truly,
"Ora Haley."

Hoge did not reply in writing to this letter. His testimony as to his conversation with Haley soon afterwards was as follows:

About two days after I received the letter Mr. Haley come to Laramie and telephoned me, and I met him at his house and we had a talk. I told Mr. Haley that I had received his letter, and I would be glad to join him in the purchase of that option. I thought there was money in it, and would be glad to enter into an agreement with him to purchase the option.

Q. Was anything said in that conversation about furnishing the money?

A. Yes. I told Mr. Haley I wouldn't be able to put up the money part of it on the start; that I would have to rely upon him; and he answered back it was all right; that the payments on the Riverside ranch were so easy that if he was a younger man he would take hold of the thing, expecting under a sure belief that he could make the payments out of the profits of the ranch year by year, and that he believed he could put his hand on the man that would give us $5.50 an acre for it.

Q. Did he mention any of the proposed buyers?

A. No; he didn't.

Q. Well, what further conversation occurred, if any?

A. Then we talked on, and he expressed a fear that if Mr. Ross came to Laramie, and got onto the feeling regarding real estate, he would be harder to trade with, so we arranged that I should work on the outside and secure it and turn it over to him.

Q. Was any particular plan made about meeting Mr. Ross?

A. Yes; we agreed to meet Mr. Ross in Denver on his way out, and trade with him before he got to the Laramie plains.

Q. At whose suggestion was that?

A. Mr. Haley's.

At this time Hoge and Haley did not know whether or not Ross had sold to the Waynesburg parties, and after the conversation Hoge telegraphed Ross, requesting him, if not already bound, to wait. It was then decided that Haley would offer Ross $10,000 profit for his rights under the contract. This offer was communicated by Hoge to Ross by wire, and accepted in like manner by the latter. The telegrams thus exchanged were not in evidence, and it appears that the parties did not understand that they constituted a binding contract. Hoge then arranged with Ross for a meeting in Denver to close the transaction. The meeting, as so arranged, was had, and Hoge testified that he there said to Ross, "If you feel under any obligation to me, you will repay me by turning the property over to Mr. Haley;" and, on being asked by Ross what he was to be charged for Hoge's services to him, replied: "I have no right to charge you anything, because I have been working against you." Afterwards, at the same meeting in Denver, Ross and Haley agreed upon the terms of the transfer, in accordance with the previous offer by wire, but the contract was not signed until a day or two later (April 10), at Laramie.

The result of the transfer was that Haley was substituted for Ross as purchaser in the contract to buy the Riverside ranch for the sum of $110,000, which, with the $10,000 profit paid to Ross, made the total cost of the ranch to Haley $120,000.

Hoge advanced no part of the money required to meet the terms of the contract with Ross, and was not a party to any of the instruments concerning the future payments, under the contract of purchase to which Haley thus became a party.

After he had succeeded to the rights of Ross, Haley took possession of the ranch, which he used for his personal advantage until possession was delivered to the next purchaser, without any recognition of any right of Hoge to participate in the benefits of such use. However, Hoge was largely instrumental in finding the purchaser to whom sale was made for the sum of $165,000 in the latter part of July, less than four months after the rights of Ross had been transferred to Haley. Thus, without considering small items, the profit to Haley was $45,000, of which Hoge sought by this suit to recover one half.

We shall first consider the questions raised by the defendant's cross petition in error.

It is contended that the trial court erred in refusing to direct a verdict in defendant's favor, for the reason that the evidence was insufficient to establish a contract of joint adventure between the plaintiff and defendant. The relation of joint adventurers is controlled largely by the principles of the law of partnership, yet a joint adventure and partnership are not identical. Some of the distinctions between the two are noticed in the following cases: Reece v. Rhoades, 25 Wyo. 91, 165 Pac. 449; Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N. J. Eq. 185, 74 Atl. 130; Nelson v. Lindsey, 179 Iowa, 862, 162 N. W. 3; Keyes v. Nims, — Cal. App. —, 184 Pac. 695; Donahue v. Haskamp, 109 Wash. 562, 187 Pac. 346; Harvey v. Sellers (C. C.) 115 Fed. 757; Sanders v. Newman, — Wis. —, 181 N. W. 822. A joint adventure has been defined as an enterprise undertaken by several persons jointly. 23 Cyc. 452. Other definitions, similar in meaning and alike in their simplicity, may be found in National Surety Co. v. Winslow, 143 Minn. 66, 173 N. W. 181; Fletcher v.

Fletcher, 206 Mich. 153, 172 N. W. 436, 440; McRee v. Quitman Oil Co. 16 Ga. App. 12, 84 S. E. 487. Where the existence of the relationship is in issue, and there is substantial evidence tending to prove that the parties intended to join their efforts in furtherance of the enterprise for their joint profit, the question is pre-eminently one for a jury. Van Tine v. Hilands (C. C.) 131 Fed. 124; Brady v. Colhoun, 1 Penr. & W. 140.

Trial—question for jury—existence of joint adventure.

We have stated the evidence sufficiently, we think, to show that there was substantial ground for a finding that the parties to this action intended to, and did, join their efforts in the venture of buying and reselling the Riverside ranch, and that they were to share the profits. To justify such a finding it was not necessary that the rights and duties of the parties to the contract of joint adventure should have been more particularly specified or defined. In Goss v. Lanin, 170 Iowa, 57, 152 N. W. 43, cited by this court in Reece v. Rhoades, supra, it was said: "It is true that it is not necessary that there should be a specific, formal agreement to enter into a joint enterprise, or that the interests of the parties should be definitely settled in such agreement, or that there should be a formal agreement as to sharing in the profits. If there be a joint enterprise proven, either by direct evidence of a mutual agreement to that end, or by proof of facts and circumstances from which it is made to appear that such enterprise was in fact entered into, the law fixes their rights."

Viewed in the light of this statement of the law of joint adventure, we do not think the contract relied upon by plaintiff was too indefinite to be enforced. The consideration for such a contract may be, as in partnership contracts, the promise, express or implied, to contribute capital or labor to the enterprise. Botsford v. Van Riper, 33 Nev. 156, 110 Pac. 705. It is not difficult to find evidence of such a promise by the plaintiff in this case, and it is not disputed that he did in fact contribute his services, both in the acquisition of the property which was the subject of the venture, and in procuring the purchaser to whom the profitable sale was made. The absence of any agreement in regard to the proportions in which the profits should be shared is supplied by a presumption to which we shall presently refer. If the contract be criticized because it does not appear that the plaintiff assumed any liability for losses, the answer is that an agreement would be implied, if there had been losses, —implication of agreement to share losses.

—consideration—what is.

that they should be shared in the same proportion as the profits. Van Tine v. Hilands, supra; note to Brotherton v. Gilchrist, 115 Am. St. Rep. 433; Johnson Bros. v. Carter, 120 Iowa, 355, 94 N. W. 850; 1 Lindley, Partn. 12.

It is urged that the contract here must be construed to be nothing more than one of brokerage. While the cases cited on this point are authority upon the proposition that a contract of brokerage, rather than of partnership, may be the result of a transaction whereby one person is to be paid for his services out of the profits, nothing is said in them which persuades us that, under the evidence in the case at bar, the question was not a proper one for submission to the jury to decide the fact as to whether the parties intended a joint venture.

We have not set forth all the evidentiary facts from which it is argued by counsel that the relation of joint adventurers was not intended by the parties, such as the fact that the plaintiff did not assert any right to the land between the time of purchase and of resale, and that, when demanding a settlement, the language which he used was more consistent with a claim for services rendered than with that of a partner or one having a joint interest. These matters were properly before the jury, with whom, no doubt, they had their weight; but we cannot say that they should necessarily have controlled the verdict. It is admitted that none of the words, "partners," "partnership," or "joint adventures," was employed by the parties, but if the jury believed that defendant, a few days after writing the letter of March 8, agreed to plaintiff's proposal "to join him in the purchase of that option," the intention of the parties was as clear to them, no doubt, as if some word with technical legal meaning had been used to define the relationship.

Some of the cases applying the principles of joint adventure to contracts similar to the one under consideration are: Flower v. Barnekoff, 20 Or. 132, 11 L.R.A. 149, 25 Pac. 370; Tyler v. Waddingham, 58 Conn. 375, 8 L.R.A. 657, 20 Atl. 335; Kayser v. Naugham, 8 Colo. 232, 6 Pac. 803; Koyer v. Willmon, 150 Cal. 785, 90 Pac. 135; Simpson v. Tenney, 41 Kan. 561, 21 Pac. 634; Smith v. Imhoff, 89 Wash. 418, 154 Pac. 793; Hines v. Johnston, 95 Ga. 629, 23 S. E. 470; Frazer v. Linton, 183 Pa. 186, 38 Atl. 589. It has often been held that persons who simply buy land to sell again for their mutual profit are not technically partners; but this, as we have already seen, is not exactly the question. There may be no technical partnership, but the rights and obligations are akin to those of partners. Irvine v. Campbell, 121 Minn. 192, 141 N. W. 108, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 689; Jones v. Patrick (C. C.) 140 Fed. 403; Butler v. Union Trust Co. 178 Cal. 195, 172 Pac. 601. Compare the cases of Norton v. Brink, 75 Neb. 566, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 945, 121 Am. St. Rep. 822, 106 N. W. 688, 110 N. W. 669, and Kohl v. Munson, 97 Neb. 170, 149 N. W. 314, in neither of which was a partnership proved. In the former the plaintiff had contributed neither money nor services to the enterprise, and a recovery was denied; in the latter the plaintiff had contributed something to the venture, and a recovery was allowed.

The next contention in support of the cross petition in error is that the contract was void under the Statute of Frauds (§ 4719, Wyo. Comp. Stat. 1920), which reads as follows: "In the following cases every agreement shall be void unless such agreement, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged therewith: . . . Fifth. Every agreement or contract for the sale of real estate, or the lease thereof, for more than one year."

In Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare, 369, 67 Eng. Reprint, 955, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 126, 11 Jur. 163, though Vice Chancellor Wigram, who decided the case, thought it worked a virtual repeal of the Statute of Frauds, it was held that a partnership agreement to be jointly interested in a speculation in land could be proved by parol, and, such an agreement being proved, one of the parties to it could establish his interest in land, the subject of the partnership, without any written evidence. The decision of this point, as shown in the same case on appeal (2 Phill. Ch. 266, 41 Eng. Reprint, 945, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 397, 11 Jur. 574), was not necessary under the facts; it was not noticed in the opinion, though cited in the argument, in the later case of Caddick v. Skidmore, 2 DeG. & J. 52, 44 Eng. Reprint, 907, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 153, 3 Jur. N. S. 1185, 6 Week. Rep. 119, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 383, where a different conclusion was reached, and it is said by Lindley in his work on Partnership (page 82) to be a decision difficult to reconcile with sound principle. It was contrary to an earlier decision by Judge Story in Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sumn. 435, Fed. Cas. No. 13,019; and in the later cases in this country we find a distinct conflict of the authorities, with Dale v. Hamilton and Smith v. Burnham, the leading cases upon the opposite sides. If our Statute of Frauds were as comprehensive as the English statute (29 Car. II. chap. 3), and we were then to consider a case where the plaintiff, relying upon an oral contract of joint adventure, sought to recover an interest in the land which was the subject of the enterprise, the task of discerning, upon view of the conflicting authorities, the true principle, would be more difficult than we conceive it to be under our statute in the case at hand.

The Statute of Frauds of this state, so far as it is here drawn in question, refers only to contracts "for the sale of real estate," omitting the words "or any interest in or concerning the same," found in the corresponding provision of § 4 of the English statute. Giving to the word "sale," as used in the statute, the broadest meaning that reason will permit, it would be a most strained construction to say that the plaintiff here is seeking to recover upon a contract for the sale of real estate.

As was said by Judge Earl in Chester v. Dickerson, 54 N. Y. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 550: "Most of the conflict in the authorities has arisen in controversies about the title to the real estate after the dissolution of the partnership or the death of one of the partners. But suppose two persons, by parol agreement, enter into a partnership to speculate in lands, how do they come in conflict with the Statute of Frauds? No estate or interest in land has been granted, assigned, or declared. When the agreement is made no lands are owned by the firm, and neither party attempts to convey or assign any to the other. The contract is a valid one, and in pursuance of this agreement they go on and buy, improve, and sell lands. While they are doing this, do they not act as partners and bear a partnership relation to each other? Within the meaning of the statute in such case, neither conveys nor assigns any land to the other, and hence there is no conflict with the statute. The statute is not so broad as to prevent proof by parol of an interest in lands; it is simply aimed at the creation or conveyance of an estate in lands without a writing. . . . This is not a controversy about the title to any of the lands taken or owned by the partners, but it simply relates to the conduct of the defendants while they were acting as partners; and in such a case the Statute of Frauds certainly can present no obstacle to relief."

This language may have been dicta in the case from which it is taken, but it has had the influence of authority, as shown by the decisions where it is cited or quoted with approval. Holmes v. McCray, 51 Ind. 358, 19 Am. Rep. 735; McElroy v. Swope (C. C.) 47 Fed. 380; Garth v. Davis, 120 Ky. 106, 85 S. W. 692; Newell v. Cochran, 41 Minn. 374, 43 N. W. 84; Hirbourn v. Reeding, 3 Mont. 15, 11 Mor. Min. Rep. 514; Babcock v. Read, 99 N. Y. 609, 1 N. E. 141; Case v. Seger, 4 Wash. 492, 30 Pac. 646; Richards v. Grinnell, 63 Iowa, 44, 50 Am. Rep. 727, 18 N. W. 668; Kilbourn v. Latta, 5 Mackey, 304, 60 Am. Rep. 373; Thompson v. McKee, 43 Okla. 243, L.R.A.1915A, 521, 142 Pac. 755; Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 479, 16 L.R.A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133, 30 Pac. 605; Speyer v. Desjardins, 144 Ill. 641, 36 Am. St. Rep. 473, 32 N. E. 283; Flower v. Barnekoff, supra.

These are a few of the many cases where it has been held that contracts similar to the one relied upon by the plaintiff in this case, being neither contracts to buy nor to sell real estate as between the parties, are not within the Statute of Frauds. Some of these cases do not, we think, meet the reasoning of Judge Story in Smith v. Burnham, supra, for he did not hold that the partnership contract which he was considering was one for the sale of land, or for the sale of an interest in or concerning lands, but that it was a declaration or creation of a trust or confidence in lands, not arising or resulting by implication of law, and, as such, required to be in writing by the provisions of a statute similar to § 7 of the English statute. The decision in Schultz v. Waldons, 60 N.

J. Eq. 71, 47 Atl. 187, was upon like grounds. We have in this state no such statute, and no point is made that the contract in this case is void or unenforceable as an attempt to declare or create a trust without a writing. Without pursuing further the subject of oral trusts, we suggest in passing that under the present laws it is probable that trusts in lands may be declared or created in this state as at common law. Peebles v. Reading, 8 Serg. & R. 484; Murphy v. Hubert, 7 Pa. 420; Gardner v. Rundell, 70 Tex. 453, 7 S. W. 781.

A different question would be presented if the plaintiff were seeking to recover an interest in the lands which had been acquired in the course of the joint enterprise, instead of his share of profits which have arisen from the sale of them. Even though the contract be one which is in contravention of the statute, yet, when the transactions affecting the interests in the land have been completed, so that the court need not enforce anything with reference to the land itself, it has been held that the rights of the parties resulting from their dealings may be enforced. Smith v. Putnam, 107 Wis. 155, 82 N. W. 1077, 83 N. W. 288, and cases cited. See Jones v. Patrick, 140 Fed. 403, and Zwicker v. Gardner, 213 Mass. 95, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1160, 99 N. E. 949; Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. 359.

We therefore hold that, when profits have accrued from the purchase and resale of real estate in pursuance of an oral contract of joint adventure, the Statute of Frauds of this state will not affect the right of one of the parties to the contract to recover his share of such profits, even though all the money were furnished by the other party, who took and transferred, in his name alone, the title to the land.

The next questions for consideration center around the proposition stated in an instruction, in which purchase of real

we have numbered the three principal sets of facts mentioned and quote: "You are instructed that if you shall find from the evidence (1) that there was an agreement between the parties whereby the plaintiff was to have some share in the land or in the profits from the sale thereof, and (2) that the only consideration, or a substantial part of the consideration, on the part of the plaintiff for such contract, was his agreement to induce Ross to sell his option, and to withhold from Ross the information, and the opportunity to secure information, that a change in conditions had made his option valuable, and you shall further find (3) that at that time the plaintiff occupied a confidential relation of trust with Ross with respect to this land, and was under a duty to disclose to Ross all material facts with respect to land and the market therefor, such consideration was immoral and could not constitute a valid consideration for such contract, and such contract was unenforceable."

We believe the principle of law is stated correctly. It is the familiar doctrine of constructive trusts that there is a presumption of fraud in every case where a fiduciary profits by a transaction with the person who confides in him. To overcome the presumption it must which it was important for the other to know in order to enable him to judge of the value of his property. Tate v. Williamson, L. R. 1 Eq. 528, 14 L. T. N. S. 163, 14 Week. Rep. 449, s. c. L. R. 2 Ch. 55, 15 L. T. N. S. 549, 15 Week. Rep. 321; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 956; 3 Williston, Contr. § 1499. A contract is illegal if its object or tendency is to cause unfaithful conduct by a fiduciary. 3 Williston, Contr. § 1737; 13 C. J. 415; Ridgely v. Keene, 134 App. Div. 647, 119 N. Y. Supp. 451; Skirvin v. Gardner, 36 Okla. 613, 129 Pac. 729; Fuller v. Dame, 18 Pick. 472, 481; Bollman v. Loomis, 41 Conn. 581; Thomas v. Caulkett, 57 Mich. 392, 58 Am. Rep. 369, 24 N. W. 154; Simon v. Garlitz, 63 Tex. Civ. App. 172, 133 S. W. 461. If the facts stated in the instruction were established, the contract in question had the object or tendency which the law forbids, and was illegal. The defendant claims that said facts were established so conclusively by the plaintiff's own testimony, and by other evidence which was undisputed by him, that the trial court should have directed a verdict for defendant upon this ground, as was requested by appropriate motions at the trial. The failure so to direct a verdict is the third and last claim of error raised by the cross petition in error.

—by fiduciary to secure principal's property without disclosing necessary information.

The facts which we have numbered (1) in the instruction are, of course, advanced by the plaintiff as the basis of his right to recover. Those numbered (2) are, in our opinion, established by plaintiff's own testimony, from which it appears that he and the defendant knew of a change in conditions on the Laramie plains, where the land was situated, which increased the value of the Ross contract; that Ross did not know of those conditions; that it was understood that plaintiff and defendant should conceal them from Ross; and that they were so concealed. It does not appear clearly what those conditions were, but it is quite evident that the information to be withheld was not a mere opinion as to value, but a state of facts which would come to the knowledge of Ross if he should visit the Laramie plains. In regard to the facts in group (3) we are of a different opinion, and cannot agree that a fiduciary relation between Hoge and Ross with reference to the land contract was conclusively established by the evidence.

It is undisputed that Ross and Hoge were close friends, and there was between them, no doubt, the trust and confidence which is the essence of such friendship. But that fiduciary relationship which is the foundation of the rule which we are now considering must be one from which the law infers or presumes the exercise of undue influence. In cases of trustee and beneficiary, principal and agent, and the like, the relations are essentially fiduciary, and the inference or presumption follows of course. This is not such a case, as it is conceded that Hoge was not the agent of Ross with reference to the ranch property in question. However, the application of the rule is not confined to those definite instances, but is invoked in a variety of less definite confidential and trust relations. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 956. For establishing the fiduciary relationship in the latter class of cases there seems to be no fixed test, but it must appear, as a fact, that there was confidence reposed on the one side and accepted on the other, with a resulting dependence by the one party and influence by the other. Cowee v. Cornell, 75 N. Y. 91, 99, 31 Am. Rep. 428; McKnatt v. McKnatt, 10 Del. Ch. 392, 93 Atl. 367; Beach v. Wilton, 244 Ill. 413, 91 N. E. 492. The fact that such relation existed must be established by evidence, and the burden is upon the party asserting it. Shevlin v. Shevlin, 96 Minn. 398, 105 N. W. 257.

Counsel call especial attention to that portion of § 1737 of Williston on Contracts where it is stated that "probably any contract for reward, to influence by apparently disinterested advice the conduct of a third person, is similarly obnoxious to public policy, even when neither party at the time bears a fiduciary relation to the person to be influenced."

The authorities cited in support of this, and of the similar statement in 2 Page on Contracts, 2d ed. § 881, are, as indicated by the text, cases where the party to be influenced was not informed of the interest in the transaction of the party who undertook to exercise the influence. In this case Hoge testified that he did make to Ross statements which were sufficient to impart notice of his interest.

We cannot agree that it was established by undisputed evidence that a fiduciary relation, as contemplated by the law on this subject, existed between Hoge and Ross with reference to the ranch property in question. On the other hand, we are of opinion that there was evidence from which the jury might have found such a relation, and therefore the question was properly submitted to them. If the fiduciary relation had been found to exist, the case presented no question of overcoming the presumption of fraud, because, as we have shown, the undisputed evidence negated the possibility of the full disclosure necessary for that purpose; and obviously in the face of that evidence, it could not be classed among those cases cited in support of an exception to the rule (31 Cyc. 1449) holding that a fiduciary may profit by a transaction in which he acted merely to bring the parties together.

The plaintiff in error complains of this instruction, because the issue of illegality of the contract was not made by the pleadings. It is true that this defense was not pleaded by defendant, but the contract was wholly denied by his answer, and when, in such a case, evidence appears which tends to show that the contract relied upon determine its character. Kennedy v. Lonabaugh, 19 Wyo. 352, 117 Pac. 1079, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 133.

It is further contended that, if it be conceded that the contract of joint adventure in question was contrary to public policy, yet, the illegal transaction being completed, there is no reason why the defendant should be permitted to retain all the proceeds. This contention, we think, is also settled against the plaintiff by Kennedy v. Lonabaugh, supra, which was a suit for an accounting and division of profits under a partnership contract, where it was held that, as the contract was illegal, no relief could be granted. It is argued that that case should be distinguished because there the partnership business was contrary to a Federal statute; but we are cited to no authority which would justify the distinction, and are of the opinion that, if the contract in the case at bar were illegal because of a vicious tendency, the reason for denying a recovery would apply with the same force as in a case where the transaction was prohibited by the written law. It is true that Kennedy v. Lonabaugh was an equity case, and the rule, as there announced, was stated as a doctrine of courts of equity. It is suggested that it should not be invoked in an action at law. We find no authority for any such limitation of the rule. See 13 C. J. 492; 1 Lindley, Partn. 105. The ancient maxims expressing it are maxims of the common law of contracts. McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 654, 43 L. ed. 1117, 1123, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 839; Broom, Legal Maxims, 7th Eng. ed. 554-563. It would be singular, indeed, if relief might be denied to a partner seeking an accounting in equity, and granted to him, if no accounting were necessary, when he sues at law for a balance due.

The plaintiff contends that there was error in giving the following instruction: "Testimony in regard to verbal statements should be received with great caution; the evidence, consisting as it does in mere repetition of oral statements, is subject to much imperfection and mistake, in consequence of the person speaking not having clearly expressed his own meaning, or in consequence of the witness having misunderstood him. It frequently happens, also, that the witness, by unintentionally altering a few of the expressions actually used, gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party did in fact say. This kind of testimony should be scanned closely, particularly when a long time has elapsed since the conversation. Where statements are deliberately made and precisely identified, or where the precise words are shown, or proved, by intelligent and reliable witnesses, they often lead to a satisfactory conclusion. When a witness can only give what he thinks is the substance of what was said, the weight to be given to such testimony depends largely upon the strength of memory, intelligence, and integrity of the witness."

It is conceded by counsel that the only evidence to which the instruction was applicable was that of Hoge as to the terms of the contract between himself and Haley, and, inasmuch as the jury found that there was a contract, it is suggested that the instruction, even if erroneous, worked no prejudice; but we pass that suggestion without discussion, as it is necessary that we rule upon the propriety of the instruction, for guidance in further proceedings in the case.

If we assume, as we do, that the instruction could have been applied only to the testimony of plaintiff as to the conversation in which he claimed the contract was made, we find no authority for it. The first two sentences of the instruction employ the language of § 200 of Greenleaf on Evidence, but so changed that the instruction applies to all "verbal statements," whereas Greenleaf's text had reference to "verbal admissions" only. In other texts, where we find discussions of the propriety of similar instructions, it is apparently assumed that, when given, they should apply only to such admissions. 38 Cyc. 1742; 2 Thompson, Trials, § 2431. The word "admissions," as here used, may be defined as concessions or acknowledgments made by a party, of the existence or truth of certain facts. Bouvier's Law Dict. They are those statements which would otherwise be hearsay. Castner v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 126 Iowa, 581, 102 N. W. 499. The promise upon which the suit is based is not an admission in this sense, but is a fact to be proved like any other issuable fact. Thomas v. Paul, 87 Wis. 607, 58 N. W. 1031; Thompson v. Purdy, 45 Or. 197, 77 Pac. 113, 83 Pac. 139. Statements in the nature of admissions, which are also admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ, may not be disparaged by such an instruction. Dixon v. Russell, 156 Wis. 161, 145 N. W. 761; John v. Pierce, — Wis. —, 178 N. W. 297. The cases which we have cited are from those states where such cautionary instructions have been approved when limited to testimony of verbal admissions, and, still confining the citations to cases from such states, we note the following authorities, which illustrate further the limitation stated: Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Allen, 106 Ga. 572, 32 S. E. 622; Gleason v. Denson, 65 Or. 199, 132 Pac. 530; Martin v. Algona, 40 Iowa, 392; State v. Jackson, 103 Iowa, 702, 73 N. W. 467; Blume v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 133 Minn. 348, 158 N. W. 418, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 297; Haven v. Markstrum, 67 Wis. 493, 30 N. W. 720; Chrestensen v. Harms, 38 S. D. 360, 161 N. W. 343. In Georgia, a statute provides that "all admissions shall be scanned with care" (Parks's Anno. Code, § 5784), and, in Oregon, that "oral admissions ought to be viewed with caution" (L. O. L. § 868).

Thus, the cases from those states where a similar instruction is upheld when applicable only to oral admissions either directly or inferentially support the view that it should never be made applicable to testimony of the oral contract upon which the suit is based. Hence, we hold that the instruction should not have been given. Whether such an instruction should be given in any case is a point upon which the authorities are divided, and which we cannot decide in this case, as it is not presented by the record.

To guide the jury in determining the interests of the parties in the profits of the venture, the plaintiff requested the following instruction: "When two persons undertake a joint enterprise for mutual profit, it is to be presumed that their interests in the profits are equal, unless there is evidence from which an understanding for a different division may be implied. Inequality of interest does not necessarily result from unequal contributions, or from the fact that one of the parties contributes all of the money, while the other contributes only service."

That instruction was refused, and the one upon that subject given at the request of defendant was as follows: "You are instructed that if you find that the parties entered into any agreement of partnership, or joint adventure, relative to the Riverside ranch, you must find and determine the relative interests of the parties in that transaction. These relative interests are not fixed by law, but wholly by the agreement of the parties themselves. If there is an express agreement fixing the relative rights and interests of the parties, that express agreement must prevail. If there is no express agreement upon this point, it is ordinarily presumed that the parties are to share equally; but it sometimes is to be inferred that the parties are to share in proportion to their respective contributions to the enterprise. These presumptions are not presumptions of law, but are presumptions of fact, and the jury must determine whether there was any express agreement between the parties as to their respective shares in the land or in the profits thereof, and if there was no such express agreement it is the duty of the jury to determine, from all of the words and acts of the parties at the time the agreement was made, and the conditions surrounding the same, what the respective interests of the parties were to be."

The plaintiff contends that this latter instruction was misleading to the jury and prejudicial to his rights, and also that the verdict, by which he was awarded less than one tenth of the amount he claimed, was not supported by the evidence. These two contentions are somewhat interwoven and may be discussed together.

We think it is well settled that partners shall share equally in profits, unless there be an express or implied contract for a different division. Story, Partn. § 24; Parsons, Partn. § 258; 1 Lindley, Partn. 348-351; 3 Kent, Com. 28, 29; 30 Cyc. 451, 693, 696; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 101, 102; Gould v. Gould, 6 Wend. 263; Paul v. Cullum, 132 U. Webber, 36 Nev. 623, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1046, 134 Pac. 461, 135 Pac. 139, 141 Pac. 458, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1202; Gius v. Coffinberry, 39 Or. 414, 65 Pac. 358. A different view of the rule upon this subject was announced in Thompson v. Williamson, 7 Bligh, N. R. 432, 5 Eng. Reprint, 833, a decision under Scotch law, where it was stated that there was no presumption of law that partnership shares were to be equal; that the presumption was only one of fact, which the jury might or might not follow; and that, even though there was no evidence of a contract for unequal shares, the jury should be permitted, upon consideration of all the facts and circumstances, to decide what the interests of the parties should be. The decision in that case was contrary to the opinion of Lord Eldon expressed in the earlier case of Peacock v. Peacock, 16 Ves. Jr. 49, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 549, 10 Revised Rep. 138, and has not been followed in the later English cases. See 1 Lindley, Part. 348-350, and cases cited.

Thompson v. Williamson has never been followed by the courts of this country, and we find it approved only in a separate opinion by Hoffman, J., in Hasbrouck v. Childs, 3 Bosw. 105. Its reasoning did not meet the approval of Judge Story, whose discussion of this subject in his work on Partnership, § 24, and note, is the most thorough that we have seen. We are convinced by it, and the other authorities which we have cited, that the presumption of equality is a true presumption, of which there is in reality only one kind, properly referred to either as a "presumption" or "presumption of law." The effect of the particular presumption, in a case of this kind, is to invoke the rule of law requiring the jury to reach the conclusion to which it points,—that is, equality of interest,—in the absence of evidence to the contrary; that is, in the absence of evidence from which an agreement for an unequal interest may be implied.

This principle is stated with precision in the first sentence of the instruction requested by plaintiff. The second sentence is a statement similar in substance to the language used frequently by text-writers and judges when explaining this rule, and we believe it was a proper statement to go to the jury in this case, as a warning against the danger of undertaking to compare and weigh the value of the respective contributions to the enterprise. See 1 Lindley, Partn. 349; Bates, Partn. § 181; Johnson v. Jackson, 130 Ky. 751, 114 S. W. 260, 17 Ann. Cas. 699;

App. 427, 70 S. W.
258. We are of opinion, therefore, that plaintiff's instruction stated the law correctly.

Counsel for plaintiff now contends that the case did not turn upon any question of the relative interests of the parties to the venture, but upon the question whether plaintiff had any interest at all, and that there was no evidence whatever to overcome the presumption of equality.
However, at the trial, the plaintiff did not ask the court to instruct upon that theory, but, by requesting the instruction which we have quoted, consented that the jury should decide whether or not there was any evidence of an implied agreement for unequal interests, and consequently, if the instruction given upon that subject was the same in meaning as the instruction which he requested, the error, if any, in submitting that issue to the jury, was invited. That such was the case is earnestly urged by counsel for defendant, who argue that the instruction given is nothing more than an affirmative converse of the negative statements contained in the instruction asked by plaintiff.

We are of opinion, however, that the instructions are dissimilar, and that the one given utterly fails to inform the jury of the true effect of the presumption in question.

In considering this point it should be borne in mind that there was no evidence whatever of an express contract as to the division of the profits; that the plaintiff claimed an equal share by virtue of the presumption, and though he proceeded at the trial upon the theory that the jury might be permitted to decide whether there was any evidence to overcome it, he was at liberty to argue to the jury that there was not,
and to insist that the presumption should control the verdict.

Passing, then, to the examination of the instruction which was given by the court, we find that the jury were told that, in the absence of an express agreement upon this point, it is "ordinarily" presumed that the parties are to share equally. What, then, are those cases in which equality is not presumed? Looking for the answer to this inquiry, the jury are confronted by the statement that "it sometimes is to be inferred that the parties are to share in proportion to their respective contributions." Nowhere are they told that the presumption of equality should control unless there be evidence from which to imply, or infer, an agreement for unequal shares; and, left without this guide, they may very naturally have understood that equality should not be presumed in any case where the contributions appeared to them to be unequal.

The presumption of equality and the inference of inequality are, then, positively classified as presumptions of fact. The phrase "presumptions of fact" is of frequent occurrence in the books, but it is now well understood that, accurately speaking, there is no such thing as a "presumption" of fact (4 Wigmore, Ev.
§ 2491), and the term should be discarded as useless and confusing.

Trial—instruction—presumption of fact.

When used, it can mean only inferences of fact, or mere arguments which may or may not be acted upon by the jury, who, under our system of jury trials, need not usually be instructed in regard thereto. This classification of the presumption of equality as a "presumption of fact," if understood by the jury, eliminated from the case all questions of any true presumption, or presumption of law.

The instruction then informs the jury that it is their duty "to determine . . . what the respective interests of the parties were to be."
This closing language, considered in connection with the rest of the instruction, may have been taken by the jury as an invitation to measure the interests by the value of the contributions, which could only lead to that vague speculation which it is the object of the presumption to eliminate from a case of this kind. If they accepted it as a direction only to determine what the contract of the parties was, the instruction is then deficient, in that it fails to state what, if anything, should control the —division of profits of joint adventure.

verdict, in the absence of any evidence from which a contract could be implied. In effect, they were required to follow the rule announced in Thompson v. Williamson, supra, which, as we have seen, is at variance with the other cases both in England and this country. The cases Re McConnell (D. C.) 197 Fed. 438, and Fleischmann v. Gottschalk, 70 Md. 523, 17 Atl. 384, cited by defendant as precedents upholding an unequal division of profits, are entirely consistent with our view of the law. In the former case, one of the parties to the venture was held to be entitled to a return of his capital, which was used in the venture, with interest, and the net profits were then divided equally. In the Fleischmann Case it was held that the evidence warranted the inference that the parties had agreed to an unequal division, and the decree, carrying out that agreement, was approved.

In the case at bar the verdict, which is satisfactory to neither party, might not have been reached if the jury had been instructed as requested by plaintiff upon this subject.

It is claimed that the error in this instruction was emphasized by other instructions from which the jury may have inferred that the plaintiff, to entitle him to a recovery, was required to prove an express contract for an equal share of the profits. We do not deem it necessary to analyze the language which is the subject of this complaint, nor to discuss its probable effect, as our views upon the presumption involved will, no doubt, be sufficient guide in instructing upon this subject at another trial.

Because of the error mentioned, the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Applicability of Statute of Frauds to joint adventure or partnership to deal in real estate.

- I. Scope, 484.
- II. Introduction, 485.
- III. Majority rule:
 - a. Rationale, 485.
 - b. Application to particular facts, 491.
 - c. Remedies available, 493.
- IV. Minority rule, 497.

I. Scope.

The present annotation is confined to cases where a joint adventure or partnership to deal in real estate is conceded or proved to have been intended by the parties, and the question is whether or not a parol agreement to carry out such a purpose is within the Statute of Frauds. This limitation, of necessity, excludes cases where the agreements were not treated as creating "partnerships" or

"joint adventures," as, for instance, where they were regarded as creating trusts. Likewise, the annotation is limited to cases where the partnership, or joint enterprise or adventure, was formed to deal in real estate as a commercial proposition; that is, to speculate by buying and selling real estate, or interests therein, for profit. Thus, are excluded cases which, while they involve the three elements of real estate, parol partnership, or joint enterprise, and the Statute of Frauds, do not turn upon the effect of the fact that the primary purpose of the agreement was to buy and sell real estate for profit. This eliminates decisions where the holding or acquiring of real estate is merely incidental to the carrying on of the business for which the partnership was formed, as well as the cases where the agreement was to purchase and divide the land, or to purchase, and work, and divide the proceeds of the land.

The annotation is also confined primarily to cases where the partnership was formed to make future purchases and sales of lands owned by strangers to the contract. This excludes partnerships formed for the purpose of selling real estate already owned by one or more of the contracting parties, as distinguished from agreements to share in the profits of sales of lands thereafter to be acquired. Cases of the former class have been held, in some instances at least, to be clearly distinguishable from those of the latter. See, for example, Burgwyn v. Jones (1912) 118 Va. 511, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 120, 75 S. E. 188, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 564.

II. Introduction.

Since it is well settled that an ordinary partnership may be formed by parol, and may purchase and hold real estate as partnership property, which will be regarded in all respects as other partnership property, there would seem to be no reason why a parol partnership formed for the express purpose of dealing in lands should be invalid. However, as is pointed out in HOGG v. GEORGE (reported herewith) ante, 469, there is some conflict of opinion, although the same is more apparent than real because of the fact that it is the result, not so much of conflicting principles, but of the different ends sought by the litigants. As to the real conflict among the cases involving parol partnerships formed for the purpose of buying real estate for sale and profit, the great weight of authority tends to negative the operation of the Statute of Frauds.

Generally speaking, it may be said that as a rule all suits recognizing the existence of the partnership, and seeking relief which may be legitimately sought by a partner, are upheld, while, on the other hand, parol contracts for an interest in land are ignored and suits brought to enforce them dismissed, although they may constitute part of a partnership agreement.

With respect to "joint adventures" or "joint enterprises" to deal in real estate, they generally are regarded as governed by the same rules applicable in the case of partnerships.

III. Majority rule.

a. Rationals.

As previously indicated, the decided weight of authority is to the effect that a parol partnership agreement, or joint enterprise, entered into by two or more persons for the purpose of carrying on the business of purchasing and selling real estate, or interests therein, for speculation, the profits to be divided among the parties, is not within the provisions of the Statute of Frauds relating to the sale of land or an interest in lands; in other words, that such an agreement may be entered into and become effectual, although not in writing. The following cases support this rule:

This is generally put upon the theory that the validity of an agreement to share in the profits of contemplated speculative deals in real estate does not involve an estate, or interest in real estate, within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds.

In Bates v. Babcock (1892) 95 Cal.

484, 16 L.R.A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133, 30 Pac. 605, the court said: "An agreement of this character cannot be said to contravene the provisions of the Statute of Frauds. It does not contemplate any transfer of land from one party to the other, or the creation of any interest or estate in lands. In one sense, the parties to such an agreement may be said to have an interest in the lands that are to be purchased under the agreement—that sense in which the beneficiary, under a trust for the sale of real estate, and payment to him of the proceeds of the sale, has an interest in the land; but it is only a pecuniary interest resulting from the sale, and a right to have the land sold, rather than an interest in the land itself. The Statute of Frauds does not prevent parol proof for the purpose of showing an interest in lands, but declares that an agreement by which an estate or interest in lands is to be created must be in writing. No interest or estate in the land is created by such an agreement, but by the subsequent acts of the parties under the agreement rights are acquired, in reference to the land that may be purchased in pursuance of the agreement, which a court of equity will protect against any attempt to make the Statute of Frauds an instrument of fraud. A bill for the conveyance of the lands could not be maintained under such an agreement, but by reason of the acts of the parties thereunder an equity would be raised in their behalf which would be superior to the legal title held by him to whom the land was conveyed, and would control that title in subordination to this superior equity. It is a familiar rule in equity that lands acquired by a partnership for partnership uses are partnership assets, and are treated in equity as personalty, whether the partnership was formed by oral or written agreement. The same principle should apply when the object of the partnership is to deal in lands, and the assets of the partnership with which the lands are to be purchased are made up of the skill and money which are respectively contributed by the partners as its capital. Upon proof of the existence of such a partnership, the rights and obligations of the respective partners should be determined upon the same principles and with the same results as in other partnerships." So, in Pennybacker v. Leary (1884) 65 Iowa, 220, 21 N. W. 575, supra, the court said: "Defendant insists, and pleads as a defense in his answer, that as the contract was for the purchase of an interest in lands, and was wholly oral, it cannot be enforced under the Statute of Frauds. The contract, to be truly stated, amounted to a parol agreement for the creation of a partnership, the object of which was to acquire and sell certain lands. The part of the agreement obligating the parties to purchase the land was but an incident of the contract of partnership. It provided for the subject and manner of investment of the capital of the firm. It was simply an agreement that the firm would buy the lands. By this agreement neither party bought or sold lands. It was not an agreement for the purchase and sale of lands. It was nothing more than an agreement that the firm should buy lands of another, which should be held as firm property. It was not, therefore, an agreement or contract under which an interest in, or title to, lands was attempted to be transferred. It simply provides what interest the parties shall have therein, when the lands shall be acquired, as provided by the contract. Surely, if two persons agree to enter into a partnership for the purchase and sale of dry goods, and therein specify the manner of the contribution of the capital of the firm, and the goods to be purchased therewith, and the persons of whom they shall be purchased, the contract could not be regarded as creating or transferring any property or interest in the goods intended to be purchased. There is no distinction in principle between that case and this. We conclude that the contract in question is not within the contemplation of our Statute of Frauds, which provides that no evidence of a contract 'for the creation or transfer of any interest in lands, except leases for a term not exceeding one year,' is competent, 'unless it be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged, or by his lawfully authorized agent.” In Moran v. McDevitt (1912) — R. I. —, 83 Atl. 1013, supra, the court stated the rule and the reason therefor, as follows: “While it is true that some authorities hold that partnerships formed for the buying and selling of land must be evidenced by articles in writing, and cannot be proven by parol, on the ground that if one partner makes a purchase of land in his own name, but which is intended for the benefit of the firm, to allow the other partner or partners, under the mere form of a partnership agreement, the same being evidenced only by parol, to take advantage of that contract, would be to allow him to acquire an interest in land by parol, directly in opposition to the Statute of Frauds. The great weight of authority, however, seems to be that such agreements of copartnership can be proven by parol, and are not in violation of the Statute of Frauds, and such authorities base their reasoning on the ground that such contracts do not contemplate any transfer of land from one partner to the other, or the creation of any interest or estate therein,—do not, as between the parties, in any way affect the title to realty so bought for copartnership purposes,—but that the subject-matter of the contract is the profits or losses to be derived from the sale of said land. This seems to us to be the better reasoning, and the rule which this court should follow.” Again, in Garth v. Davis (1905) 120 Ky. 106, 117 Am. St. Rep. 571, 85 S. W. 692, supra, the court said: “An agreement to become partners in dealing in real estate is neither a contract to buy, nor a contract to sell, real estate, as between the parties to it. So far as the formation of the copartnership is concerned, the title to real estate is nowise affected by the making of the agreement. The terms of the agreement, the mutual undertakings by the partners, as between themselves, as to what each will contribute, and the interests of each in the profits of their undertaking, are matters not necessarily affected by the statute. The most numerous, and what seem to us the best-reasoned, authorities, hold that such contract need not be in writing if to be begun and may end within a year, although as a fact it may not be terminated for more than a year.” And in Thompson v. McKee (1914) 43 Okla. 243, L.R.A.1915A, 521, 142 Pac. 755, supra, the court discussed the question as follows: “That an ordinary partnership agreement is valid, though not reduced to writing, can scarcely be questioned. Nor can it be doubted that the settlement of the partnership accounts, and a proper division of the assets among the members of the firm, was an appropriate function of the court below, sitting as a court of equity. It clearly appearing that the agreement between the parties did not have for its object the sale of real property, or any interest therein, by or to the plaintiff or defendants, or either of them, but contemplated only a division of the profits or losses growing out of the purchase and subsequent sale of the land to others, the same is not such a contract as is embraced within the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, and required to be in writing and signed by the party to be charged. We, therefore, conclude that a partnership agreement, as in the instant case, may be formed orally for the purpose of dealing in lands as well as for dealing in personal estate, or engaging in any other occupation or business, it being, like any other partnership contract, an agreement to share in the profits and losses of the business; and the existence of such partnership and the interest of the members of the firm may be established by parol evidence.” And again, in Dudley v. Littlefield (1842) 21 Me. 418, supra, Whitman, Ch. J., said: “We do not see why there may not be a copartnership in buying and selling land, as well as in any other vendible property. It is an agreement merely to share in the profit and loss of negotiations. The rules for transferring land may be different from those for the transfer of personal estate; but that can make no difference in the result, as to profit and loss. Copartners in trade often connect the purchase and sale of real estate with their other negotiations, and the profit and loss relative thereto go into the general account thereof; the only difference being that a different form is used in transferring real estate from that which is requisite in the transfer of personal property." And in Coward v. Clanton (1889) 79 Cal. 27, 21 Pac. 359, supra, the court said: "The contract, as between the parties to it, does not in any way affect the title to real estate, nor does the present controversy between the parties [action for dissolution and accounting] involve any such question. The subject-matter of the contract was the profits to be realized from the sales made."

And it has been said that equity will regard real estate, when bought pursuant to a parol partnership agreement to deal in lands, as personal property among the partners in the speculation, so as to remove the transaction of the partners from the inhibition of the provisions of the Statute of Frauds relating to sales of real property.

In Speyer v. Desjardins (1892) 144 Ill. 641, 36 Am. St. Rep. 473, 32 N. E. 283, supra, the court said: "The real estate of a partnership is treated and administered in equity, as between partners and for all the purposes of the partnership, as personal property and partnership assets. From its status in equity, of being stock in trade and partnership assets, it is readily deducible that it is immaterial whether the legal title to the partnership land is in all the partners, or in one, or in some number less than the whole; that it is not material whether the partnership was already established and engaged in its business when the land was acquired and brought into the partnership stock, or whether the partnership was established and the land acquired and put in contemporaneously, or whether the partnership was established for the express and special purpose of dealing in and making profit out of the very land itself which is in question; and that the facts of the existence of the partnership, and that the lands were acquired and used for partnership purposes, being shown by parol, it is immaterial whether such partnership was formed by written articles or by parol." And in Archibald v. McNerhanie (1899) 29 Can. S. C. 564, supra, the chief justice of the Canadian supreme court said: "I take it to be established now that a partnership may always be proved by parol, and if it turns out that the assets consist of lands, or interests in land, bought for the purpose of being sold again, such lands will be treated as any other property not coming within the statute. The principle is this,—all assets of a partnership are considered as personalty, and that upon an application of the doctrine of equitable conversion, for ultimately, in order to a winding up of the partnership, everything must be sold and converted into money. This is applied to other questions besides that of the applicability of the Statute of Frauds; for instance, in a partnership for dealing in land, the lands acquired are not considered as realty going to the heir of one of the partners, but as belonging to the personal representative, for whom a court of equity treats the heirs as a trustee."

And in the following cases the courts emphasized the point that, in the class of partnerships and joint adventures under consideration, the lands were to be purchased for resale as a speculation, rather than to be held for permanent investment or use: Tenney v. Simpson (1887) 37 Kan. 353, 15 Pac. 187; Jones v. Davies (1899) 60 Kan. 309, 72 Am. St. Rep. 354, 56 Pac. 484; Thompson v. McKee (1914) 43 Okla. 243, L.R.A.1915A, 521, 142 Pac. 755.

And a distinction was drawn in Bailey v. Weed (1899) 86 App. Div. 611, 55 N. Y. Supp. 253, between cases where the partnership involved conveyances between the partners, and cases where the titles, etc., are taken and conveyed by one partner, and the others merely share in the profits and losses; or, in other words, between partnerships dealing in realty for speculation, and partners buying and holding realty for investment or use. It was declared that oral partnerships formed for the first-mentioned purpose are not invalidated by the Statute of Frauds. And in Pounds v. Egbert (1907) 117 App. Div. 756, 102 N. Y. Supp. 1079, the court said: "A partnership agreement not within the Statute of Frauds, because by it no estate or interest in lands is created, granted, or assigned, must not be confused with such an agreement which does involve the creation, granting, or assigning of such an estate or interest. The individual partners do not own an estate in the partnership real property. Irrespective of where the title happens to be, such property, until the needs of the copartnership are satisfied, is treated as personal property. An agreement to form a copartnership to deal in lands does not, therefore, involve any element violative of the Statute of Frauds; but if such agreement also provides for a conveyance of real property from one partner to another, or to the copartnership, it then provides for the creation of an estate or interest in lands, and comes directly within the Statute of Frauds. The ground upon which partnership agreements to deal in land have been sustained, as well as the plain words of the statute, requires the conclusion that the mere fact that an agreement happens to provide for a copartnership will not save it from the Statute of Frauds, if it also attempts to create, grant, or assign an estate or interest in lands."

Dale v. Hamilton (1846) 5 Hare, 369, 67 Eng. Reprint, 955, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 126, 11 Jur. 163, on appeal in (1847) 2 Phill. Ch. 266, 41 Eng. Reprint, 945, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 397, 11 Jur. 574, which upheld a parol agreement for the joint buying, improving, and selling of lands for profit, as against the contention that it was invalidated by the Statute of Frauds, is usually regarded as the leading case in favor of the prevailing doctrine. In this case the distinction taken in argument, and apparently acted upon by the court, was this: If the allegation is of an agreement to transfer an interest in the land, the statute applies; if the allegation is that the land is to be resold at the joint risk for profit or loss, the statute does not apply.

b. Application to particular facts.

The general rule that a parol partnership or joint adventure to deal in real estate and to share profits is not within the Statute of Frauds has been applied to——partnership to engage in the general business of buying and selling real estate for profit:

c. Remedies available.

It follows, from the rule that a partnership to speculate in real estate merely amounts to a valid agreement for the division of profits rather than for an interest in land, that a copartner may pursue the appropriate legal or equitable remedy to recover his proportionate share of such profits. See the following cases:

United States.—Jones v. Patrick (1905) 140 Fed. 403.

California.—Bates v. Babcock (1892) 95 Cal. 484, 16 L.R.A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 183, 30 Pac. 605.

Colorado.—Von Trotha v. Bamberger (1890) 15 Colo. 1, 24 Pac. 883.

Kentucky.—Vaught v. Hogue (1908) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1061, 107 S. W. 757.

Maryland.—Morgart v. Smouse (1906) 103 Md. 463, 115 Am. St. Rep. 367, 63 Atl. 1070, 7 Ann. Cas. 1140 (holding, however, that an action at law cannot be maintained until there has been a settlement or statement of account between the partners).

Massachusetts.—Trowbridge v. Wetherbee (1865) 11 Allen, 361 (holding that, where the transaction for which the partnership was formed has been closed, an action at law may be maintained to recover a copartner's share of the profits).

Minnesota.—Sonnesyn v. Hawbaker (1914) 127 Minn. 15, 148 N. W. 476.

Missouri.—See Hunter v. Whitehead (1868) 42 Mo. 524.

Nebraska.—Greusel v. Payne (1921) — Neb. —, 185 N. W. 336. See Norton v. Brink (1906) 75 Neb. 566, 106 N. W. 68, reversed on other grounds on rehearing in (1906) 75 Neb. 575, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 945, 121 Am. St. Rep. 822, 110 N. W. 669, which holds that profits may be recovered where the contract has been fully performed).

Pennsylvania.—Everhart's Appeal (1884) 106 Pa. 349 (holding that recovery may be had where realty has been resold at a profit); Howell v. Kelly (1892) 149 Pa. 473, 24 Atl. 224 (holding that, where the partnership agreement concerns a single transaction in real estate which has been closed at a profit, assumpsit may be maintained by one partner against the other for a division of such profit).

Utah.—Coffin v. McIntosh (1893) 9 Utah, 315, 34 Pac. 247 (holding same as preceding case).

Vermont.—Bruce v. Hastings (1868) 41 Vt. 380, 98 Am. Dec. 592 (holding same as Howell v. Kelly (Pa.) supra).

Virginia.—Miller v. Ferguson (1907) 107 Va. 249, 122 Am. St. Rep. 840, 57 S. E. 649, 13 Ann. Cas. 138.

Washington.—Smith v. Imhoff (1916) 89 Wash. 418, 154 Pac. 793.

Wyoming.—HOGUE v. GEORGE (reported herewith) ante, 469.

Canada.—Archibald v. McNerhanie (1899) 29 Can. S. C. 564, affirming (1898) 6 B. C. 260.

Conversely, it has been held that, where a loss has been sustained, a partner who has advanced the money may recover pro rata from the other partners. Babcock v. Read (1885) 99 N. Y. 609, 1 N. E. 141, affirming (1884) 18 Jones & S. 126; Wormser v. Meyer (1877) 54 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 189.

And it has been held (Meason v. Kaine (1869) 63 Pa. 339) that, where the partnership is limited to a single transaction, a partner who has advanced the purchase money may maintain an action against his copartner to recover a proportionate share of such purchase money. In Jones v. Davies (1899) 60 Kan. 309, 72 Am. St. Rep. 354, 56 Pac. 484, it was held that the assignee of a partner who was familiar with the partnership affairs, and actively participated therein by contributing regularly, over a long period, to a fund for the payment of interest on unpaid purchase money on lands which the partnership had bought, was liable as a partner for the payment of the purchase money remaining unpaid.

And where one partner has misrepresented the amount which he had to pay for the real estate for the purchase of which the partnership was formed, it has been held that the defrauded partner may maintain an action for damages to which the Statute of Frauds does not constitute a defense. The court in Davenport v. Buchanan (1894) 6 S. D. 376, 61 N. W. 47, in so holding, said: "The contention of counsel for respondent is, and the apparent theory upon which the court dismissed the case was, that the contract between plaintiff and defendant, being for the sale of real property, and the same, or some memorandum thereof, not being in writing and signed by the party to be charged, was void under § 3544 of the Compiled Laws, which relates to contracts for the sale of real property. In our opinion, the statute has no application to an arrangement between two persons to become special partners in the purchase of certain real property for the purpose of speculation, under an agreement that each shall pay an equal amount of the purchase price, and share equally in the profits arising from future sales, less a certain per cent in the way of commission to the partner finding a purchaser. No agreement for the sale of real property, or for the creation of an interest therein, or a transfer thereof from one of the parties to the other, was contemplated, but the evident object of each was to fix the terms of a copartnership agreement, by which their subsequent transactions in relation to the joint purchase and sale of the real property described in the complaint would be governed; and to declare such a contract invalid because not written, and to hold that one of the parties thereto, in violation of the good faith by which the acts of one toward the other must be characterized, may, with impunity, violate the terms of such contract, and, by fraudulent and false representations concerning the purchase price of the property, obtain and keep, as alleged in the complaint, money belonging to the other, would require us to construe a statute designed to prevent frauds into a double and keen-edged instrument of fraud. We therefore conclude that a contract like the present agreement between plaintiff and defendant may be oral, and its terms may be established by parol evidence, when the same become material, in an action to recover money alleged to have been fraudulently obtained thereunder by one partner from the other."

And an accounting may be had in equity.

And it has been held that one of the parties to a parol partnership or joint adventure to deal in real estate may maintain a suit in equity to establish his interest, not only in property unsold, but in the profits arising from that actually sold, but not accounted for. Ingram v. Johnston (1918) 38 Cal. App. 234, 176 Pac. 54. And in Arnold v. Loomis (1915) 170 Cal. 95, 148 Pac. 518, where the title to the property was taken in the name of a third person, it was held that one partner could maintain a suit against the other partner and such third person to compel the latter to execute a conveyance of plaintiff's interest to him, or to sell the land under order of court and distribute the proceeds in equal parts to the copartners.

And in Morrill v. Colehour (1876) 82 Ill. 618, it was said that, had the one who took the title failed to make the sales as contemplated by the parties, he could, no doubt, have been compelled to do so, or another would have been appointed for the purpose by the court.

And it has been held that an action may be maintained by a copartner for breach of the contract of partnership by the other, in failing to purchase property according to the agreement. Sloan v. Paramore (1914) 181 Mo. App. 611, 164 S. W. 662.

And in Fitch v. King (1917) 279 Ill. 62, 116 N. E. 624, where at the time a partnership was dissolved it owned several pieces of real estate, it was held that one copartner could maintain a bill against another copartner, in whose name the title stood, for a settlement of the partnership affairs.

It has been declared that, if the one taking title disposes of the lands at a profit, a resulting trust as to such profits arises in favor of the other, which may be enforced in equity. Wallace v. Carpenter (1877) 85 Ill. 590.

And in Duncan v. Johnson (1913) 89 Kan. 21, 130 Pac. 655, where land was purchased, title being taken in the name of one partner, for speculation, but remained unsold, it was held that the Statute of Frauds did not preclude an action by the other partner to be adjudged the owner of an undivided one half thereof, and for an accounting.

And in Hodge v. Twitchell (1885) 33 Minn. 389, 23 N. W. 547, it was held that one of the members of a partnership formed, by oral agreement, for the purchase and sale of real estate, may maintain an action to establish an interest in real estate bought by another partner in fraud of the complainant's rights under the partnership agreement.

And it has been held that where the partnership has been dissolved, and there remains partnership real estate unsold, the partners become tenants in common of such remaining realty, so that a copartner may maintain a suit for partition thereof. Tenney v. Simpson (1887) 37 Kan. 353, 15 Pac. 187. In reaching this conclusion the court said: "It is further urged that Simpson was not to have any interest in the land, but only an interest in the proceeds of the sale of lots. This is very technical, but giving it all the force to which it may be entitled, and still it can make no difference under the further facts of the case; for before the commencement of this action, the sale of the lots was discontinued and the partnership dissolved at the instance of the other parties, and the partnership debts paid; and always, upon the dissolution of a partnership and the full payment of the partnership debts, the partners become tenants in common with regard to any and all real estate still belonging to the copartnership. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 423, subd. 4. Viewing this case in any light we may, it is clear that M. Shepard Bolles holds four tenths of the property in controversy in trust for Simpson. When the deed was first executed to him he held the property in trust for the partnership; Simpson's interest therein, after paying the debts, being four tenths. When the partnership was terminated he then held the property in trust for the individual partners in proportion to their respective interests in the partnership."

But, even admitting that a money judgment for profits may be obtained, it has been held that a decree for specific performance, affecting the title to real estate bought pursuant to a parol partnership agreement to deal therein, cannot be had. Von Trotha v. Bamberger (1890) 15 Colo. 1, 24 Pac. 883.

And it has been held that where the oral partnership is formed to buy and sell real estate for speculation, and property has been bought, but remains unsold, one copartner cannot maintain a suit for partition thereof, even in jurisdictions which uphold the validity of such agreements; at least, where it does not appear that the petitioning copartner is entitled to demand a present sale of lands and final settlement of the partnership. Pennybacker v. Leary (1884) 65 Iowa, 220, 21 N. W. 575.

And it has been held that, while a partnership agreement for division of profits arising from the sale of lands bought for speculation, pursuant to a parol partnership agreement to buy and sell real estate, may be enforced by recovery of profits earned by a carrying out of the partnership purpose, one partner cannot establish an interest in lands bought under the agreement, but remaining unsold, as against the defense of the statute requiring agreements relating to interests in lands to be in writing. Everhart's Appeal (1884) 106 Pa. 349. This was upon the theory that an interest in profits was not an interest in lands itself, within the meaning of the statute, since the profits were personalty; but that the same could not be said of lands which had been purchased pursuant to the agreement, and remained unsold.

IV. Minority rule.

As stated supra, II., there is some authority to the effect that a partnership agreement, or joint adventure, to engage in the business of buying and selling real estate, is a contract respecting an interest in lands so as to render it void under the Statute of Frauds, unless in writing, etc., or unless sufficiently performed to take the same out of the statute.

The leading case on this side of the question is Smith v. Burnham (Fed.) supra, wherein Story, Ch. J., very fully considered the question, and, although holding that the agreement in suit did not evidence a partnership, but a trust, proceeded to decide that a parol agreement for dealing in lands was within the Statute of Frauds. In reaching this conclusion he repudiated the theory that the several interests of the parties attach only to the proceeds, and declared that the agreement, if good at all, attached also to the lands at the time of purchase, and that it then was an agreement respecting and for an interest in lands such as the statute required to be in writing. The argument, in part, was as follows: "We come, in the next place, to the consideration of the important point whether a parol contract of this sort, for a partnership in speculations in land, to be bought and sold on joint account, is not within the true intent of the Statute of Frauds. It seems to me that it must be so considered, both upon principle and authority. . . . Upon principle, how stands this case? It insists upon a parol copartnership for the purchase and sale of lands for the joint account of the partners. If so, this is clearly the case of a parol contract respecting an interest in lands. It was contemplated, according to the very structure of the bill itself, that upon every purchase made under the supposed contract of partnership the plaintiff should have an interest in the lands purchased, to the extent of one moiety, or his share in the partnership. Now, if the purchase was made in the name of Burnham as to one moiety, it was to be in trust for the plaintiff. By the Statute of Frauds all estates made or created by parol, and not put in writing, and signed by the party making or creating the same, are mere estates at will. And all grants and assignments, as well as all declarations or creations of trusts or confidences in lands, are also to be manifested and proved by some writing, signed by the party, who is by law enabled to grant, assign, or declare such trust, otherwise the same are utterly void and of no effect. And all contracts for the sale of lands, or of any interest in or concerning the same, are also required to be in writing; otherwise no action is maintainable thereon. There is an exception of trusts and confidences which arise or result by the implication or construction of law, or are to be transferred or extinguished by an act or operation of law. Now, taking these clauses together or separately, the same conclusion would seem to follow, as to the parol agreement in the present case. If the agreement could be treated as a sale by the defendant to the plaintiff of any interest in the lands to be purchased, it would be within the statute. If it could be treated as the case of an estate created in lands, it would be a mere estate at will, which would defeat the whole intention of the agreement, and the whole object of the bill. I incline to think that it properly falls under neither of these predicaments; but that it is the case of the declaration or creation of a trust or confidence in lands, not arising or resulting by implication or operation of law. . . . It has been ingeniously argued that the interest of the plaintiff is in a moiety of the profits, or proceeds of the sale, and not in the land itself; and that, therefore,—at least, when the land has been sold by the defendant,—the agreement attaches to the moiety of the proceeds. But the agreement, if good at all, attaches also to the land at the time of the purchase; and it is then an agreement for an interest by way of trust in the land, a sort of springing trust; and it is in virtue of this trust estate, and of this only, that any right can attach to the moiety of the proceeds. The right to follow the proceeds is a right which, if it exists at all, flows from the interest in the lands, and the trust created in favor of the plaintiff. It is not collateral, but direct. Indeed, the bill puts the agreement as one of a copartnership for 'purchasing and selling lands,' by means of a capital to be furnished by the partners, the profits and losses to be equally shared by them. Then, again, it is suggested that the agreement is not within the Statute of Frauds, because it did not so much contemplate an interest in the lands purchased, as an interest in the contracts to convey lands obtained by the defendant for the partnership, and the profits made on the sale thereof. But it is a sufficient answer to this suggestion, that such is not the agreement set up in the bill. It is not an agreement to purchase contracts for the conveyance of lands to be sold for the partnership, but an agreement for the purchase and sale of lands for the partnership. But if the bill had stated the agreement to be as the argument has supposed, it would not have changed the legal posture of the case. A contract for the conveyance of lands is a contract respecting an interest in lands. It creates an equitable estate in the vendee in the very lands; and makes the vendor a trustee for him. A contract for the sale of an equitable estate in lands, whether it be under a contract for the conveyance by a third person or otherwise, is clearly a sale of an interest in the lands within the Statute of Frauds. . . . A partnership to buy contracts for the sale of lands is a partnership for the purchase of an equitable interest in those lands. If the transactions are to be carried on by and in the name of one partner, the partnership is to create a trust for the other in those contracts; and consequently, if the agreement for the partnership is by parol, it is to create such trust by parol. This would bring the case within the purview of the Statute of Frauds."

Applying the rule that a parol partnership or joint adventure to deal in real estate is within the Statute of Frauds, validity has been denied to, — —partnership to engage in the general business of buying and selling real estate, Re Warren (1847) 2

Ware, 322, Fed. Cas. No. 17,191; Rowland v. Boozer (1846) 10 Ala. 690; Huntington v. Burdeau (1912) 149 Wis. 263, 135 N. W. 845; —partnerships to engage in certain speculative transactions in real estate, Parker v. Bodley (1815) 4 Bibb. (Ky.) 102; Coffinberry v. Blakeslee (1915) 22 Ohio C. C. N. S. 34; Clarke v. McAuliffe (1892) 81 Wis. 104, 51 N. W. 88; Scheuer v. Cochem (1905) 126 Wis. 209, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 427, 105 N. W. 573; Langley v. Sanborn (1908) 135 Wis. 178, 114 N. W. 787; —partnership to buy contracts for the sale of land, Smith v. Burnham (1838) 8 Sumn. 435, Fed. Cas. No. 13,019;

—partnerships to purchase and dispose of timberlands, McKinley v. Lloyd (1904) 128 Fed. 519; Smith v. Putnam (1900) 107 Wis. 155, 82 N. W. 1077, rehearing denied in (1900) 107 Wis. 169, 83 N. W. 288. And see McMillen v. Pratt (1895) 89 Wis. 612, 62 N. W. 588, and Seymour v. Cushway (1898) 100 Wis. 580, 69 Am. St. Rep. 957, 76 N. W. 769.

In Nester v. Sullivan (1907) 147 Mich. 493, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1106, 111 N. W. 85, modified in (1907) 147 Mich. 508, 111 N. W. 1033, it was held that an oral agreement to purchase and sell real estate in partnership, and divide the profits, with the understanding that each person shall have an interest in the property, is, although applying to a series of transactions, invalid under the Statute of Frauds, where no performance takes place except the payment of the necessary incidental expense, the one advancing money for any parcel of land taking the title thereto. In MULLHOLLAND v. PATCH (reported herewith) ante, 468, it was said that the agreement in this case contemplated and actually involved the holding of real estate. And see this case, as set out supra, III. a. And compare Chase v. Angell (1906) 148 Mich. 1, 118 Am. St. Rep. 568, 108 N. W. 1105.

In Schultz v. Waldons (1901) 60 N. J. Eq. 71, 47 Atl. 187, it was held that where there is no previous partnership or joint enterprise between two parties, and they agree by parol that one of them shall purchase and take title in his own name to a single piece of real estate, and hold the same for the benefit of both, and the other party contributes no money to the enterprise, the Statute of Frauds prevents the latter from successfully claiming an interest in the land.

It has been held that a sale by one member of a partnership dealing in real estate, of a portion of his interest, relates to an interest in and concerning lands within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds. Black v. Black (1854) 15 Ga. 445.

And an agreement between partners that the one taking the title to realty purchases shall not resell at less than an agreed price has been held to be invalid under the Statute of Frauds, since, if valid, it would limit the power of sale, and so narrow the title of the partner in whose name the property stands, and this notwithstanding the agreement for division of the profits be upheld. Pitman v. Hodge (1891) 67 N. H. 101, 36 Atl. 605.

Of course, where the parol agreement is held void under the Statute of Frauds, an action cannot be maintained to protect or enforce any rights arising from the alleged relationship. Smith v. Burnham (1838) 3 Sumn. 435, Fed. Cas. No. 13,019 (bill for dissolution and accounting); Re Warren (1847) 2 Ware, 322, Fed. Cas. No. 17,191 (holding generally that one cannot take advantage of the contract, since otherwise he would acquire an interest in land by parol); Young v. Wheeler (1888) 34 Fed.

98 (suit to compel conveyance of interest); McKinley v. Lloyd (1904) 128 Fed. 519 (suit to establish interest in land); Rowland v. Boozer (1846) 10 Ala. 690 (action on note representing share of profits); Parker v. Bodley (1815) 4 Bibb (Ky.) 102 (bill to compel sale of a share of the property bought but not resold); Nester v. Sullivan (1907) 147 Mich. 493, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1106, 111 N. W. 85, modified in (1907) 147 Mich. 508, 111 N. W. 1033; Coffinberry v. Blakeslee (1915) 22 Ohio C. C. N. S. 34 (action for accounting); Clarke v. McAuliffe (1892) 81 Wis. 104, 51 N. W. 83 (suit for dissolution and accounting); McMillen v. Pratt (1895) 89 Wis. 612, 62 N. W. 588 (action at law for damages for breach of partnership agreement); Scheuer v. Cochem (1905) 126 Wis. 209, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 427, 105 N. W. 573 (suit for dissolution and accounting); Langley v. Sanborn (1908) 135 Wis. 178, 114 N. W. 787 (holding the same as McMillan v. Pratt (Wis.) supra).

But where the contract has been fully performed, that takes it out of the statute so as to permit recovery of a share of the profits. Smith v. Putnam (1900) 107 Wis. 155, 82 N. W. 1077, rehearing denied in (1900) 107 Wis. 169, 83 N. W. 288; Huntington v. Burdeau (1912) 149 Wis. 263, 135 N. W. 845; Steuerwald v. Richter (1914) 158 Wis. 597, 149 N. W. 692.

Of course, to be available as a defense, the statute must be pleaded. Patterson v. Ware (1846) 10 Ala. 444.

DELLO STEELE, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF INDIANA.

Indiana Supreme Court — November 15, 1921.

(— Ind. —, 132 N. E. 739.)

Trespass — criminal — subtenant.

1. A subtenant cannot be prosecuted for a criminal trespass under a statute providing for prosecution of whoever, being unlawfully upon the land of another, shall refuse to depart upon notification.

[See note on this question beginning on page 503.]

Landlord and tenant — right to sublet.

2. A tenant has a right to sublet in the absence of anything in the lease forbidding him to do so.

[See 16 R. C. L. 729, 871.]

Trespass — criminal — extent of remedy.

3. Disputed rights in real property cannot be tried under a statute relating to criminal trespass.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Gibson County (Kister, J.) convicting him of criminal trespass. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Thomas Duncan and Hovey C. Kirk, for appellant:

Defendant having been put into possession of lot 11, as described and mentioned in the affidavit by the lessee, his holding over as such sublessee is considered as the holding over of the lessee.

Brewer v. Knapp, 1 Pick. 332; Dimock v. Van Bergen, 12 Allen, 551.

Defendant, as sublessee of the original lessee, acquired an estate in the land in controversy.

Washington Natural Gas Co. v. Johnson, 10 Am. St. Rep. 564, note.

As there is no restriction against subletting in the lease of the property in controversy to Mrs. Williams, she had the legal right to sublet a part of the premises to defendant.

Mitchell v. Young, 80 Ark. 441, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 221, 117 Am. St. Rep. 89, 97 S. W. 454, 10 Ann. Cas. 423; Jones, Land. & T. § 431.

The machinery of the criminal law cannot be set in motion to redress merely private grievances, or to settle questions of property rights between defendant and another.

Barlow v. State, 120 Ind. 56, 22 N. E. 88; Hughes v. State, 103 Ind. 344, 2 N. E. 956, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 373; Howe v. State, 10 Ind. 492; Windsor v. State, 13 Ind. 375; Palmer v. State, 45 Ind. 388; Dawson v. State, 52 Ind. 478; Lossen v. State, 62 Ind. 437; Ewbank, Indiana Trial Ev. p. 755, § 846.

There is no evidence of a notice to depart from this lot within the meaning of the law of trespass.

Ryan v. State, 5 Ind. App. 396, 31 N. E. 1127.

Messrs. U. S. Lesh, Attorney General, and Mrs. Edward Franklin White, for the State:

Defendant's occupancy until September 30th was lawful, but from that time forward it became unlawful, and it was for such unlawful occupancy that he was ousted.

Manning v. State, 6 Ind. App. 259, 33 N. E. 253.

The province of the jury is invaded by an instruction which emphasizes and calls particular attention to certain evidence.

Barker v. State, 48 Ind. 163.

Travis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a prosecution for criminal trespass, as defined by § 2280, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914. From a verdict of guilty by the jury defendant appeals.

The real estate involved in this prosecution consisted of a platted lot upon which was a dwelling house, all of which had been rented to one who, together with his wife, occupied the same. This tenant died in the month of August, and his widow continued as the occupant of the leased premises. She paid the rent after her husband's death for the months of August and September, and became the tenant of the owner thereof for said time. In the early part of September she took into the dwelling house with her the appellant and his family, and received rent from him for such occupancy. The owner of the property knew that the defendant was living in the house with his family with its tenant, and that the appellant was paying its tenant for such occupancy. The real tenant moved out of the dwelling house at the end of September, and notified the owner that it would have to look to appellant, who was now the occupant of the premises, for any further rent. Appellant went to the office of the owner, and sought to make a lease for the property, which was refused, but he continued as such occupant until the 20th day of November. November 9th an agent of the owner of the premises went to the house and told appellant, "I told him I wanted possession of the property." Thereafter this prosecution was begun upon an affidavit made by an agent and employee of the owner. Prior to the beginning of this prosecution an action in ejectment was begun by the owner of the property against the appellant, in the court which tried this cause.

The only error assigned is the overruling of the motion for a new trial. Of the twenty-seven errors alleged in the motion only three are pointed to in appellant's brief, the first of which is the only one considered necessary for a determination of this appeal, and which is: The verdict of the jury is contrary to law.

It is undisputed that appellant occupied said premises as a subtenant, and that he paid rent therefor to the tenant for the month of September, for which month the tenant had paid her rent to the owner. The appellant was lawfully upon the land described in the charge. This is the crux of this case. It is the foundation, or lack of foundation, for a criminal intent, which, to sustain a conviction, must be proven by competent evidence. The statute says: "Whoever . . . being unlawfully upon the . . . land of another shall be notified to depart," etc. Without a reservation for-bidding a tenant to sublet the premises or any part thereof, she had the right to sublet the same, and the appellant, being a criminal—subtenant.

there lawfully, which lawful occupancy and possession cannot be made unlawful in the sense of making such occupancy a violation of the criminal statute of trespass, by being notified to depart from the premises, or to give up possession. If such occupancy and possession, once acquired legally, became unlawful by notice to depart or to give up possession of the land or premises, it is based upon the statutes which give the right of possession of real estate to the owner, which relates to a tenant holding over, or to an occupancy without paying rent, or to a forcible entry and detainer. If the original going upon the land and occupancy thereof were unlawful, the owner had a good remedy at law and an action for forcible entry and detainer. If being upon the land and the possession thereof were lawful, and no rent was being paid for the property by the occupant, or that the occupant had no lease therefor, still the owner had a good remedy at law in an action for ejectment.

The prosecution really turns out to be a suit for possession. The statute of the criminal law upon which this prosecution is based was not intended to be used as an aid to gain possession of real estate, or in ousting an occupant thereof who gained such occupancy lawfully, and who thereafter held over his rightful term without right. It is the well-settled law in this state, and of many other states, that it is an abuse of the penal statute relating to criminal trespass to use it to try disputed rights in real property. Dawson v. State (1876) 52 Ind. 478; Myers v. State (1921) — Ind. —, 130 N. E. 116. It is the opinion of the court, therefore, that the verdict is contrary to law.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial, and for further proceedings in accord with this opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Sublessee or assignee of lease as trespasser.

The reported case (STEELE v. STATE, ante, 500) appears to be a case of first impression on the question of the liability of a sublessee for trespass. In that case it is held that, without a reservation in a lease forbidding a tenant to sublet, a sublessee, lawfully in possession by permission of the tenant, cannot be held liable for criminal trespass, after notice from the landlord to depart, under a statute providing that whoever, being unlawfully on the land of another, shall be notified to depart, and fail to do so, may be prosecuted for criminal trespass.

On the question of the liability of the assignee of a lease for trespass, no authority has been found.

MERIJILDO DOMINGUEZ, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

Texas Court of Criminal Appeals—June 24, 1921.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 234 S. W. 79.)

Criminal law — jurisdiction — person brought into country without extradition.

1. One seized under a mistake as to identity by United States soldiers, in the country of his residence, and carried into the United States, not having been kidnapped, cannot be tried there for offenses committed within the United States other than that for which he was seized, until he has voluntarily submitted himself to the jurisdiction, or consent to his trial, by the country of his residence, has been secured.

Courts — jurisdiction — person seized in foreign territory.

2. To determine the jurisdiction of the court to try one arrested by United States soldiers in the territory of another nation, the court will assume that the soldiers were acting in accord with permission extended by the government where the arrest was made.

Kidnapping — mistaking identity — effect.

3. The mistake of soldiers pursuing raiders across the boundaries of the nation into the territory of another nation with its acquiescence, as to the identity of one found with the band, relieves his arrest and return to their own country from being a criminal kidnapping or abduction.

Treaty — part of supreme law of land.

4. A treaty is a part of the supreme law of the land, binding upon courts and available to persons having rights secured or recognized thereby, and may be set up as a defense to a criminal prosecution instituted in disregard thereof.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Val Verde County (Jones, J.) convicting him of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Boggess, Smith, & La Crosse, for appellant:

Defendant's original apprehension, subsequent detention, and trial, were in violation of and in contravention to the terms and provisions of the Treaty of Extradition between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico.

United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 30 L. ed. 425, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 234, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 222; Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 627; Arce v. State, 83 Tex. Crim. Rep. 292, L.R.A.1918E, 358, 202 S. W. 951.

Defendant is entitled to avail himself of the obligation of the treaty to the extent asserted in the plea.

Mr. J. Q. Henry, for the State:

When defendant was found by the civil authorities of Texas within its jurisdiction, and was delivered into the custody of such civil officers, and regularly indicted by the proper grand jury for murder of Glenn Nevill, was placed on trial for said offense in the regular way, and tried by due course of law, then the Texas court had jurisdiction of his person to try and dispose of the case without regard to how he may have come into or been brought into the jurisdiction of the state.

Mr. R. H. Hamilton, Assistant Attorney General, also for the State.

Morrow, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon an indictment for murder, the appellant is condemned to confinement in the penitentiary for a period of ninety-nine years. In a preliminary plea he urged the want of jurisdiction over his person. It appeared from the evidence and admission introduced in support of the plea that he was a native, a citizen, and resident of the Republic of Mexico; that he had been forcibly arrested therein and brought to the state of Texas by a detachment of the military forces of the government of the United States, by whom he was delivered, without his consent, to the civil authorities of the state of Texas.

A captain, who was in command of the company of soldiers of the United States who arrested the appellant, testified that by virtue of instructions from the War Department of the United States, his command, within a certain limit of time and space, was authorized to go into the territory of the United States of Mexico in pursuit of bandits; that upon such mission he took his command, on the 2d day of April, into Mexico, and, within the limits of the time and distance, captured appellant. The authority under which he was acting was denominated following a "hot trail," which term comprehended the pursuit of bandits across the border. It developed some time after his capture that the appellant was not one of the bandits pursued, though he was believed to be such at the time he was apprehended. Because he was not one of those who made the "hot trail" which was followed, the appellant, some days after his seizure and while he was in the state of Texas, where he had been brought by the soldiers mentioned, their custody of him was abandoned, and immediately thereupon, by prearrangement, he was taken charge of by Texas Rangers, and held under the charge which culminated in the conviction involved in this appeal.

Appellant insists that, not being one of those whom the United States soldiers were privileged to arrest while in the United States of Mexico, he was immune from prosecution until such time as he had been given the privilege of returning to his native country. In support of this view he refers to the principle that a fugitive from justice, who has taken refuge in a foreign country and by that country surrendered upon the requisition of the United States government in virtue of a treaty of extradition, cannot lawfully be tried for an offense against the United States committed before he was extradited, and differing from that to answer which he was surrendered by the country of refuge. United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 30 L. ed. 425, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 234, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 222; Johnson v. Browne, 205 U. S. 309, 51 L. ed. 816, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, 10 Ann. Cas. 636; Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 697, 26 Am. Rep. 242, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 201; State v. Vanderpool, 39 Ohio St. 273, 48 Am. Rep. 431, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 203; Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 627.

Against appellant's contention, the state advances the view that the appellant's apprehension was not under authority of the United States government, nor with the consent of that of Mexico, but that he was, in fact, abducted or kidnapped and brought forcibly from his native country into the United States contrary to his wishes; that in so doing his abductors acted under no warrant or right from any government, but were trespassers, and in punishing him for the offense committed in the state of Texas no violence is done to any treaty obligation or right.

Rauscher was indicted in the United States court for the offense of murder of one Janssen on the high seas within the jurisdiction of the United States. He took refuge in England, and upon the requisition of the United States was surrendered by the Kingdom of Great Britain that he might be tried for murder. The charge of murder was abandoned, and the prisoner was put upon trial under an indictment charging him with cruel punishment of Janssen. The acts upon which the two prosecutions were based were identical. The United States Supreme Court decided that the prosecution must be abated, holding that, having obtained the custody of the accused from the Kingdom of Great Britain in order that he might be tried for murder, the United States was bound, under the treaty, to release the prisoner and suffer him, if he so desired, to depart from the United States upon the conclusion of the prosecution for murder. Many books and decisions are referred to in the opinion, among them one from our own state (Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 640), in which the accused was surrendered by the Republic of Mexico to answer to the charge of theft committed in Travis county, Texas. Prior to his arrest, he had been indicted in the same county for embezzlement. This court sustained his claim that his trial for embezzlement could not lawfully proceed, for the reason that he had been surrendered by the Republic of Mexico to answer the charge of theft, and that to try him for a different offense committed before his arrest did violence to his rights under the treaty between the two countries, and was at variance with the implied obligation resting upon the United States government, that the accused would not be held to answer an offense committed before he was extradited, other than that which was named in the demand for his extradition.

Ker (Ker v. Illinois, 119 U. S. 436, 30 L. ed. 421, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 225) was convicted in the state court of Illinois for the offense of larceny. Before his conviction he presented his plea in abatement, in substance, setting up that while he was in Peru he was kidnapped and brought to the United States against his will. One Julian was put in possession of an extradition warrant issued by the President of the United States, authorizing him to receive from the authorities of Peru the person of Ker, the warrant having been issued in accord with the extradition treaty in force at the time in the two countries. Julian, having the papers in his possession, upon his arrival at Lima, Peru, without presenting his papers or making any demand of the Peruvian government for the surrender of Ker, forcibly and by violence arrested him and placed him on board of a United States vessel, and there kept him confined, and finally brought him to San Francisco, in the state of California, where he found awaiting him a requisition to the governor of California, made by the governor of the state of Illinois. The soundness of the judgment of the court overruling this plea was affirmed by the supreme court of Illinois, and upon its challenge in the Supreme Court of the United States the ruling was upheld, the court drawing the distinction between that case and the case of the United States v. Rauscher, supra, upon the ground that in the latter case the accused came to this country clothed with the protection which the nature of such proceedings and the true construction of the treaty gave him. The court said:

"In the case before us, the plea shows that, although Julian went to Peru with the necessary papers to procure the extradition of Ker under the treaty, those papers remained in his pocket and were never brought to light in Peru; that no steps were taken under them; and that Julian, in seizing upon the person of Ker and carrying him out of the territory of Peru into the United States, did not act, nor profess to act, under the treaty. In fact, that treaty was not called into operation, was not relied upon, was not made the pretext of arrest, and the facts show that it was a clear case of kidnapping within the dominions of Peru, without any pretense of authority under the treaty or from the government of the United States.

"In the case of United States v. Rauscher, supra, and considered with this, the effect of extradition proceedings under a treaty was very fully considered, and it was there held that, when a party was duly surrendered, by proper proceedings, under the Treaty of 1842 with Great Britain, he came to this country clothed with the protection which the nature of such proceedings and the true construction of the treaty gave him. One of the rights with which he was thus clothed, both in regard to himself and in good faith to the country which had sent him here, was that he should be tried for no other offense than the one for which he was delivered under the extradition proceedings. If Ker had been brought to this country by proceedings under the Treaty of 1870-74 with Peru, it seems probable, from the statement of the case in the record, that he might have successfully pleaded that he was extradited for larceny, and convicted by the verdict of a jury of embezzlement; for the statement in the plea is that the demand made by the President of the United States, if it had been put in operation, was for an extradition for larceny, although some forms of embezzlement are mentioned in the treaty as subjects of extradition. But it is quite a different case when the plaintiff in error comes to this country in the manner in which he was brought here, clothed with no rights which a proceeding under the treaty could have given him, and no duty which this country owes to Peru or to him under the treaty.

"We think it very clear, therefore, that, in invoking the jurisdiction of this court upon the ground that the prisoner was denied a right conferred upon him by a treaty of the United States he has failed to establish the existence of any such right. . . .

"It must be remembered that this view of the subject does not leave the prisoner or the government of Peru without remedy for his unauthorized seizure within its territory. Even this treaty with that country provides for the extradition of persons charged with kidnapping, and, on demand from Peru, Julian, the party who is guilty of it, could be surrendered and tried in its courts for this violation of its laws. The party himself would probably not be without redress, for he could sue Julian in an action of trespass and false imprisonment, and the facts set out in the plea would, without doubt, sustain the action. Whether he could recover a sum sufficient to justify the action would probably depend upon moral aspects of the case, which we cannot here consider."

The cases of Rauscher and Ker were decided by the Supreme Court of the United States about the same time, and we interpret them to hold that when a foreign country surrenders a fugitive from justice under an extradition treaty he can be tried in the demanding country alone for the offense named in the extradition proceedings, but when the fugitive is kidnapped or abducted in a foreign country and brought into one of the United States, and there tried for an offense against its laws, the judgment of conviction will not be overturned by the Supreme Court of the United States because he was kidnapped or abducted, but that the decision of the state court upon the effect of such acquisition of custody of his person will control. The primary inquiry, then, is into which of the classes, if either, the proof brings the appellant's arrest. The extradition treaty does not sanction, or purport to sanction, the entry of the soldiers of the United States of America to make an arrest in the Republic of Mexico.

The captain who conducted the expedition into Mexico and apprehended the appellant said: "I was acting under instructions issued by the War Department; we had a certain limit that we could go into Mexico for a certain length of time in pursuit of bandits, and I was within those limits at the time of Merijildo Dominguez's detention."

We have no more specific information touching the source and the scope of the authority upon which the soldiers acted. Their entry of Mexico for the purpose of apprehending offenders would have been a violation of Mexican territory contrary to the law of nations, in the absence of consent of the Mexican government. 15 R. C. L. p. 132, § 45. For the purpose of this decision it must be assumed that the instructions which proceeded from the War Department of the United

Courts—jurisdiction—person seized in foreign territory.

States were in accord with the permission extended by the Mexican government. The exact nature or classification of the privilege exercised by the War Department in sending its soldiers into Mexico for the purpose named is not certain, though it is doubtless referable to the so-called "comity of nations." 22 Cyc. 1732. The United States and Mexico were at peace, and the office the soldiers performed appears to have been analogous to that which pertains to the exercise by police officers of authority to make arrests without warrant. The police officers of the state of Texas having no authority as such beyond the bounds of the state, the privilege of pursuing offenders into Mexico was extended to and exercised by the military officers of the United States government and the soldiers under their command.

On the occasion in question, as we understand the record, having pursued and overtaken a band of raiders in a certain village of Mexico, they found appellant among them, and, acting upon the authority to arrest the raiders, they seized the appellant, believing him to be one of the raiders. In making the arrest, apparently, they were acting for the government, not as individuals. What was done was in virtue of the office. See Mechem, Pub. Off. § 284. Having no reference to their civil liability by reason of the mistake of fact, if it was such, as to the identity of the appellant, if it was made in good faith on adequate ground, no criminal responsibility ought to follow from it. In other words, if the apprehension of appellant was due solely to an honest mistake of fact as to his identity, the act was not criminal kidnapping or abduction. Appellant having been seized by virtue of the authority of the United States government with the consent of the Mexican government, the United States government acquired no greater right than would have existed if appellant had been one of those in whose pursuit the Mexican territory was entered. If the principles applicable to treaty obligations control the privilege of entering the Mexican territory and seizing its citizens under the agreement in question, appellant, if he had been one of those who made the so-called "hot trail," would have been entitled to his release when he had answered the charge against him upon which his arrest was made. In other words, if he had been one of the raiders pursued, he could have been tried for the offense committed on the occasion of the raid which was followed, but could not have been then held and tried for an offense previously committed within the state of Texas. This would have been true even though he had not been a citizen of Mexico. He, having sought an asylum in Mexico, could be removed to the United States only in accord with the treaty of extradition. He being a citizen of Mexico, the United States of America had no absolute right to demand his return. By the express provisions of the treaty, the surrender of a citizen of Mexico is made discretionary with the Mexican Executive. We are aware of no precedent by which to determine whether the agreement involved in the instant case would fall under the same principle that would control a written treaty. The same moral obligation that would restrain the United States government from transgressing the implied limitations upon it, under its treaty with Mexico, would necessarily prevail with reference to the agreement resting upon the "comity of nations," and if the legal obligation is the same, the appellant cannot be held for the offense which we are now considering, without the opportunity to return to his country, in order that it may there determine whether he shall be surrendered for trial under the treaty of extradition.

"Mr. Justice Story considers that the phrase 'comity of nations' is most appropriate, as indicating the foundation and extent of the obligation of the laws of one nation within the territories of another. The extraterritorial influence of laws is derived from the voluntary consent of the nation within which its application is proposed; and they are tacitly adopted jure gentium, in the absence of any positive rule, affirming, denying, or restraining their operation, unless they are repugnant to local policy or prejudicial to local interests." Hanrick v. Andrews, 9 Port. (Ala.) 9; 22 Cyc. p. 1732.

The treaty between the United States and Mexico, to which we have referred, contains the following:

"The government of the United States of America and the government of the United States of Mexico mutually agree to deliver up persons who, having been charged with or convicted of any of the crimes and offenses specified in the following article, committed within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, shall seek an asylum or be found within the territory of the other."

"Neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens under the stipulations of this convention, but the executive authority of each shall have the power to deliver them up, if, in its discretion, it be deemed proper to do so." Proclaimed April 24, 1899. [31 Stat. at L. 1818, 1822.]

This treaty, like others, is a part of the supreme law of the land, binding upon courts and available to persons having rights secured or recognized thereby, and may be set up as a defense to a criminal prosecution established in disregard thereof. Foster v. Neil- son, 2 Pet. 253, 7 L. ed. 415; 2 Rose's Notes (U. S.) 716; also Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 640, from which we quote:

"If the Federal Constitution, or a treaty, inhibits the doing of a certain thing, no legislative or executive action is required to authorize the courts to decline to override these limitations or restrictions, 'for the palpable and all-sufficient reason that to do so would be not only to violate the public faith, but to transgress the supreme law of the land.'

"In view of these principles of law, we hold, then, that it is the duty of the courts of the state to take cognizance of, construe, and give effect to, the treaties of the Federal government made with other nations; and that under a proper construction of the treaty with Mexico the defendant could not be legally called upon to answer any other crime save that for which he was extradited."

Appellant, a citizen of Mexico, not having been kidnapped or abducted, had the right to resist trial for the offense charged in the indictment, until such time as he should voluntarily subject himself to the jurisdiction of the United States, or until the consent of the Mexican government to his trial should be obtained.

By his plea in abatement, the appellant sought to avail himself of this privilege by bringing to the attention of the trial court the facts upon which he relied, seeking to have their truth determined and invoking the judgment of the court thereon. His plea, in our judgment, should have been considered, and, if found true, the prosecution abated.

The reversal of the judgment and remanding of the case is ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Right to try one brought within jurisdiction illegally or as a result of mistake as to identity.

- I. Scope, 509.
- II. General rule, 509.
- III. Application of rule:
 - a. Unlawful arrest, 513.
 - b. Fraud or trickery, 516.
- IV. Mistake as to identity, 516.

I. Scope.

This note is confined to a discussion of the cases wherein is presented the question of the right to try an accused person whose presence in the jurisdiction has been secured by unlawful as distinguished from irregular means, or was the result of a mistake as to identity. It therefore includes all cases involving the right to try one brought within the jurisdiction of the court by force or fraud, or without legal authority, and excludes cases wherein jurisdiction is acquired by means of faulty or irregular extradition papers. It also excludes the right to try an extradited person for a crime other than that for which he was extradited.

II. General rule.

Where a person accused of a crime is found within the territorial jurisdiction wherein he is so charged, the right to put him on trial for the offense charged is not impaired by the fact that he was brought from another jurisdiction by illegal means, such as kidnapping, unlawful force, fraud, or the like.

And it has been said: "Undoubtedly at common law the rule is, the court trying a party for a crime committed within its jurisdiction will not investigate the manner of his capture, in case he had fled to a foreign country and had been brought back to its jurisdiction, although his capture had been plainly without authority of law. In the case of a woman who was arrested in Brussels on a warrant issued in England, and was taken, apparently against her will, to England and lodged in jail, whereupon she sued out a writ of habeas corpus to obtain her release, the court said: "The question, therefore, is this,—whether, if a person charged with a crime is found in this country, it is the duty of the court to take care that such a party shall be amenable to justice, or whether we are to consider the circumstances under which she was brought here. I thought, and still continue to think, that we cannot inquire into them." Ex parte Scott (1829) 9 Barn. & C. 446, 109 Eng. Reprint, 166.
